Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

Rating Reform

1. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of the gross earnings of those earning less than £100 per week is, on average, taken up on local authority rates in Wales; and what the figures will be if the Government's proposals in their Green Paper, "Paying for Local Government" are implemented.

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): Only householders are directly liable for domestic rates, and there is no way of knowing the extent to which non-householders, earning or not, contribute to the cost of rates. Comparative information on the basis requested is not therefore available.

Mr. Thomas: Does the Secretary of State accept that that is an inadequate and innumerate answer from his Department yet again, because the whole direction of Government policy in this area is to shift the burden to all householders? That is the basis of the poll tax. Does he accept that it is completely illogical to propose to introduce a poll tax without making such comparative information available so that we know that each adult householder in Wales will be substantially worse off as a result?

Mr. Edwards: If anything is innumerate, it is the question. We know what the effect on households will be, and we know that the community charge will reduce bills for low-income households. We know that the domestic rate is 7·5 per cent. of the income of households with a net income of £100 or less, and we know that the new community charge will lessen the burden. What we do not know is all the information that the hon. Gentleman wants about single persons, young adults, and so on, who at present do not contribute directly to the rating system.

Mr. Raffan: Referring to my right hon. Friend's recent rate support grant announcement, will he confirm that Clwyd, which is making a real and genuine effort to find savings in its budget, will receive a substantial part of the remaining unclaimed grant, as five other county councils in Wales have categorically said that they will not be making savings? Can he give me any idea of how much Clwyd will receive?

Mr. Edwards: I am not sure that that arises from the question, but it is certainly true that the pressure on councils to reduce their expenditure remains and that those which have succeeded in cutting their expenditure will get a higher proportion of remaining grant than those which continue to spend at a high level.

Mr. Barry Jones: Will the right hon. Gentleman accept my warning that the collection of the community charge—the poll tax—will be difficult? Why did the right hon. Gentleman hand over £13 million to the Welsh counties on 20 February after saying on 17 February that he would not do so? Why did he give in? I remind him of the heading, "Edwards gives in" in the Daily Post of 21 February.

Mr. Edwards: I propose to say something on the subject in the debate on Welsh affairs, but the fact of the matter is that at the meeting on Monday I did not say that I would not. I said that if I did the county council should offer some reduction in expenditure. The county council said that it was impossible to reduce expenditure by a single penny. I am glad to say that subsequent to that the Clwyd council, by reducing its expenditure by £1·5 million, showed that it was possible, and it has passed on the benefit to its ratepayers.

Mr. Speaker: I have a suspicion that that was somewhat wide of the question.

Sixth Form Colleges

2. Mr. Grist asked the Secretary of State for Wales what advice his Department has given to local authorities considering the establishment of sixth form colleges.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wyn Roberts): The Macfarlane report, which was commissioned by the Government and the local authority associations, identified the advantages and disadvantanges of establishing sixth form colleges and considered various patterns of provision.

Mr. Grist: Does my hon. Friend agree that whereas some schools have adequate and large sixth forms, many with falling school rolls no longer have and are unable to offer a sufficiently wide choice of subjects to those pupils who are academically able? In such circumstances, is it not wise for local authorities to consider setting up sixth form colleges?

Mr. Roberts: My hon. Friend is right. We are faced with falling secondary school rolls, and between 1981 and 1991 there will be a decrease of 22·9 per cent. in secondary school pupils in Wales. That is why many local authorities are trying to rationalise by making alternative provision for them.

Mr. Wigley: In any discussions that the Minister has with local authorities, will he ensure that if they are considering moving towards sixth-form colleges they take into account the Welsh language, especially those councils that have bi-lingual secondary schools, and the consequences that will flow unless there are Welsh language sixth-form colleges? Will he also consider the effect on rural areas and the need for local authorities to have more resources to cover transport costs or the cost of children staying at one centre?

Mr. Roberts: The Welsh Office does not seek to prescribe the pattern of provision to local authorities. That provision is basically a matter for them. There are various options. For example, there are the traditional sixth-form colleges, tertiary colleges and further education colleges. The Macfarlane report states that special steps are needed to ensure continuity between sixth-form colleges and their feeder schools in both education and pastoral matters. I should have thought that the Welsh language was covered by that statement.

Mr. Best: My hon. Friend may be aware that one of my constituents, Mr. John Rowlands, the headmaster of Holyhead school, is on a year's sabbatical to consider the problem raised by the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley). Is it not imperative that we recognise that there is only one choice available to us if we are to provide the great variety of disciplines that are necessary in a sixth form, which is to establish sixth-form colleges, especially when we bear in mind falling school rolls?

Mr. Roberts: I have already said that that is only one alternative. There is only one sixth-form college in Wales, and that is Yale at Wrexham. There are other options, including those that I mentioned, but it is important that there should be rationalisation of provision for secondary school pupils to reflect falling rolls.

Dr. Roger Thomas: What advice would the Minister give to anxious parents of sixth formers at our small comprehensive schools? I am thinking of the one in Llandovery, which is quite a distance from any other school and has only 400 pupils. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the choice of A-level subjects at such schools is disgustingly small? The choice is extremely limited and the pupils at such schools are suffering a disadvantage when compared with those who attend schools in more populated areas.

Mr. Roberts: One of the advantages of sixth-form colleges, as outlined by the Macfarlane report, is that they are able to offer a wider range of subjects than sixth-form schools. I am glad the hon. Gentleman is apparently prepared to support a proposal for the rationalisation of secondary education in his constituency and county.

Colliery Closures

3. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he intends to take steps to provide further employment opportunities in the light of continuing colliery closures.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Following the closure of several consistently uneconomic collieries, the NCB has no current plans for further closures in south Wales, and the industry can look forward to much greater stability and renewed development. Efforts to provide other employment opportunities are continuing, using the instruments of regional industrial policy, the urban programme, and the Welsh Development Agency and drawing on the support of NCB (Enterprise) Ltd.

Mr. Davies: It is not surprising that we have heard nothing new yet again from the Secretary of State. When will he show some sign of understanding, let alone compassion or concern, of the effect of the Government's policies on the south Wales valleys? Is he aware that in the lower Rhymney valley 500 jobs will be lost as a result of the closure of the Bedwas colliery? The Government, the Welsh Office and NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. have nothing to offer.

May I draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the report which was published today by the Department of Trade and Industry which suggests that regional policy is effective and has created over 600,000 jobs in Britain over the past 20 years? If he accepts the findings in the report, which was sponsored by the Government, why does he not ensure that the logical conclusion of the report is accepted and that Wales has a proper regional investment policy to provide the jobs and infrastructure that it needs to replace the jobs that it is losing?

Mr. Edwards: I agree that regional policy has an important role to play. The hon. Gentleman knows that his constituency has the maximum level of assistance that is available under regional policy. The fact that assistance differs in various areas gives the policy its impact. NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. has made a good start by supporting projects in Wales. The cost of the investment has been over £11 million and about 1,400 jobs have been provided. I am taking other initiatives for the valleys, of which I have sent the hon. Gentleman details and to which I shall refer in the debate that is to follow.

Mr. Harvey: Can my right hon. Friend estimate the number of jobs lost in Wales as a result of the miners' strike last year?

Mr. Edwards: I cannot. We know that more than 6,000 jobs have been lost in the pits that have been closed. We cannot tell what the total effect of that strike has been. It affected many other industries and many small firms.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: Does the right hon. Gentleman have any plans to increase the proportion of the working population living in parts of Wales eligible for regional development grant?

Mr. Edwards: We carried out a major review of regional policy comparatively recently. I do not believe that it would be sensible, so soon after the last review, to recast the present distribution of coverage. There is no doubt that if we extended coverage in Wales there would have to be a major extension of coverage in other parts of the United Kingdom. It is therefore by no means clear that Wales would benefit from such a change.

Sir Raymond Gower: Although it is true that in recent years there have been pit closures in south Wales, did not the most marked decline in employment in the coal industry in Wales occur during the period of the Labour Government?

Mr. Edwards: That is true. That decline continued for many decades. We can be thankful that we have probably reached the end of that long historic process.

Mr. Ray Powell: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that since the end of the miners' strike, which the Prime Minister, MacGregor and others conspired to ensure took place, every colliery in Ogmore has been closed? Is the right hon. Gentleman further aware that 1,5[illegible] of the 6,000 people whose jobs were lost were living and working in Ogmore before the strike? What does the right hon. Gentleman intend to do to replace the jobs which he and his Government have ended during the past 18 months?

Mr. Edwards: There is no truth whatsoever in the allegation about a conspiracy. It has been denied by the Prime Minister's Office and by Mr. MacGregor. The hon. Gentleman knows that the allegation is nonsense.

Mr. Raffan: Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to congratulate the NCB on progress with the coal to oil liquefaction plant at Point of Ayr, on which construction has now started and which is expected to be completed by December 1987, providing 80 new jobs?

Mr. Edwards: That is part of the major investment programme which the NCB is undertaking in the Welsh coalfields. There has been substantial investment in the south Wales coalfield as well, much of it in new equipment at the faces. That holds out a much better prospect for the future.

Mr. Anderson: Does the review of regional development grant, to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, take account of the sudden avalanche of job losses in the colliery areas?

Mr. Edwards: Most of the colliery areas are substantially covered under the existing provisions, giving maximum levels of assistance. I do not believe that there would be any sense in having a major extension of coverage. That would be bound to cover a large part of the English and the Scottish regions as well. Instead of increased incentives to encourage people to come to Wales, there would probably be greater competition. An extension of coverage would not benefit Wales.

Agricultural Technology (Joint Degree)

5. Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will indicate when the Welsh Office and the Welsh Advisory Body will sanction the joint degree in agricultural technology, which has been initiated by University College, Aberystwyth, and the Welsh Agricultural College.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: A working group set up by the University Grants Committee and the public sector higher education advisory bodies has concluded that sufficient course capacity already exists to meet the industry's demands for graduates and diploma holders. However, the two colleges are now considering a suggestion that a new degree course could be established at Aberystwyth by transferring student places from the existing higher national diploma and degree courses.

Mr. Livsey: Will the Minister explain why this strictly Welsh matter was referred to the National Advisory Body? Is the hon. Gentleman aware that colleges such as Harper Adams and Seale Hayne in England have 100 HND students and 40 graduate students per course? Why is Wales losing out in that way? Can the hon. Gentleman assure us that sufficient resources will be made available to run the course as a viable one?

Mr. Roberts: The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that the working group's report related to the position in Great Britain as a whole. The demand for graduates in production agriculture and the capacity of existing degree courses in Wales to meet it are in line with the position in Great Britain. What is needed now is a change in the type of course available, and that possibility is now being examined.

Sir Peter Emery: Will my hon. Friend make certain that he does not begin poaching from Seal Hayne in the way that the Welsh Development Agency might be doing for jobs in the west country in other instances?

Mr. Roberts: I am sure that there will be no poaching or any hint of illegality. The hope is that student places can be transferred from existing higher national diploma and degree courses to provide this new course.

Welsh Water Authority

6. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he had with the chairman of the Welsh water authority prior to his statement to the House on privatisation; and on what date they took place.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I met the chairman of the Welsh water authority on 25 June 1985 to discuss the authority's response to the Government's consultation paper on privatisation. I also spoke to the chairman on the morning of 5 February to inform him that I would be making a statement on privatisation that afternoon.

Mr. Powell: On Friday 5 February, how far did the right hon. Gentleman screw the chairman's arm around his back to get him to agree to the idea that we should have privatisation of the water industry, because for months before—indeed, in all probability during the whole of 1985—John Elfed Jones had publicly declared, together with the board, that he was against any sort of privatisation? I should like an inquiry into what happened with the Secretary of State and what pressure was put on the chairman of the Welsh water authority to obtain his agreement.

Mr. Edwards: The thought of trying to twist someone's arm over the telephone is interesting. if anyone imagines that John Elfed Jones is the sort of man to have his arm twisted, he clearly does not know the man. He is well able to stick up for himself and to express his own views. He and the board will be considering the proposals put forward in detail and will be presenting their fully considered views to the Government in due course.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Has my right hon. Friend been asked to convey any apology to the chief executive of the Welsh water authority for what must have been, at best, a sincere misunderstanding by the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd)?

Mr. Edwards: I have no desire to act as a postbox between the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) and the chief executive of the Welsh water authority. I am sure that they are able to conduct their exchanges directly and on their own.

Dr. Marek: Is the Secretary of State aware of the quality of water that is being drunk by residents in the Wrexham area? Is he further aware——

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is another question on the Order Paper about that.

Dr. Marek: I was thinking that it might not be reached. It fits in with the present question.

Is the Secretary of State aware that there was a fire this morning, that some very toxic chemicals leaked into the soil, and that the Welsh water authority was able to say only that it probably will not reach the River Dee? What will the Secretary of State do, consequent upon privatisation, to ensure, if it happens, that any subsequent company will have sufficient capital to undertake a new water supply to the people of Wrexham?

Mr. Edwards: It is quite clear that none of the evils described by the hon. Gentleman could arise from privatisation. If the water authority is privatised, it will operate under a licence from the new Director General of Water Services, who will lay down strict conditions under which the service will operate. Undoubtedly one of the advantages of privatisation is that it will be easier for the authority to carry out its capital programme without the day-to-day and year-to-year interference from the Treasury and Ministers which is inherent in the present system.

Mr. Best: Is it not apparent to anybody who takes the trouble to read the White Paper that two things flow from the privatisation proposals: first, that the money would be raised from the private sector so that capital investment could be undertaken without the present great charges to many subscribers; secondly, that there would be much greater pricing protection and protection of the water consumer in the proposals than is presently enjoyed?

Mr. Edwards: I am sure that sewage will continue to flow as well. However, my hon. Friend is right.

Mr. Rowlands: Is it not a fact that the only way that privatisation of the Welsh water authority can be carried out is if the Government and the Secretary of State wipe off the vast majority of its debt? Instead of doing that for the benefit of future shareholders, why does the right hon. Gentleman not do it now for the benefit of the overwhelming majority of Welsh water consumers?

Mr. Edwards: We have made it clear that we shall be looking at the financial structure of the authority before privatisation. Surely the hon. Gentleman cannot object to any reconstruction of the debt position, because it is something for which Welsh Members have long pressed. In particular, it helps the authority to raise its capital more easily and carry out its programmes more satisfactorily, which is directly to the benefit of consumers.

Mr. Wigley: May I press the Secretary of State further on this point? If, in order to make privatisation viable, it is necessary to write off £450 million of historic debt, why does the right hon. Gentleman not do it now and give even more benefit to consumers?

Mr. Edwards: We shall look at the capital structure when we privatise and consider what is necessary for a sensible structure, but it is not the capital structure that controls the external financing limits—the borrowing—of the water authority. They are laid down by the Treasury, because of the need to control the totality of Government expenditure. That is the principal constraint on the capital programme at present — not the debt position of the water authority.

Sir Raymond Gower: Is it not a fact that prior to the big nationalisation programme of 20 or 30 years ago, many utilities in the private sector—gas, water, electricity and so on — had a splendid record of service to the community, and is it not likely that that will be reproduced in future?

Mr. Edwards: I think I am right in saying that one quarter of the water in England and Wales is presently supplied by private companies. Therefore, the idea that it is not possible to supply it efficiently and economically is disproved by existing facts.

Mr. Barry Jones: Does the right hon. Gentleman know that the director of the School of Water Sciences at Cranfield has predicted that when the details of privatisation are considered they will look impractical? Even at this late stage, will he strive to exempt Wales from the water privatisation proposals? Does he understand that the proposals have offended public opinion in Wales because they put profit before public service?

Mr. Edwards: No doubt we shall have many predictions. I predict that privatisation can go ahead and will result in an improvement in the service and the charging structure for the users of the Welsh water authority's services.

Singleton Hospital, Swansea

7. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales when the planned new paediatric and obstetric unit at Singleton hospital, Swansea will be completed.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Mark Robinson): Construction is expected to start in December 1987 and the unit is expected to be in service in 1991.

Mr. Wardell: Is the Minister aware that on 12 December 1983, in an oral reply, I was told that the West Glamorgan health authority was planning to open that unit in 1988-89? For how long must the Welsh Office endure health authorities pulling the wool over its eyes and over the eyes of the public at large? In view of the answer that I received earlier, it appears that the unit will be delayed by at least another two years. I hope that the shambles with the casualty unit at Singleton is not repeated in connection with the paediatric and obstetric units there.

Mr. Robinson: The date previously given was the best estimate for completion at that time and was based on preliminary planning only. More detailed planning for the development, which involves considerable reorganisation and expansion of existing support services and departments, has identified a need to reprogramme a sequence of building operations to enable replacement accommodation to be built to free the site location for the new paediatric and obstetric block.

Mr. Williams: Will the Minister recognise that there will be genuine regret in that part of Wales about the two-year slippage that he has just announced? Will he bear in mind that we are grateful for the fact that the announcement that the casualty unit is about to be opened has been made? The Opposition would like to put on record our thanks to the general practitioners and the consultants who made that possible. Will the Minister say whether he has made it clear to the West Glamorgan health authority that, while the unit can start on a part-time basis, he hopes that it will soon be on a 24-hour basis?

Mr. Robinson: I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will concede that it is important to get the building of the new unit right. With regard to the casualty service, on Friday we received the formal proposal from the health authority and we are considering that. I assure the right hon. Gentleman that our reply will be issued in the very near future.

Sheltered Housing

8. Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the effect on sheltered housing in Wales of the Housing Act 1980 as amended by the Housing and Building Control Act 1984.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The effect of the Housing Act 1980, as amended by the Housing and Building Control Act 1984, is to exclude sheltered housing from the right-to-buy provisions. These provisions are consolidated in the Housing Act 1985, which comes into effect on 1 April.

Mr. Raffan: Is my hon. Friend aware that Delyn borough council has a particular concern in this matter, which is highlighted by the case of 3 St. Mary's Drive, Northop Hall? What assurance can he give the council that its sheltered housing stock will not be eroded under the amended right-to-buy provisions should it replace resident wardens by visiting wardens on schemes where there is no common room nearby?

Mr. Robinson: My hon. Friend wrote to me on 10 February and I replied to him on 28 February. We do not consider that there will be any erosion of sheltered accommodation under these provisions, as the purpose of the provisions was to remove the accommodation that had been adapted for the elderly or disabled several years ago and which is no longer suitable using today's criteria.

Labour Statistics

9. Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the level of unemployment in both numerical and percentage terms in Merthyr Tydfil in 1979; what is the current percentage; and what are the similar figures for Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: On 6 February 1986 there were 11,279 unemployed claimants in the Merthyr and Rhymney travel-to-work area, a rate of 21·4 per cent. A comparable claimant-based figure for February 1979 is not available. For Wales as a whole, for the same dates, the seasonally adjusted claimant-based figures were 176,000 and 76,400, or 16·6 per cent. and 6·9 per cent. respectively.

Mr. Rowlands: In the face of those terrifying figures, should not the Secretary of State's complacency have been shattered by the past two month's unemployment records, and the trends that are accompanying them? Does he agree that we are not seeing the light at the end of any tunnel and that unemployment is rising? In addition to the genuine problems of the young unemployed, is the Secretary of State aware of the growing anxiety that hon. Members have witnessed over the 50-year-old unemployed, who now believe that they will never work again unless the Government change their direction and policy?

Mr. Edwards: Of course, I share the hon. Gentleman's concern that the recent, more encouraging, trend in unemployment figures has come to an end and that we have had two or three poor months. That is one reason why we are continuing to extend, enlarge and improve the wide range of employment and training measures generally, and those for the category of people to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

Mr. Foot: As the right hon. Gentleman has mentioned improvements in training measures, can he tell us whether he has sorted out the problem of the heavy extra burden which he and the Government are imposing on local authorities in carrying out the second part of the two-year programme? All of us want to assist the young through the YTS programme, but it is unfair that such a heavy, increased burden should be put on local authorities.

Mr. Edwards: The Government are providing substantial resources for this important new major extension of training provision. Local authorities are also playing their part, and I am glad that all Welsh local authorities, including Mid Glamorgan, which has had difficulties in the past, will participate fully in the next phase of the programme.

Mr. Barry Jones: The right hon. Gentleman has not told us how he proposes to make major inroads into the terrifying unemployment in Wales. Can he throw some light upon the firm Biomass International in my constituency? Does he know that £1·1 million of county council, Development Agency and Government money was on offer to create only 76 jobs on Deeside? Before Biomass International ceased activities, only nine jobs had been created. Has the Welsh Development Agency's £416,000 investment been lost? What moneys can be rescued? I remind the right hon. Gentleman that Biomass follows the problems with the Parrot Corporation. Does he plan to review investment policy in his Department?

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman identifies the great difficulty that all venture capital organisations, in the public and private sectors, have in always backing successful projects. If he wishes to encourage the support of the new high technology industries, especially in areas such as biotechnology, there will always be risks and failures. I hope that in developing the Labour party's general policies for investing vast sums of public money into such ventures and directing them centrally, he will realise that they are hazardous and risky choices. It is unlikely that public funds will be recovered in this case, except on a very small scale.

Job Creation

11. Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will state the number of new jobs created in Wales since 1979.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: In a period of rapid change, in which large investment has taken place in industrial and service sector projects in a more diversified economy, no comprehensive statistics on new jobs are available. Many new jobs are created without Government financial assistance, and between 1981 and 1984 the number of self-employed increased by 30,000.

Mr. Best: Bearing in mind the worthwhile meeting that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister had exactly a week ago with academics from the universities, does my right hon. Friend agree that we need a much closer empathy between education and industry, so that each understands the other?

Mr. Edwards: I was present at that meeting. In addition to representatives of the universities we met several leading representatives of British industry, who drew attention to many of the shortcomings of our education system, which is failing to provide the mathematicians and scientists who are needed. I agree that one conclusion that emerged from the meeting was that we must have closer links between industry and local schools, to persuade pupils that industry offers attractive careers, and to point them towards the skills that they will need to acquire.

Mrs. Clwyd: The Secretary of State cannot tell us how many new jobs have been created in Wales, but he must agree that not many of them were created in the Cynon Valley, which has the highest male unemployment in Wales, and among the worst male unemployment of any industrial area in Britain. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that substantial sums of Government money are necessary to create the infrastructure and employment opportunities that are needed in the valleys of south Wales?

Mr. Edwards: I do not doubt the problems of the Cynon Valley. However, the hon. Lady will agree that the recent completion of the Cardiff to Merthyr road provides greatly improved access to the Cynon Valley, which will improve its inhabitants' chances, and which is part of the substantial infrastructure expenditure in the area, which we shall continue to make. The hon. Lady should remember that, although there are serious problems, between April 1985 and January of this year—the latest period for which figures are available—at least 200,000 people have taken up employment in Wales. Although many people—too many—are on the unemployment register, many more are going into new employment all the time.

Mr. Geraint Howells: The Secretary of State will be aware that the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) is keen to find out how many new jobs have been created since 1979. The majority of Opposition Members would be glad to know how many jobs have been lost in Wales since 1979.

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Member has frequently tabled questions on that subject and we have answered them. In a changing industrial world, even he must understand that there will be many job losses and job gains. I am sure he will be glad to know that we have a higher proportion of the working population in employment than almost any other country in Europe, with the exception of Denmark.

Mr. D. E. Thomas: Will the Secretary of State accept that the Government of which he is a member have tinkered with the base on which the officially registered unemployment figures are calculated at least 15 times since the Government took office in 1979? One day, will the Secretary of State come to the House and give us the number of jobs lost in Wales since that date?

Mr. Edwards: If the hon. Member tables a question I shall do so, but it does not arise from this question.

Mr. Barry Jones: I can help the right hon. Gentleman. Since 1979,, under his regime, Wales has lost 105,000 manufacturing jobs. We have heard nothing from him in six years as to how we shall regain those lost manufacturing jobs. It is about time he came to the House and told us that he has a plan to bring Wales back to work. May I remind him that in Anglesey one in four men are jobless. What will he do to help north-west Wales?

Mr. Edwards: There are few developed countries in the world where there has not been a loss of jobs in manufacturing. We are witnessing a major change in the pattern of employment. There are far more jobs in the service sector, and far more self-employed, than before. A large number of new small firms are being created continuously.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Museums and Galleries, Merseyside

25. Mr. Alton asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster with whom he consulted before appointing the trustees of the national musuems and galleries on Merseyside under paragraph 3(2) of the schedule to the Merseyside Museums and Galleries Order 1986 (S.I., 1986, No. 226).

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Norman Tebbit): The appointments were made upon the recommendation of my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts, who will assume full responsibility for the Merseyside museums and galleries after the forthcoming transfer of functions order is made.

Mr. Alton: I can understand the Chancellor's reticence about assuming responsibility for the arts on Merseyside. Will the right hon. Gentleman say why, under section 46 of the Local Government Act 1985, the order was laid before Parliament setting up the trust before consultation with other political parties and indeed with Parliament itself? What was the particular hurry in proceeding with the appointment of the Duke of Westminster, whose previous affinities with the arts on Merseyside are not especially well known?

Mr. Tebbit: The hon. Gentleman chooses one appointment — that of the Duke of Westminster. If I recollect rightly, 13 appointments were made. The appointments make up a group of good, well-balanced people who have had a long interest in Merseyside and in the arts. I think that the hon. Gentleman should be very pleased about that and should stop trying to introduce political factors.

Mr. Frank Field: Will the Chancellor accept that not all those living on Merseyside share the views that have just been expressed? Many of us are extremely pleased that the Government have established most of the museums on Merseyside as national museums.

Mr. Tebbit: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for what he has said. I must confess to the House that those actions were taken primarily on the recommendations of my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts, and I am sure that he heard the hon. Gentleman's words.

The Arts

27. Mr. Freud asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what functions he exercises in relation to the arts.

Mr. Tebbit: When the then Minister for the Arts was appointed to the office of Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in 1984, his arts functions were formally vested in that office by virtue of the Transfer of Functions (Arts, Libraries and National Heritage) Order 1984 (No. 1814). They will be the subject of a further transfer of functions order shortly, since my right hon. Friend the present Minister for the Arts does not hold the office of Chancellor. Meanwhile, my right hon. Friend exercises all day-to-day arts functions on my behalf.

Mr. Freud: Will the Chancellor tell the House why it has taken from September of last year until now to effect a transfer of functions order? As the right hon. Gentleman is travelling and down the country talking about the incompetence of the arts, will he accept the Government's appalling incompetence in allowing this to go on for so long? Is there not an overwhelming reason for having a Minister for the Arts instead of this nonsense of incompetence in which different people have different responsibilities?

Mr. Tebbit: I do not accept a word of what the hon. Gentleman has said. The arts function will formally be passed back to the Lord President of the Council, to whose Department the present Minister for the Arts is technically attached. That was the case between the summer of 1983 and late 1984, before my noble Friend Lord Gowrie was appointed Chancellor of the Duchy. [Interruption.] If the hon. Gentleman would just listen for a moment, he would get the answer. The transfer of functions order will be made shortly. It has taken longer than usual because of a study of possible alternative ways of legally vesting the arts functions without requiring an order every time the ministerial portfolio changes hands. Meanwhile, my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts has full authority to conduct the day-to-day arts business, while the ultimate legal power rests with the Chancellor of the Duchy. There are no legal or administrative problems whatsoever about this.

Mr. Buchan: But there may be many artistic problems, and it does not give the Opposition much comfort to know that the right hon. Gentleman is in charge of the arts. Does he not think it is time that he gave some consideration to the all-party Select Committee report, which simply said that there should be a Ministry for the Arts, Communication and Tourism, which would bring in films, broadcasting and the arts, and above all strip the responsibility from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and make a proper Ministry for the arts?

Mr. Tebbit: I notice that the hon. Gentleman's party did not take that view when it was in office, and this Government do not take that view now. I do not think that these problems are best dealt with by permanent restructuring of the Departments in Whitehall. The arrangement is working very well and effectively today, and that is the best way to leave it.

Ministerial Duties

28. Mr. Winnick asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what proportion of his time in the week beginning 24 February he has spent on matters relating to the Duchy of Lancaster.

Mr. Tebbit: It is my practice to devote such time as is necessary to carry out my responsibilities as Chancellor fully and effectively. In the week beginning 24 February, I estimate that some three hours were required for this.

Mr. Winnick: Would not some of the right hon. Gentleman's Cabinet colleagues, such as the Home Secretary and the Leader of the House, prefer him to spend much more time looking after the affairs of the Duchy of Lancaster? Is it altogether a coincidence that since the right hon. Gentleman became chairman the Conservative party has gone even further down the polls? Does he connect that in any way with his taking over the job?

Mr. Tebbit: I do not answer in this House for my responsibilities as chairman of the Conservative party, and most certainly I would not abuse my post as Chancellor of the Duchy by doing so. I was very glad to note that on Saturday my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary was in vigorous and raucous form, busily scragging the Opposition.

Mr. Ryman: With his intimate knowledge of the Prime Minister and what, if anything, she is thinking, will the Minister say whether it is true that Mr. MacGregor is going to Downing street tomorrow——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That was a good try, but I doubt whether it has very much to do with the Duchy of Lancaster.

Mr. Ryman: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Minister has answered the question about how much time he spends on these duties, the inference being that he has other time for other duties. I wish to ask him whether he can confirm or deny that Mr. MacGregor is seeking to shorten his term of office——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The point is that that has nothing to do with the Duchy of Lancaster.

Mr. Skinner: Does the Minister recall that his predecessor could not manage on £33,000 a year in that job and went to other fields to feather his nest? The right hon. Gentleman has just said that he does about three hours work for this £33,000. It is not a bad number, is it? He gets £33,000 for three hours' work, yet last week one of his playmates on the Government Front Bench came here and said that they would give single pensioners an extra 40p in the coldest February for 40 years—just enough to buy a mustard plaster.

Mr. Tebbit: If the hon. Gentleman was right about my salary, he might conceivably have some sort of point. I am not paid as the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster from public funds. I do not receive a salary as a Cabinet Minister from public funds. I do receive a nominal salary as Chancellor of the Duchy from the Duchy itself.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Sunday Trading

29. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, what response the Church Commissioners have received from those retail companies of which they are shareholders regarding the proposed deregulation of Sunday trading.

Sir William van Straubenzee (Second Church Estates Commissioner, Representing Church Commissioners: Of the responses received so far, the majority have indicated in varying degree that they are not in favour of Sunday trading, although many say they may well feel compelled to open if their competitors do.

Mr. Bruinvels: In view of the General Synod voting 427 to six against Sunday trading, I warmly welcome my hon. Friend's answer. Is he aware that the cathedral bookshops at Canterbury and Guildford have now closed and are awaiting the debate on Sunday trading? Will my hon. Friend impress on shop chains in which the Commissioners hold shares that they should close on Sunday, to ensure that Sunday is a day for recreation, religion and leisure?

Sir William van Straubenzee: The Church Commissioners would expect any institutions in which they hold shares to obey the law. Perhaps I might add that the nearest biblical analogy that I can find for the Government's present stance on this issue, if they insist on persevering, is that of the Gadarene swine.

Mr. Frank Field: When we next ask questions on this subject, may we ask the Second Estates Commissioner to draw attention to the Prime Minister's post? She has received only 100 letters in support of her proposal, and 37,000 against.

Sir William van Straubenzee: I shall bear that suggestion in mind. The interesting experience of many hon. Members on both sides of the House, and with differing views of the legislation, concerns the number of people who express their anxiety when they have no religious observance whatever.

THE ARTS

Arts Council (Funding)

32. Mr. Murphy asked the Minister for the Arts if he will make a statement on the implications for the arts of the increase of Government funding for the Arts Council since 1979.

The Minister for the Arts (Mr. Richard Luce): Arts Council funding from 1979-80 to 1986-87 has been increased by 32 per cent. in real terms, including the extra abolition money, and by 7 per cent. in real terms excluding it.

Mr. Murphy: Does my right hon. Friend agree that a 7 per cent. increase in real terms, with a 10 per cent. increase in real terms in overall arts funding and £20 million-plus from business sponsorship, means that there are excellent implications for the arts?

Mr. Luce: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. The picture that is painted by some of gloom, doom and despondency in the arts world, is the very contrary of the fact. The Government have increased the amount of resources for the arts in real terms.

Mr. Tony Banks: It is not a matter of gloom and doom. Is the Minister aware that since 1982-83, excluding abolition money—which we must, as it is an inadequate substitute for the money previously put into the arts by metropolitan county councils and the GLC—the real increase in the arts funding by the Government is less than 1 per cent.? That figure was produced by the House of Commons Library. Does the Minister not feel that it is an obscenity in terms of values for the Government to spend £18 billion on defence and only £136 million on the arts?

Mr. Luce: The hon. Gentleman abuses the English language by suggesting that it is an obscenity when we have increased overall resources available for the arts. He should bear in mind that local authorities give a great deal of support to the arts. The diversity and plurality of funding is the very strength of arts in the long term.

Mr. Jessel: How far does my right hon. Friend think the arts should rely on the Government rather than on local government? As for abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan county councils, does my right hon. Friend agree that the 32 London boroughs and other successor authorities could do rather more than they have so far shown signs of doing?

Mr. Luce: My hon. Friend is right. We have to remember that the Government have switched £43 million from local government funding to Government funding. As a result, we are relieving local authorities of the overall burden. On Merseyside, for example, we are merely asking successor authorities to fund 10 per cent. of what is being precepted from them under present policies.

Mr. Buchan: We are in the classic situation of asking why, if things are so good, they are so bloody awful? Theatres, music halls, concert halls and arts centres throughout Britain are desperately anxious about the fall in the amount of money that they receive. Does the Minister agree that since the Government came to office arts funding has collapsed in real terms? Does he agree also that local authorities are being cut and capped, if not abolished, and that it is a cruel and obscene joke to suggest that they can match the proper funding given earlier?

Mr. Luce: The hon. Gentleman is painting a wholly false picture. The West End commercial theatres are doing exceedingly well and their attendances are increasing. The hon. Gentleman should not assume that everything should be done by the state. He should welcome the fact that one of the major ways of finding a solution to the problems of the Empire theatre in Liverpool, for example, has been through the private sector, not the ratepayers. Both the private and public sectors should work in partnership in the arts world, and that is what we are seeking.

Local Government Reform (Theatres and Concert Halls)

33. Mr. Alton asked the Minister for the Arts what recent representations he has received from those theatres and concert halls threatened with closure as a result of the abolition of the metropolitan authorities.

Mr. Luce: I have received a number of representations about some of those theatres and concert halls, and I have discussed their concerns with the Arts Council. As the House will know, good progress is being made on a number of issues, including Sadler's Wells, the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic and the Liverpool Empire.

Mr. Alton: Notwithstanding that reply, may I ask whether the Minister is aware that the director of the Merseyside Arts Association, Mr. Peter Booth, is reported as having said last Friday that he is fed up with hearing that everything is safe, that the crisis is still a deep one, and that some £600,000 will be required to save the philharmonic, the Everyman, the Playhouse and 30 other smaller art groups on Merseyside? What hope is there of that £600,000 being found? What co-operation is the Minister receiving from the five district councils on Merseyside?

Mr. Luce: The Arts Council, under the chairmanship of Sir William Rees-Mogg, is doing an excellent job in trying to solve all these problems in turn. On Merseyside, the local authorities are being asked to take a small burden. I emphasise that it is small, because I know that the hon. Gentleman is deeply worried about the continuity of the arts on Merseyside. The local authorities are being asked to pay only 10 per cent. of what they are being precepted until 1 April. The whole burden of supporting museums and galleries is being assumed by central Government on behalf of taxpayers. That is a genuine demonstration of the Government's anxiety to ensure that we play our part. We now look to the local authorities to pay their share of the matter.

Mr. Hanley: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, following the abolition of the Greater London council and metropolitan county councils, such halls and theatres will have to survive because of the plural funding, which he mentioned earlier, from local authorities, the Arts Council, business sponsorship and one group that has so far not been mentioned—the public, who attend such shows? Does my right hon. Friend further believe that some sensible taxation reforms may help to encourage more people to donate money to their local theatres and concert halls?

Mr. Luce: My hon. Friend is right about the paying public being important. Indeed, at present they are the largest supporters and funders of the arts—way beyond any other source of funding. The Government have already made some tax concessions to encourage people to give to the arts, and we are concerned to ensure that everything possible is being done to improve on that.

Mr. Wareing: Does the Minister realise that, despite being within one month of the abolition of Merseyside county council, many arts facilities on Merseyside still do not know whether they will be open or closed after 1 April? Is he aware that Liverpool city council, which is short of resources and is being rate-capped, cannot finance all those services? He has had correspondence over the Croxteth hall and community park, for example. Is he about to respond to my request that he visits the area and sees the people concerned with that hall and park?

Mr. Luce: The hon. Gentleman is not quite with it. As I said in Friday's debate, I have already visited Merseyside and seen a large cross-section of the arts. On the question of funding, which is important for the continuity of the arts, Arts Council clients which are not affected by the abolition of the metropolitan county councils have been informed of their allocation for 1986-87, and those affected by abolition are being given interim assurances that their Arts Council funding will be no less than at present. Their final figures will depend on the outcome of negotiations with local authorities. It is now up to local authorities to show that they wish to play their part in the partnership.

Mr. Michael Marshall: Will there not be a genuine problem if the various local authorities taking over responsibilities for such things as health, safety, fire precautions, and so on, make differing interpretations of their duties, which could affect, for example, the activities of touring companies? Will my right hon. Friend keep an eye on this and help to bring a balanced and reasonable approach across the board wherever he can?

Mr. Luce: Although I have been somewhat critical of some local authorities, principally Merseyside and Islington, in the large bulk of the cases, including Tyne and Wear, Manchester and South Yorkshire, local authorities have been co-operating extremely well with the Arts Council in negotiations to deal with abolition problems. They have set a good lead and we look to other local authorities to follow their good example.

Disabled People (Attenborough Report)

34. Mr. Wigley asked the Minister for the Arts what progress has been made by the Government in implementing recommendations of the Attenborough report on arts for disabled people.

Mr. Luce: Good progress has been made. The Arts Council published a "Code of Practice on Arts and Disability" on 6 December 1985. The public libraries, museums and galleries have for many years made special efforts, within the resources available, to facilitate visits by disabled people. I shall continue to take a close interest.

Mr. Wigley: Is the Minister aware that that is a very disappointing answer, in that there were a series of specific proposals in the report, most of which have not yet been taken up? Has he had any discussions with the Chancellor of the Exchequer with a view to implementing some of those suggestions in this year's Budget? Will funding for the proposals in the report come from the expenditure of his Department, or from that of other Departments?

Mr. Luce: If the hon. Gentleman is referring to the recommendations in the report about Government activity, I can tell him that I have already had a preliminary meeting with representatives of the Carnegie trust, which produced the report and the recommendations, and I have had meetings with my hon. Friend in the Department of Health and Social Security to discuss these matters. My problem is that I am clearly limited by available resources in doing much more, but I am giving every support to the work of the Arts Council in trying to ensure that the code of practice is implemented by arts organisations.

Mr. Buchan: We all welcome the report and that partial response to it, but the crucial question is to what extent there will be resources so that it can be implemented? Is the Minister aware that we shall give him full support in any argument that he has with the Treasury to achieve that purpose?

Mr. Luce: I note what the hon. Gentleman has said. In libraries, museums and galleries a good deal of progress has been made in providing access to the disabled. There is more of a problem with the performing arts, but a great deal of attention is being given to this sector.

Leyland Vehicles

3.33 pm

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the refusal of Her Majesty's Government to extend the deadline of 4 March and to provide proper information, so as to enable Lancashire Enterprises Ltd. and others to prepare properly costed bids for Leyland Vehicles as an alternative to a takeover by General Motors."

This matter is obviously specific. As to its importance, four days ago the Prime Minister told the House, in answer to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition:

"Those who are interested in making genuine bids—the trade unions could have done the self-same thing—could have obtained the information from the Department of Trade and Industry or British Leyland."—[Official Report, 27 February 1986; Vol. 92, c. 1066.]:

On the Jimmy Young show last week, the Prime Minister said of those talking of alternative bids to General Motors that they should "put up or shut up".

Lancashire Enterprises Ltd., with the West Midlands enterprise board, has sought to do that—put up a bid. It is hoping to sponsor a federated management buy-out in which the major investment will be made by the finance institutions, with a stake from the enterprise boards and from the management and work force. Contrary to the pledge given by the Prime Minister four days ago, the request for information met with a point-blank refusal. Messrs Hill Samuel, on behalf of British Leyland and the Government, have refused to provide any information unless a series of onerous conditions are met. However, they have caught Lancashire Enterprises Ltd. in a catch 22 trap, for these conditions can be met only with the information which Hill Samuel is refusing to provide. In other words, the Government are creating conditions which make it impossible for any others but General Motors to get to the starting line. No prospectus has been provided.

As to the urgency, the deadline set by the Government expires tomorrow. It has taken General Motors at least nine months of work, and I understand that it has not yet formally submitted a bid. The National Carriers buy-out —greatly applauded by Conservative Members—of a size similar to that proposed for Land Rover took nine months to reach fruition. The Government's proposed time scale for counter-bids to that of General Motors for Leyland Vehicles is laughable. It makes a mockery of the Government's claim to be serious about alternative bids.

Yesterday, the former Conservative Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), suggested that Leyland Vehicles was to be sacrificed and sold off to General Motors as part of a private deal between the White House and Downing street. This Government's tactics in blocking other bids suggest that the right hon. Member is right. The deadline in this case can be extended only if there is an emergency debate today or tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the refusal of Her Majesty's Government to extend the deadline of 4 March and to provide proper information, so as to enable Lancashire Enterprises Ltd. and others to prepare properly costed bids for Leyland Vehicles as an alternative to a takeover by General Motors."

I have listened with care to what the hon. Member has said and I fully understand the case that he has made, but the only question that I have to decide is whether this matter should take precedence over the business set down for today or tomorrow. I regret that I do not find that the matter meets all the criteria laid down in the standing order. I therefore cannot submit his application to the House.

Mr. Stan Thorne (Preston): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No, I will take the other Standing Order No. 10 application first.

Nuclear Waste (Disposal)

3.37 pm

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): I also beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the anxieties, potential financial loss and planning blight caused by the announcement that Fulbeck airfield is a possible site for disposing of nuclear waste."

Last week, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment announced that Fulbeck airfield is to be one of four possible sites for disposing of nuclear waste. My constituents have greeted this announcement with a justifiable mixture of shock, disbelief, grave concern and total opposition.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I bet they have.

Mr. Hogg: They are sentiments that I wholly share.

As part of this application, I need to make it clear that my constituents and I will resolutely oppose this application unless and until four conditions are satisfied.

The first is that the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive must prove that this method of disposing of waste is the only proper way of disposing of that material. Secondly, it must be proved that Fulbeck is the only proper site. Thirdly, it must be established that the scheme is absolutely safe. Lastly, all financial damage must be fully compensated. My constituents and I do not believe that any, far less all, of these conditions will be satisfied. Unless and until they are, we are wholly opposed to what NIREX has in mind.

As to recent developments which justified this application, there is clear and pressing evidence that contracts for the sale of property will fall through as a consequence of this application and that severe financial loss will be suffered by my constituents.

It is against this background that I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the anxieties, potential financial loss and planning blight caused by the announcement that Fulbeck airfield is a possible site for disposing of nuclear waste."

I regret that I have to give the same answer to the hon. Member as I gave to the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw). I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion—[Interruption.] Order. I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10. I therefore cannot submit his application to the House.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will take the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Thorne) first.

Mr. Stan Thorne (Preston): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In reply to the application of my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) under Standing Order No. 10 you referred to the importance of tomorrow's business as one of the reasons why you felt obliged to reject the application. One item of tomorrow's business is the Salmon Bill——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Gentleman misheard. I said that the application did not meet all the criteria laid down in the Standing Order. That is a different matter.

Mr. Thorne rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman is challenging my decision, I am not interested.

Mr. Thorne: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The urgency of this matter in Lancashire——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a continuation of the application. I will take the point of order from the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours).

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Have your received notice, Mr. Speaker, from the Government Chief Whip that he intends to apply for a debate on nuclear waste tomorrow under Standing Order No. 10?

Mr. Speaker: If he had made an application, I would have heard it.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS &c.

Ordered,

That the draft Mental Health (Northern Ireland) Order 1986 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments &c.

That the draft Mental Health (Northern Ireland Consequential Amendments) Order 1986 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments &c.—[Mr. Durant.]

Wales

Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn. —[Mr. Durant.]

3.43 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): I intend to concentrate on a few subjects of special importance. Before turning to the central economic and industrial theme, I shall say something about agriculture, rates and the Health Service. At this delicate moment in the negotiations, I do not intend to speak about education, save to say that I hope that all the unions will now join in bringing this damaging disruption to an end by sitting down to talk about pay and conditions of service in the knowledge that the Government are prepared to make very substantial additional resources available to get a better paid teaching profession with extra pay for those with skill, responsibility and experience.

In agriculture, this has been another difficult year for Welsh farmers and the supporting industries. Fortunately, many in Wales were able to recover some of the harvest during the few fine weeks in September. Farming incomes have declined but not so severely as in other parts of the country. The Government made available £1 million weather aid to help the worst hit. Hill livestock compensatory allowances have been increased and part of the sheep premium for farmers in less favoured areas has been paid early.

Most milk producers have adjusted to the quota regime better than was expected a year ago. As a result of the outgoers' scheme, all small milk producers of up to 200,000 litres — that is, more than half the milk producers in Wales—were restored to their 1983 levels of production. We can now issue more quota producers whose development awards represented a high proportion of their total quota. These will now have at least 90 per cent. of the total quota that they would have had if there had been no cut. We shall end completely the 35 per cent. cut in development awards for all producers with quotas of up to 200,000 litres.

At recent meetings, the farmers' unions have emphasised the importance that they attach to maintaining support for beef in the price-fixing negotiations and opposing proposals by the European Commission that discriminate against British farmers. The Government share those objectives.

Over the years ahead we face fundamental changes in the pattern for agriculture. We shall need to make full use of a range of measures to achieve those changes and to give farmers the time that they need to adjust. Among the instruments are price restraint, quotas, quality control, income support, assistance with countryside and conservation measures and the encouragement of new crops.

I am surprised that, at a time when the National Farmers Union in Wales is pressing for much wider use of quotas, Liberal spokesmen have announced their total opposition to quota systems. I look forward to hearing their alternative policies.

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North) rose——

Mr. Edwards: Are they coming?

Mr. Howells: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman, but first of all he said that the Government had plans to introduce quotas; I am just wondering for what commodities.

Mr. Edwards: As I thought, we are not to hear the alternative policies. All I am saying is that quotas are one of the instruments that will continue to be needed. We shall clearly continue to need them for milk. The National Farmers Union in Wales, as the hon. Gentleman knows, is suggesting that they should be used for a wide range of commodities. I do not entirely share the views of the NFU on that issue, but the Liberal party has said that quotas should not be used as an instrument at all, and I find that surprising.

The rate support grant settlement for local government that I announced before Christmas was a good one for Wales. It provided for a 5 per cent. increase in current spending, which is more than the likely rate of inflation. Local authorities have complained of a reduction in grant, but this year we were proposing an increase to 67 per cent. Local authorities understood very well that the system was designed to discourage high spending and that authorities spending above the settlement figure would lose grant. I had undertaken that any grant unclaimed would come back to local authorities, but that the method of recycling would be decided only when we had a clearer indication of spending plans.

While the system undoubtedly had the effect of discouraging authorities from proposing even larger increases in spending—I am glad to say that on average they have been substantially less than in England—some have chosen to impose very high precept demands on ratepayers.

I make no apology for seeking to discourage high spending, or for trying to protect ratepayers from what the chairman of the Welsh Counties Committee at the meeting with me described as "horrendous rate increases". I agree with Mr. Arthur Harris of Dyfed that:

"vast endeavours must be made to reduce the burden on ratepayers".

Local councillors talk about the pressures on their services caused by high unemployment and the need to fund high pay settlements in the local authority sector, but private sector firms cannot pass on high wage settlements, or their rate bills, without losing business, and high rate burdens add to unemployment.

When representatives of the Welsh counties came to see me, asking for immediate recycling of grant, I believe that I was right to suggest that if I did so they should trim their expenditure as well. What shocked me was not that they refused to reduce by 2 per cent., or by 1 per cent. but that they said that it was impossible to make any economies or to reduce by a single penny. I was even more shocked when Dyfed's "vast endeavours" to help ratepayers led to a further increase in spending and precept, despite its receiving extra police grant.

Following that meeting with the Welsh Counties Committee I decided that I would give the maximum possible immediate relief to ratepayers through a recycling of RSG, on the clear understanding that it would be passed on, while maintaining pressure on the remaining counties to reconsider their expenditure plans. The decision of the Clwyd county council, both to reduce its precept by 10 per cent. and to make a £1·5 million reduction in expenditure, proved that this was the right approach, and it made nonsense of the argument that expenditure reductions were impossible.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): How much extra unemployment will result if the £1·5 million cut takes place, as opposed to appearing on paper?

Mr. Edwards: I have just said that, because industrial firms and businesses cannot pass on the demands to customers, with high-spending decisions fewer people will be employed in commerce and industry. So far from increasing unemployment, the cut will protect jobs which would otherwise have been lost.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Edwards: No, I have just given way and I want to get on. I know what will happen. The last time that I spoke from the Dispatch Box I was criticised for giving way too often and for making too long a speech. On this occasion, the proper thing is for me to allow everyone to speak, and I shall try not to take too many interventions.

I am glad that other counties have reduced their precept as well, and there are good reasons for thinking that the pressure of the system will lead to further reductions in expenditure during the year. Last year, Welsh local authorities undertook to exercise restraint if we removed the system of targets and penalties. Regrettably some of them have failed to do so; but I am quite clear about three things: first, that our system has and will continue to put pressure on local authorities to restrain expenditure, secondly, that I have been able to obtain direct reductions in the rate burden for the benefit of the ratepayers of Wales, and thirdly, that the case for our package of reform of the local government finance system has been further reinforced by these events.

Sir Raymond Gower (Vale of Glamorgan): South Glamorgan's proposed rate increase is the highest in Wales, and I should like to know whether my right hon. Friend has made a special appeal to it. There seems to be little difference between the circumstances of the Welsh counties, and certainly not one which would merit such an enormous increase.

Mr. Edwards: I agree with my hon. Friend. The leaders of the councils made it clear at our meeting that they were proposing increases in their spending programmes. As my hon. Friend the Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan) observed at Question Time, the system is such that, if the authorities continue to spend in this way, they will lost grant and low-spending authorities will benefit when we come to the further redistribution of grant withheld.

I have now given way three times, twice to Opposition Members and once to my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Sir R. Gower). I should like now to get on with my speech.

We are at the time of the year when health authorities are having to face the difficult decisions that they have to take about priorities. That will always be the situation because funds cannot be infinite, while demand is virtually unlimited. What the House and the public must understand is that health authorities are dealing with the problems and the priorities of an expanding service and changing needs, and that the allegations of widespread cuts are false.

The Government are providing record levels of financial resources for the National Health Service in Wales. We are carrying out one of the largest programmes of hospital building ever. Taking account of inflation, recurring revenue allocations to district health authorities have been increased by over 23 per cent. between 1978-79 and the financial year which is just ending. We have recently announced that, in total, a further £44 million in revenue provision will be made available to health authorities in Wales for the coming financial year, which represents a cash increase of more than 7 per cent. over the provision in 1985-86. Between 1979 and 1985, the number of staff concerned directly with patient care has increased by more than 12 per cent. allowing for the reduction in the standard working hours of nurses.

Among new services announced in 1985 was an eight-bed bone marrow transplant unit in Cardiff. In August I announced that high-resolution CT scanners would be provided at Morriston and Ysbyty Glan Clwyd, supported by five or six small to medium scanners at other locations. The third Welsh renal dialysis unit became fully operational at Morriston in 1985, while the two new subsidiary renal units at Bangor and Carmarthen both opened in the summer and are working well.

There is, of course, considerable concern about waiting lists, which have risen under this Government just as they did under the previous one. There is one difference between the situation then and now, and that is that already by 1984 we were treating 63,000, or 18 per cent., more in-patients than in 1979 and 51,000, or 12 per cent. more out-patients. These figures have continued to rise since. The acceleration in the number of patients treated and in the range of services has been far greater than under our predecessors: it is a remarkable achievement. Health authorities have been checking on their waiting lists and report that in many cases the numbers include double counting; but that is no consolation to the patients who are having to wait and we are undertaking a major exercise with health authorities to try to get on top of this long-standing problem.

Mr. Anderson: The right hon. Gentleman has boasted about an increase in the number of in-patients. How much of that increase is accounted for simply by demographic factors—the aging population—and how much is a real increase?

Mr. Edwards: Of course there is an aging population, but we have provided not only additional resources to deal with it but a wider range of new and improved services. It is a considerable achievement to have been able to extend the service in the way we have and to treat this large number of additional patients.

Dr. Roger Thomas (Carmarthen): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Edwards: I think that this must be the last time I shall give way, or I shall be accused of speaking for too long.

Dr. Thomas: How much has the fact that people are leaving Wales and seeking specialist treatment elsewhere contributed to reduced waiting lists in Wales?

Mr. Edwards: I fear that it has not contributed as much as perhaps it should have. Although we have greatly improved and extended the service, there will always be opportunities for some patients to go elsewhere. Indeed, in some specialist cases, it is right that they should do so. We must use all the available resources for health care in a particular district both within Wales and within the United Kingdom as a whole. I hope that authorities will look at that as one way of reducing health pressures in the short term.

I turn now to the economy. In the last year, the coal industry in south Wales has undergone a major change, hastened and made more severe by the miners' strike. Eleven of the heaviest loss-making pits have closed or merged. The number on colliery books is down to about 13,500 and the total work force to just under 16,000. The coal board has fulfilled its commitment of finding alternative jobs for all those who wanted to remain in the industry, while those who chose to leave have received generous redundancy terms.

While these closures have been taking place, the work force has responded very positively to good management and the result has been a dramatic increase in performance. Productivity has increased by 46 per cent. in eight months; and the coalfield, which had been losing £100 million or more a year, expects to break even in the March quarter. It is a remarkable achievement. It has enabled the board to announce since the beginning of the financial year investment of £80 million — the largest capital development programme in so short a time in the history of the coalfield. Much of this new investment has been directed into new coalface equipment. I am particularly pleased that the board has approved the investment of £30 million in a new anthracite project at Carway Fawr, thereby safeguarding 800 jobs. There are good grounds for thinking that we have now reached the end of a period of decline that has lasted for many decades in south Wales, and caused much hardship.

The 6,000 job losses in the coal industry, along with losses in a number of other industries including the closure of Courtaulds in north Wales and the loss of jobs at BP Llandarcy, have contributed to the distressingly high unemployment in Wales, now at a record level. I very much regret these closures and loss of jobs, and the impact that they have on local communities, but the process of industrial change is continuous. Whatever general economic policies are adopted, particular companies will cut back or go out of business.

Fortunately, there have been many positive developments. Two major steel projects have been completed on schedule—the £171 million hot strip mill project at Port Talbot and the £30 million Galvalume project at Shotton. Work is well advanced to provide Llanwern with the concast facility which will further improve its performance.

We continue to see a high level of industrial investment in Wales. During 1985, offers of regional selective assistance and new-style regional development grants totalled nearly £60 million, with the aim of creating 12,500 new jobs and safeguarding over 4,800 existing jobs.

During 1985, Wales continued its record of attracting around one fifth of all the inward investment to the United Kingdom with 25 new overseas projects and 23 expansion projects by existing overseas companies involving a combined capital investment of £143 million. In addition, United Kingdom firms from outside Wales decided to locate 20 new projects and one expansion project in Wales with a promise of nearly 2,750 jobs and over £14·5 million in capital investment. I am glad to say that only today it was announced that Nimbus records, the sole manufacturer of compact discs in the United Kingdom, has decided on a major expansion in Cwmbran which will lead to the creation of 275 jobs.

In 1985 the small firms centre dealt with over 17,000 applications, over 9,000 from individuals seeking to start up in business. The business improvement services scheme received over 900 applications in steel closure areas and made offers to over 550 small firms with a value of £2·8 million. The number of self-employed in Wales is rising fast. An example of what projects of this kind can lead to is the firm in the Rhondda, Valdons Ltd., which just three or four years ago was launched by two redundant workers and which now employs over 70 people, about 60 of whom are making plastic mouldings to the very high standards demanded by National Panasonic.

I am encouraged by the very wide range of projects started during the year. The list covers almost every industrial sector, including electronics, biotechnology, pharmaceuticals and aircraft, as well as high-volume consumer products such as video recorders and microwave ovens. I was particularly pleased by the decision of an outstandingly successful British high technology company, Renishaw, to establish a manufacturing plant in Cwmbran backed by high quality research and development, providing over 500 jobs; and by Warner Lambert's decision to consolidate its United Kingdom manufacturing operation at Pontypool which will provide 250. Similarly, Pirelli has announced a major new investment at its Aberdare factory, which will provide over 150 jobs. The further expansion of Amersham International at Cardiff will provide over 200, and a notable success was the safeguarding of over 500 jobs at Borg Warner after a long period of uncertainty.

Our success in attracting Japanese companies continues with the announcement during the year of projects by Brother Industries, the 10th Japanese company to come to Wales, and Sharp, which will lead to the creation of over 350 jobs at Wrexham. I was also particularly struck on a recent tour by the scale of the modernisation and expansion of the major factories of Hitachi, Sony and National Panasonic in south Wales, involving the creation of nearly 450 jobs. United Paper Mills, a Finnish company, began production two months ahead of schedule at its mill at Shotton in which it has invested well over £100 million to create over 250 jobs on the site as well as providing a major boost to the forestry industry.

The Welsh Development Agency, with its offshoots WINvest and WINtech, continues to play an important role in encouraging investment and preparing industrial sites. During 1985 the agency contributed 1·5 million sq ft to the total of more than 2 million sq ft of Government factory space that was allocated. The agency expects to spend about £11 million on land reclamation and environmental improvement in the current year and is, at this time, drawing up a further programme.

The Welsh Office, the agency and Mid Wales Development are working up further programmes to help job-creating business activity in the rural areas, and I hope to announce details within the next few weeks. I believe all Welsh Members will welcome the Government's decision to maintain the present system of tourist boards, and in particular to retain the Wales tourist board, which is doing much good work.

Despite all those encouraging developments — with continued growth in the economy and high investment — we have not been able to make any impact yet on total unemployment levels at a time when large numbers are joining the labour force and job losses continue to arise from changes in the industrial structure. Against that depressing background, the Government have reinforced their employment and training programmes.

The growth of the number of long-term unemployed is a particularly disturbing aspect of the situation. During the year, we have more than doubled the number of available places on the community programme, and I am pleased to say that the Manpower Services Commission is well on its way to meeting the June target of 20,500 filled places. Pilot schemes in Neath and Port Talbot aimed at getting the long-term unemployed into jobs or training are already showing encouraging signs. Fourteen thousand places are planned for the adult training programme in Wales in the coming year, representing a threefold increase since 1984-85. The revised training arrangements announced last year are developing well.

I have been particularly encouraged by the success over the last year of the enterprise allowance scheme, which provides a weekly allowance of £40 to unemployed people wishing to set up their own business. We shall have 5,192 places available in Wales this year, an increase of more than 1,000.

The two-year youth training scheme is being introduced from 1 April, and that major training programme will provide school leavers with high quality training and work experience. I am pleased that the problems in Mid Glamorgan have been overcome and the area manpower board has unanimously approved the plans.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): On the subject of the second year of the youth training scheme, the right hon. Gentleman talks of problems being overcome, but the Government are imposing a considerable increase in the amount that the local authorities have to pay. Will he not look at that afresh, particularly in the light of the meeting we had at the weekend, representing all the heads of the valley areas, which are all facing the same problems? The Government boast about what they are doing about training, when a considerable part of the burden is being put on the local authorities. Will the right hon. Gentleman look at the financing of that matter again?

Mr. Edwards: I take note of what the right hon. Gentleman says. As I said, we have allocated massive additional funds to start this training programme, which, regrettably, was not started when the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) had responsibility for such matters. We had to catch up with other countries and I am pleased with the progress that is being made to introduce better training for young people. [Interruption.] The Opposition do not like being reminded of their neglect of these matters in the past.

Mr. Foot rose——

Mr. Edwards: I will not give way again. I have just given way to the right hon. Gentleman.

I turn now to another package of measures which we have developed in our drive to tackle the problems of unemployment, urban dereliction and social hardship which are the consequences of industrial change. In addition to a major road programme — last week we went out to tender for the Conwy crossing, one of the largest road and bridge contracts ever undertaken in this country—during my time in the Welsh Office we have set in motion a dramatic and far-reaching transformation and reclamation of the urban areas of Wales that have been symbols of industrial decay for so large a part of this century. One instrument has been the urban programme. We have increased resources from £7·1 million in 1979-80 to £29 million in 1986-87. I am pleased that it has proved possible to approve 200 new schemes at a total cost of £14·4 million for 1986-87, which represents a 53 per cent. increase in the value of new schemes approved over 1985-86.

In addition to the urban programme allocations, nearly £10 million has been earmarked for urban development grant projects throughout Wales. Since we introduced the urban development grant scheme in 1982, it has proved to be a highly effective tool in bringing forward private sector projects which together have a total investment value of about £115 million. As well as many other benefits, those projects are expected to create nearly 4,000 permanent jobs as well as some 1,800 temporary jobs during the construction stages. By far the most significant project so far approved is the £42 million redevelopment of the Bute east dock area in Cardiff by Tarmac, which is now well under way.

We are now looking at what development opportunities might be created in the wider south Cardiff area if we were to construct a barrage across the harbour mouth, and we are awaiting the results of the feasibility studies. Already the proposal has stimulated widespread professional and business interest in the considerable development potential of south Cardiff.

What is being achieved in south Cardiff also points the way to what can be done elsewhere. It is with that in view that I am today launching a new initiative to improve the environment of the south Wales valleys.

The special problems of the valleys cannot be tackled in isolation. Just as business in the communities of the coastal plain and the valleys grew and prospered together, so the future of the valleys must be related clearly to the tremendous progress which is being made in modernising and diversifying the economy of the rest of south Wales. A key to achieving that lies in the improvement of communications. The new road between Cardiff and Merthyr and into the Cynon valley is complete. We are continuing to support major improvements to the A467 beyond the Rogerstone to Risca section and have supported the construction of the important new access roads into the Rhondda valley.

We have approved capital expenditure allocations to the major development programme that British Rail is undertaking, in partnership with the county councils, for the Cardiff valleys network. It involves the replacement of the existing rolling stock, together with new stations, and other major improvements to services and facilities. With other important road schemes planned to improve access to the valleys still further, this is the moment to launch a fresh initiative to help ensure that the valleys share in the regeneration of the rest of south Wales.

A great deal can be done to improve the valley environment. That is especially true of the town centres and the areas lending to them, where poorly maintained buildings and a damaged environment sell short the enormous attractions which the valleys have to offer. What we shall seek to do is to trigger a series of co-ordinated initiatives by the local authorities and private and voluntary organisations to improve those areas. I am not proposing Welsh Office solutions. Where communities have sound ideas and the willingness to back them, the Welsh Office will focus the many existing mechanisms of assistance and will also make available additional resources to reinforce them, and to promote the contribution that is necessary from the private sector.

I am making available initially in 1986-87, for that specific valley initiative, on top of the other Government funding, £2 million of special capital allocations for housing-related initiatives and £1 million from urban programme resources, quite apart from special capital allocation of £3 million for housing priority estates projects, much of which will go to the valleys, and which I shall refer to later. Inevitably the bulk of developments under that initiative will fall in later years and those planning those projects can work on the assumption that we shall want to reinforce successful schemes in the years ahead.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): I am not sure whether I heard the Secretary of State correctly. Did he say that £3 million is available for each of the 12 or so districts in south Wales, or is there £3 million for the whole of the south Wales valleys?

Mr. Edwards: I am saying that there is a substantial allocation of resources to local authorities under the housing schemes, to urban programme schemes, and to the work of the Welsh Development Agency and other agencies, all of which will be directed and concentrated. In addition, we are making available £3 million in the coming financial year for the initiative, and a large part of the £3 million of special capital allocation for housing priority estates projects will support the initiative.

I have set out my proposals in a statement, which I have already circulated to hon. Members and to organisations that we expect to be involved. We have shown in south Cardiff and in Swansea what can be achieved. The opportunity is there for the valleys as well. It will not surprise the House if I say that I do not always agree with the Bishop of Durham, but I felt that for once perhaps we shared a common approach when he spoke recently about the need for financial pump priming for community self-help. That is exactly what I am seeking to achieve.

Our drive to tackle housing dereliction has the same objectives. I have been able to increase local authority housing capital allocations for 1986-87. Within the total of over £141 million, special allocations of some £40 million have been made to encourage local authorities to concentrate on the renovation of both public and private housing stock. Taking into account the available spending from housing receipts, local authorities will be able to spend well over £140 million on the renovation of unsatisfactory housing in the coming year. In addition, I have increased net provision for the Housing Corporation by almost 15 per cent., to £44·7 million. A good deal of those resources will go into the valleys, and particularly into the programme of priority estates projects.

What can be done is already being demonstrated at Penrhys in the Rhondda and by the Afon project in Wrexham. The number of long-term unoccupied properties has already been greatly reduced, rent arrears have started to come down and vandalism is being brought under control. There is now a sense of commitment to make the estates places where people can live decent lives.

A new project in Bute Town, Cardiff got under way last October and is already making encouraging progress. We are now launching a further phase with new projects in Merthyr Tydfil, Pontypool and the Rhymney valley as well as in Barry. In total, special capital allocations of £3 million will be made for projects in 1986-87 and we are providing extra revenue support. Most important of all, we are making possible a much more sensitive style of management, which recognises the essential contribution which the people who live in the estates can make to improving them.

No doubt there will be a great deal to divide us in the debate this afternoon, but I hope that at least we can unite to make possible a real success of those important initiatives, and I seek the support of the House for them.

4.15 pm

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): My hon. Friend the Member for Carmarthen (Dr. Thomas) hopes to wind up for the Opposition, and to be able to pick up some of the many points raised by the Secretary of State, particularly about agriculture and health.

I should like to remind the Secretary of State that last month, in his own county, 1,000 people demonstrated in the county hall against cuts in the education service in the county of Dyfed and for higher rates.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to training in reply to an intervention by my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot). When the right hon. Gentleman was in opposition he used to say that training places were not proper jobs. Many of us remember the attacks that he used to make in that sphere. However, I want to give a positive welcome to his announcement about Nimbus Records—275 jobs in Cwmbran will be much welcomed.

The Secretary of State mentioned an opening at Shotton in my constituency. I can help the House by telling hon. Members that one of our evening papers has written:

"Welsh Secretary Nicholas Edwards certainly has a talent for bad publicity. He can drive into a bed of roses and come up smelling of—fertiliser.

BSC has invited him to open the new £30 million . . . line at Shotton in June but Alyn and Deeside councillors are to write to the Steel Corporation saying Mr. Edwards is not welcome on Deeside."

Rightly, the Secretary of State made the economy the central part of his speech. I agree with him on that. He also made important remarks about our valley communities. Before I take up the points that he made, I should like to make a plea to him to raise in Cabinet the need for extra help for old people in the present freezing weather in Wales. I remind him—the House should know—that our housing problems in Wales are arguably the worst in Britain. Elderly people in leaking, draughty homes, particularly in the south Wales coalfields, are at risk. I have in mind pensioners who are partly disabled through arthritic hips, and live in homes that can be reached only by climbing many steps.

Many pensioners are trapped in the coldest of homes. The chief housing officers in Wales say that the elderly live in some of the worst housing. What prospect is there of a special payment? The Secretary of State must fear, as I do, the manifestation of hypothermia in Wales. Despite our record of neighbourliness, there is no doubt that many of our fellow countrymen and women in Wales are at risk.

I should like to refer to tourism. For once, I can fully agree with the Secretary of State. His stand is right. He was right to stand up for the Wales tourist board. He would have been greatly criticised had he not. I very much appreciate the alacrity with which he moved to make sure that nobody got any idea that we were to lose our tourist board.

I advise the Government to exclude Wales from the unpopular Sunday trading legislation—the Shops Bill. The Secretary of State and the Cabinet to which he belongs have under-estimated the disquiet and opposition to it in Wales. For the archbishops of the Church in Wales and the Roman Catholic Church to agree, for the Free Churches, the Mothers' Union and the Salvation Army to agree, when all-party unease is expressed and when the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers agrees with these bodies, there is clearly considerable evidence of the unease about the Bill in Wales. At a recent press conference in Cardiff, the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Sir R. Gower) made a fine plea for second thoughts by the Cabinet about this important matter.

Mr. Anderson: Conservative hon. Members may be laughing now but, come the election, they may have a very different expression.

Hon. Members may like to know that I addressed a meeting in Cardiff four weeks ago where there was only one person in favour of the Government—and he was a Conservative councillor. I addressed another meeting in Swansea on Friday and again only one person at a large meeting was in favour of Government policy. Again, he was a Conservative councillor doing his inadequate best.

Mr. Jones: Even the South Wales chamber of trade came out against the Cabinet's proposals on the Shops Bill.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): I wonder whether my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) can recall the figures published by the Minister of State, Home Office relating to the number of letters he received for and against the Bill. I believe that the Minister received 310 letters in support of the Shops Bill and 37,000 against it.

Mr. Jones: All Opposition Members have found that their mail bags feature this issue strongly and emphatically. I urge the right hon. Gentleman to take the views of the House to Cabinet and at least exclude Wales from the Sunday trading legislation, even if he cannot have the Bill killed in its tracks.

The right hon. Gentleman wriggled somewhat over the issue of rates in his speech. I want to put it on record that since 1980-81 it has been estimated that almost £451 million in cash has been lost by local authorities in Wales in terms of rate support grant and penalties. I advise the right hon. Gentleman—and he knows virtually all the authorities and is on first name terms with them after seven years—to work with the local authorities. He should not take them on or attack them. By not taking that approach, the right hon. Gentleman was forced to make one of the most incredible U-turns in the history of Welsh Office Ministers. I quote from the Swansea Evening Post:

"Tory joy at £13 million U-turn."

The article continues:

"The Labour Leader of West Glamorgan County Council has been congratulated by his Tory counterpart for spearheading the successful campaign to secure an extra £13 million of Government money for Welsh county councils."

The Daily Post ran a large headline on 21 February. It read "Edwards gives in." There is no doubt that the Daily Post correspondent, Mr. David Rose, was correct when he reported:

"In an astonishing climbdown, the Government is to hand over an extra £13 million . . . But Mr. Edwards' announcement amounts to an embarrassing about-turn for the Government. Only four days ago he told the Welsh counties that they could only have the extra cash on condition that they reduce their overspending first."

What has happened is that, late in the day, the right hon. Gentleman has realised that the Government's policies, which have pushed up unemployment in a huge fashion since 1979, have left the local authorities desperately short of the financial resources to cope with the demands made on their services by the unemployed. I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman has become a kind of St. Paul on the way to Damascus.

The right hon. Gentleman raised an important matter regarding community investment in the valleys. Nothing is more important to us in the House than the future of the valley communities through to the end of the century. The concept of assisting the valleys is a good one and I welcome it. Any help for these beleaguered communities is most welcome. If the right hon. Gentleman can enhance the scheme with greater cash backing I would welcome it even more. However, can the right hon. Gentleman tell us how many jobs will be provided by the six schemes? Despite references to the high level of unemployment in the valley areas, there is no suggestion that the schemes will provide any new jobs. Indeed, the first four pages of the document are a eulogy to the policies that have helped to bring about industrial dereliction, mass unemployment and critical housing conditions in the valleys. Has investment in the coal industry really been substantial? Why does the south Wales coalfield have only one high-tech coalface compared with almost 50 in the rest of Great Britain?

When explaining the method of cash allocation, the right hon. Gentleman made it clear that initially there will be only six places and that the valley communities will be in competition with each other. What is the sense in that? Is it not true that the communities least able to mount an effective challenge for cash will be those with the least resources and most desperately in need of assistance? Is the Secretary of State initiating a programme which will merely lead to the survival of the fittest? What will happen to the communities which fail at the first hurdle? Will they receive no help?

The cash allocation for housing must be described as derisory. The £2 million cannot provide hope to undo the damage caused by the 25 per cent. cuts in housing budget made by the Government the year after the general election. The Chief Housing Officers Association suggested that billions of pounds in cash over 15 years is required in south Wales to avert a major housing crisis.

If the right hon. Gentleman would allow Welsh local authorities to use the many millions of pounds from housing sales, if he would free the receipts from these sales, the communities would have a better chance of correcting the amazing dereliction with which they have to cope.

To put the right hon. Gentleman's statement into context, I remind him that when steelmaking at Ebbw Vale was ended, the Labour Government pumped £25 million into the area and when steelmaking at Shotton was finished, the Department of Industry in 1980-81 put £12 million into that area. On that basis the right hon. Gentleman's initial offer in relation to the coalfield communities and valley communities is not enough.

Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether the housing associations will be able to take advantage of the scheme?

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Yes, indeed.

Mr. Jones: The right hon. Gentleman has said yes and I thank him for that information.

The Welsh Office has identified the problem but in some respects, given the amount of funding that it has announced, it has passed on the responsibility for dealing with the problem to the local authorities which have been starved of cash since 1979. The two pilot schemes outlined in the appendices are worthy enough. However, as an assault on unemployment, an attempt to attract new industry and as a means of reducing poverty and improving the quality of housing, the schemes are inadequate. I urge the right hon. Gentleman to consider the weakness of the schemes in terms of funding.

I would like the right hon. Gentleman to meet representatives from the Coalfields Community Campaign. He should explain his intentions to them and attend a meeting of the Heads of the Valleys standing conference and discuss the document. The right hon. Gentleman should call the coalfields county councils together and tell them how he views the way forward. He should discuss these plans at length with those whom he hopes will promote them in the years ahead.

If the right hon. Gentleman doubts what I am saying, I will give him an uncomfortable minute by reading the latest unemployment figures for the valley communities. Aberdare has male unemployment of 29·5 per cent.; Blaenau Gwent and Abergavenny have male unemployment of 25·7 per cent.; Cardiff has 21,966 people seeking work; Bridgend has male unemployment of 22 per cent.; Merthyr and Rhymney have male unemployment of 25·4 per cent.; Newport has male unemployment of 19·9 per cent.; Pontypool and Cwmbran have male unemployment of 19·5 per cent.; Pontypridd and Rhondda have male unemployment of 22·4 per cent.; and Swansea has male unemployment of 21·5 per cent. Those are horrendous figures.

The statistics can never adequately explain the humiliation, sadness, deprivation and poverty in the homes of unemployed men and women. The right hon. Gentleman's valley initiative is minuscule compared with the task that we shall have when we take office. As the general election nears, the right hon. Gentleman's language becomes softer. It is dawning upon him slowly that his proposals are insufficient for our people.

On the economy generally,

"we have blown North Sea Oil. We have sold the assets. We are a society too anxious to consume and an economy too reluctant to invest. There is a world of ownership and a world of managers and they don't meet. The whole psychology of the City is profoundly anti-industrial."

That was said by the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine). The Government have been successful——

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): Why is capital investment in Britain at an all-time high of £55 billion?

Mr. Jones: Why has Wales lost 105,000 manufacturing jobs since the right hon. Gentleman took office? Why is one in four men in Anglesey out of work? Why are 11,000 people in Gwynedd out of work? The hon. Gentleman cannot answer that. He should have remained in his seat. He knows that the Secretary of State is not delivering enough new jobs to Anglesey and the county of Gwynedd. I thank the hon. Gentleman for his timely intervention.

What will be the plight of the Welsh economy when the oil revenues cease? Wales has suffered more than the rest of the United Kingdom in the depression. I look to the Secretary of State to fight in Cabinet for a major change in policy and for a policy that will ensure an attack on the unacceptable unemployment in Wales. If he believes that he can delay that, I must tell him that Carmarthen town has lost 400 creamery jobs; Metal Box has decided that 800 jobs at Neath must go; we have lost 1,200 Courtaulds jobs at Flint and Wrexham, and in that area 14,000 people are jobless; 130 plastics jobs will be lost in Ruabon; and in the Swansea valley, Lucas is destroying 260 jobs. What plans does he have for pumping replacement jobs into the Severn tunnel, Margam and Llanelli following the British Rail job losses?

Why did the Secretary of State fail to halt the closure of the Islwyn and south Gwent skillcentre? Why did he not fight for it? He talks proudly of training investment. Why did he let the Llanellii and Islwyn skillcentres go to the wall?

I repeat that Gwynedd suffers from 23 per cent. male unemployment and 4,000 people in Holyhead are looking for work. For as long as the county of Clwyd is desperate for new jobs, Gwynedd has few prospects, because it is far to the north and to the west. I heard nothing today from the right hon. Gentleman about how he would help that county.

The Secretary of State glossed over our unemployment problems. Officially, in January, 190,000 people were on the register. This month, we hear that the figure is 188,000. It is fair to say that the true unemployment figure, making the generous allowance that half of those on special training will find employment, is probably 210,000. The trend is becoming worrying. The loss of more than 5,000 pit jobs in the south Wales coalfield in less than a year has caused much anxiety to the president of the south Wales NUM, Mr. Emlyn Williams, and to Mrs. Moira Sharkland, the chairperson of the Coalfield Community Campaign in south Wales. Both of them ask for more money for the activities of NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. The Opposition say that the money earmarked is insufficient for the post-closure tasks.

In response to the Secretary of State's initiative announced today, I ask him to make another. He should initiate an investigation of the state of disrepair in Wales' crumbling infrastructure. I remind him that the National Economic Development Council has called for an in-depth examination of infrastructure investment needs in the United Kingdom. The English regions are analysing and quantifying what needs to be done. The Confederation of British Industry has asked the right hon. Gentleman to invest heavily in infrastructure improvements. I have in mind the current state of housing, schools, colleges and hospitals in Wales. There is a major backlog of improvements in the operations of the Welsh water authority and there are many outstanding road improvement schemes. Such a national audit of the Welsh infrastructure would give us a gobal picture of the task that we face. If the right hon. Gentleman had had the benefit of such an audit and perhaps more funding, his announcement about the valleys might have meant that we could have worked constructively until the end of the century to right much that is wrong in the valleys and in the rest of Wales.

It is not widely known, but the conservative estimate is that the 190,000 unemployed people in Wales cost the taxpayer, at 1984-85 prices, more than £1 billion a year. According to the latest quarterly report of the Manpower Services Commission, about 77,000 men and women of all ages have been jobless in the Principality for more than a year. The right hon. Gentleman must tell us how to return them to work. How can we lessen the humiliation of the families of the long-term unemployed?

I hope that the Secretary of State will go to the Cabinet and insist at least on the proposals made by the Select Committee on Employment, which have received widespread commendation. The Financial Times said that they were "not outlandish" proposals, and they could become the basis of a fight back for jobs in Wales. I have tried to adopt those proposals to the Principality, and I hope that the Secretary of State will consider urgently what I propose: 17,500 jobs subsidised at £40 per week per job; 15,000 jobs, at a cost of £5,000 per job per year, centred on a long-term programme for urban rehabilitation, housebuilding, house renovation and local building projects; and 5,000 jobs at a cost of £4,000 per job per year on improvements to social services. The latter could provide helpers and carers for the elderly, especially in Arctic conditions such as we have now, and people to care for the disabled and those recently discharged from hospital. This would be centred largely in the Health Service and the local health authorities.

It is estimated that the entire programme would cost about £165 million, or £55 million a year for three years, and that it might remove 37,500 people from the dole queues. That is the least that the right hon. Gentleman should do. It is the bottom line. The Opposition are not aiming an ideological arrow at the right hon. Gentleman. The proposals come from an all-party Select Committee and are endorsed by the Financial Times. I hope that one of the Ministers will respond sincerely to that tonight.

Because there is a pressure on time I shall, like the Minister, keep my remarks to a reasonable length. We are critical of the Secretary of State not only for his past record but for the huge increase — 137 per cent. — in unemployment in the Principality. We are also critical of him and the Government because they have no strategy to help the unemployed.

Sir Raymond Gower (Vale of Glamorgan): There is a temptation on these occasions to be parochial and to sound constituency themes. There is also a temptation to be partisan. However, seldom has there been a greater need to be as objective as possible rather than subjective. We should seek to speak about the economic realities rather than political panaceas. It is quite natural for Members to adopt constituency matters which are so important to us all, but it would be inconsistent with our main objectives if we dwelt upon them.

It should be possible to view the problems of the Welsh economy in the context of the United Kingdom. We are witnessing general economic problems arising out of a deep-seated malaise of our industries, which have been declining for many decades. Coupled with this malaise is the somewhat different problem of unemployment—the two things are not always the same. Indeed, if we take steps which are designed to deal with the long-term economic malaise, the immediate effect may be some increase in unemployment, either short-term or long-term. Similarly, steps to counter unemployment — though helpful in the general economic context — can be damaging to long-term trends.

An increase in the activities of the building and construction industries would have an obvious advantage in dealing with unemployment levels. Whatever disadvantages there may be in increasing the activity of the industries, they are on the whole fairly labour-intensive and do not use a great number of imported products. Such an increase in activity would also benefit other industries. There would be an increased demand on the manufacturers of paints and materials, and furniture. Housebuilding and other forms of building would increase the activities of these industries and would, by definition, be likely to lead to an increase in their exports. In this case there would be a contribution to solving the long-term problem of inflation and to the prosperity of our economy.

To adequately reconcile attempts to deal with the deep-seated problems of our economy and at the same time with unemployment are matters of nice judgment on the part of the Chancellor and the Government. In the context of the type of unemployment referred to by the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones), there is a strong case for increasing the production of the construction industries above the levels which have been contemplated previously. This should be done not least in Wales. I hope that serious consideration will be given to this shortly by Ministers in general and by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in particular.

There are, of course, particular problems in Wales. I understand the views of those who continuously express the wish to restore the old basic industries of coal, iron and steel. It is possible to increase the efficiency of those industries and a good deal has been achieved, but it does not seem likely that we shall see a return to the former levels of production. What can any Government do to deal with these problems? What should be their main efforts?

I would suggest, somewhat differently from others, that the first consideration should be communications. There is a good deal of evidence that, more important than regional grants and any other help which the Government can give directly, industrial growth benefits more from good communications than any other single factor. Successive Governments have a reasonably good record in this connection.

One project which has been cited already is the completion of the M4 and the completion of the dual carriageway beyond the M4 to Dyfed. My hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) mentioned the north Wales coastal road. The Secretary of State also referred to the dual carriageway from Cardiff to Merthyr Tydfil. One might mention the dual carriageway from Newport to Ross-on-Wye and its connection by motorway to the industrial midlands. Some bypass schemes—which have not been mentioned in this debate — have been invaluable. I feel that more could and should be done.

While there is evidence that the motorway and dual carriageway schemes have progressed satisfactorily, other main roads are in need of attention and repair. I ask my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State what is the degree of his Department's inspection of the condition of those roads for which the county councils are largely responsible. Is there any system by which these roads are regularly inspected and the defects brought to the attention of the county councils?

There is also the problem of the Severn crossing. I have been encouraged by the steps which have been taken recently to effect certain considerable repairs, but I still believe that there is a need for a second crossing. I do not believe we shall be forgiven in Wales if, within the next year or two, we do not give a strong assurance on this issue. I have heard the view expressed frequently in Wales —it is wrong but quite understandable—that it would be ironic if we had a tunnel to France but an inadequate connection between England and Wales. This is a poor comparison, but I must tell my right hon. Friend that it is a view which is unfortunately held by many Welsh people. Much attention should be given to roads which are maintained by the county councils, and the permanent question of the Severn bridge.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): The hon. Gentleman cannot shift responsibility solely onto the counties. The current expenditure, the non-capital expenditure, comes out of the rate support grant. What constructive suggestions does he have to ensure that the county councils can repair the roads?

Sir Raymond Gower: We must first identify the need, and in some cases I believe that there is a need. That is why I have asked my right hon. Friend about the extent to which there is an adequate system of inspection to enable us to know what is needed, because we can then make suggestions along the lines that the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

The Cardiff Wales airport is another factor in communications. The steps that have already been taken are most invaluable and helpful, and should ensure the continued growth of the airport. The improvement of the runway enables that airport to handle much larger aircraft than most of its rivals, and that is laudable.

The second priority has already been mentioned. Wales wants a fair share of the newer, highly technical and modern industries to compensate for the real loss of jobs caused by the decline of the older industries. Here I disagree with the Labour party. It is not easy to attract into Wales the sort of industries that will provide the required number of jobs, because by definition these newer industries employ fewer people. They are much more highly technical and capitalised. In that sense, it is a formidable task to arrange for a sufficient number of such industries to come into Wales so that they provide the number of jobs that have declined in the labour-intensive industries. Labour Members are wrong to minimise the difficulties associated with that task.

Whatever Labour Members may think, I believe that my right hon. Friend and his Department have done an amazing job in their efforts to obtain new industry from abroad. The success of that has been evidenced by the number of new companies that have come to north and south Wales from Japan and other countries. In that regard, Wales has been more successful than any other part of the United Kingdom, and my right hon. Friend, his fellow Ministers and all who work in the Welsh Office deserve much praise.

Mr. Rogers: Only from the hon. Gentleman.

Sir Raymond Gower: Such a tribute is deserved. I do not believe that I am the only hon. Member who thinks that. I extend such praise to the Welsh Development Agency and its efforts to attract new factories and new jobs. I am not so convinced that it has yet been as successful in relation to the financial part of its remit—its role as merchant banker. That is much more difficult, and I hope that in future that part of its business will be as successful as the construction of new factories.

I too shall curtail my remarks, but I should like to mention the work of other authorities as well as that of the Welsh Development Agency and the industrial department of the Welsh Office. Work is also done by some local authorities and by organisations such as Cardiff and Vale Enterprises — which operates in south Glamorgan — as well as the Thomson International Organisation, which has done invaluable work at Neath and is now starting to do the same in my own constituency. Such efforts are to be admired.

But part of the remedy lies in the hands of our own people. We must not ask that all these things be done for us. There must be a determination throughout the Principality to assist in this major undertaking. I hope that there will be wholehearted party co-operation, irrespective of whether we are in government or opposition. This is a long-term job which will not be achieved in the lifetime of one or even two Parliaments. We shall need the co-operation of all.

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): I have taken part in a number of Welsh day debates since my election to Parliament, and I have had the privilege of representing my constituency for 12 years. I am delighted that in the Chamber today there are three other hon. Members who were elected on the same day as I was. There is the hon. Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Grist), the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), and the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas). I believe that we are the only four hon. Members from Wales elected in February 1974 who are still here. All of us have in our own ways tried to play our part for the Principality that we all love so much.

On each occasion, I have wished to have the opportunity to celebrate progress in the life and economy of Wales. Many of us celebrated St. David's day last weekend, but alas there was no joy. With each passing year it seems that the cause for celebration gets less and less. Indeed, when we look at the state of Wales today —with its ailing economy and mounting unemployment — any feeling of optimism fades away at the dismal prospect before us.

I believe that the Government's faith in market forces is entirely misplaced, and to adopt an attitude of laissez-faire, as they do, towards Welsh problems is thoroughly reprehensible and unforgivable. We need only look at the statistics published in the latest Department of Employment bulletin.

[Mr. Geraint Howells]

Three of the travel-to-work areas in my constituency have unemployment figures of 24·5 per cent., 26 per cent., and 27·6 per cent. respectively. I again make a plea that the top end of Pembrokeshire, Fishguard and part of Carmarthenshire should come under the jurisdiction of the Development Board for Rural Wales. That would be a step in the right direction. I hope that the Secretary of State and his colleagues will again look at the plight of that area.

The travel-to-work area of Aberystwyth, which is also in my constituency, has only 12·4 per cent. unemployment —a respectable figure by today's standards. But there the economy is underpinned by a thriving university college, several other educational institutions and research establishments — a sector that is increasingly coming under threat from the Tory Government's policies. It seems that this Government are entirely anti-education and anti-research—a fact that bodes ill for my constituency and for the whole of Wales.

It is extremely short-sighted of any Government to starve these centres of excellence of much-needed funds. That is the kind of investment that is absolutely necessary if we are to compete in any way with other nations in Europe and throughout the world. Will the Secretary of State scotch the rumour that one of the Welsh university colleges is to be closed?

How safe are the Trawscoed establishment, the Pwllpeiron experimental farm and the plant breeding station at Gogerddan?

I believe that unemployment in Wales, which is already well above tolerable levels, will, before the end of 1986, be at or near 200,000. That is ample proof, if any were needed, that, whatever the Government's claims, their theories and policies are just not working for Wales. Instead of investing money in improving the housing stock, renewing the infrastructure, giving us better roads and easier communications—which would in the long term provide a better environment for job creation——

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Nonsense. We all acknowledge that we have great difficulties and problems in Wales, but it does not help to throw out three wholly spurious scares, as the hon. Member has done. I have not heard the vaguest suggestion from anyone about the closure of the university college. He knows perfectly well, because he came with a delegation recently to see me, that very firm assurances have been given about the future of the Welsh plant breeding station. The hon. Gentleman should not invent things.

Mr. Howells: They are not spurious at all. These rumours have been floating in Wales and the Secretary of State knows it. There is no need for him to get excited. We know what has happened in Wales during the past few years, and more may happen. We are well aware that the Welsh plant breeding station has lost its status, but I hope that it will remain and be successful. After all is said and done, it has lost its status, and the Secretary of State knows it.

Dr. Marek: I completely agree with what the hon. Gentleman said about education in Wales. Everybody in Wales is aware of the enforced cuts in the Welsh plant breeding station and indeed the cut at the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service at Trawscoed. The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will charge farmers for its services. It is a dismal story. The Secretary of State jumped up to deny that the university college of Wales was to be closed. I wonder if he would jump up to deny that Cartrefle teacher training college is to be closed. I understand that it is to be closed. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Conservative Members are denying that. In that case, I would welcome the Secretary of State jumping up now to deny it.

Mr. Howells: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, but I am afraid that the Secretary of State has by now regretted jumping up and intervening so rapidly.

I doubt very much whether privatising the Welsh water authority will create any employment. Still less will it benefit the consumer or the Welsh economy, and conservation, safety and the general management of our rivers and lakes cannot but suffer. Why on earth give away part of our most valuable natural assets in the pursuit of irrelevant dogma?

While we are scaremongering, in the view of the Secretary of State for Wales, what about the Forestry Commission? Who started that scare last week? I have tabled a question to the Secretary of State for Wales. He dare not give me a reply. He referred me to the reply given by the Secretary of State for Scotland. I wonder what his private views are regarding the Forestry Commission in Wales. We may know later. He may jump to his feet now: who knows?

The Secretary of State is nominally responsible for agriculture. I trust that he will forgive me for emphasising, yet again, how important it is that he should represent Welsh farming interests in Brussels and endeavour to make out a special case for Welsh farmers. Many of us have pressed him to go to Brussels during the past seven years. If my memory serves me right, he went once—in 1979-80—to defend the sheepmeat regime. He has full responsibility for agriculture in Wales. The Welsh nation depends on agriculture. If only to show good will, the Secretary of State should go to Brussels to represent Welsh farmers and to give them more moral support.

Farm incomes throughout Britain have been eroded during the past few years—production costs have risen faster than farm prices. Agriculture in Wales has been especially hard hit. In some areas, farmers have still not recovered from the milk quotas, which affected whole communities with devastating suddenness a couple of years ago, ruining many lives. The Secretary of State said that the Liberals do not favour quotas. I have said that there was no need to introduce quotas when they were introduced. I am sure that the Secretary of State would like to turn the clock back and that he does not favour quotas. Nor do the dairy farmers of Pembrokeshire, Carmarthen or Cardiganshire.

We should examine our marketing system in the EC with a view to getting rid of the surpluses. No Welsh Office Minister has mentioned our doing away with the intervention system and improving marketing. A child could buy a bullock for £500, sell it into intervention, leave it there six months and then sell it to the Russians for £50. That is happening. I do not know whether it is the system that the Government advocate, but it is time for the Secretary of State to go to Brussels and tell them that we want to change the system.

Leaders in Brussels should also be told that we want to keep the variable beef premium. Welsh farmers, especially those who combine dairy and beef production, are worried about the EC threat to replace the premium with a new direct support scheme of headage payments for specialist beef producers. The premium, though not perfect, has been an important and stable influence in Welsh beef production. It has worked much more efficiently than any intervention system on the continent. The Farmers Union of Wales and the National Farmers Union have said that it is vital to retain the premium which store and fat cattle producers consider essential for survival now. We must not have a repeat of 1973-74 when the change in the system made the bottom drop out of the beef market, thus creating instability in the industry.

I remind the House once again that it was the Tory Government of 1973 who abolished the deficiency payments and a guaranteed price for beef in Wales. It was the Labour Government of 1974 who, with the backing of the Liberals and other minority parties, introduced the variable beef premium. I hope that the Secretary of State will do everything possible to ensure that the system continues during the next few years. Welsh agriculture has suffered enough traumas in the past couple of years to last a lifetime. I ask the Secretary of State to fight vigorously for Welsh farmers. Their welfare is vital to the rural economy in Wales.

I should like to quote a press release of the Farmers Union of Wales dated 28 February 1986:

"FUW President, Huw Hughes, told Pembroke farmers at Martletwy on Saturday (March 1) that despite the drop of 43 per cent. in farm incomes last year, Welsh farmers could expect no tangible help from this year's European price talks. He added that the UK Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Jopling, instead of safeguarding the interests of UK farmers, was taking the lead in cutting farm incomes still further."

I wonder whether the Secretary of State for Wales, who has full responsibility for farming in the Principality, shares his right hon. Friend's view that further cuts are needed in farm incomes in Wales during 1986-87. I am afraid that the inevitable will happen and the industry will suffer once again. Let us look forward to the day when a new party will be in government within the next two years, and let us hope that the people of Wales will have a Welsh Assembly within the next five years to look after their interests better than they have been looked after during the last seven years.

5.10 pm

Mr. Ian Grist (Cardiff, Central): The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howell) gave me a nice opening. I remember St. David's day in 1979 which heralded the Tory Government. It turned the key for us. That is a happy memory and I thank him for reminding me of it. If he continues to prescribe his policies for Wales, the Conservative party will remain in government, sure as eggs is eggs. He, the hon. Members for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas) and for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) and I—it is fortunate that the names have not changed too much—represented the first major break in the Labour stranglehold on Wales. Indeed, we continue to represent both urban and rural areas.

Those who came to Cardiff on Saturday, whether or not to go to the match, may have seen a steam railway engine proceeding down the street, accompanied by a band, to the Holiday Inn hotel. That is part of the spirit of Cardiff and part of the history of the area. The old and new together show a pride and confidence in the future. I have frequently pointed out the advantages of Cardiff, which is a shining example of how a city can be transformed with the invaluable help of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. Cardiff has never had such a good friend in Gwydyr house.

Cardiff is on the verge of being one of the most exciting cities in Europe. We have magnificent shopping facilities, the south Cardiff development, the old docks area, which is being modernised into the 21st century, fine universities, art galleries, museums, live theatre in quantities of which no other city of the same size can boast, new and modernising hotels, first grade national and local sports facilities, the finest conference and concert hall in Europe, an airport now capable of receiving jumbo jets, and communications by sea, air, rail and road to all parts of the United Kingdom and beyond which serve as a platform from which to go forward to the future.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is a great pity that Cardiff, for all its tourist attractions, should be about to lose a major attraction when an important collection of impressionist paintings will go to Japan for almost a year? Does he think that that is good for the tourist industry?

Mr. Grist: The hon. Lady shows the sort of insularity that damages Welsh interests. Those great paintings, which were left in the main by two sisters whose family money came from coal, will go to Japan. We have learnt that the tenth Japanese company is to invest in Wales. Those paintings will spread the name and fame of Wales, and will act as a hook to bring more work to our people. Just as the hon. Lady must have seen great exhibitions from abroad in the United Kingdom, we should be proud to have pictures to send around the world so that others may see them.

This should be one of the hon. Lady's days. Cardiff has served as a focal point for the valleys and hinterland of south Wales and, indeed, to a large extent was built on them. She should welcome the Secretary of State's venture of community investment and initiative in the valleys. I echo the comment of my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Sir R. Gower) that it is a chance for people to put forward their ideas, raise interest in their area, and bring pride back to their area, instead of having to rely on the politicians whom they elect and who rarely speak of the glories of the area but always of its dereliction, troubles and difficulties. It is a chance offered to them by the Government to help themselves.

It is absolutely certain that inefficiency, which the Labour party sometimes seems to espouse, and indiscriminate subsidy, which it certainly espouses, have never created or preserved jobs. They merely serve to lose jobs and make the position worse. Inflation, whether of promises or expenditure, wrecks confidence, undermines investment, is socially ruinous, and ultimately spells less work and employment. That is why we are looking forward to the Budget on 18 March and to a continuation of the fight against inflation. [Interruption.] Opposition Members should take note that this year the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development predicts that our unit labour costs will be the highest in Europe, and higher than in Japan and the United States. That is the sort of damaging inflation that we are imposing on ourselves, and that is supported by the attitudes of Opposition Members, which undermines jobs. High unit labour costs are one of the most damaging aspects of our national life.

[Mr. Grist]

Just as our productivity is improving and we are attracting the investment we need, we are managing to lose jobs because we are increasing labour costs rapidly compared with our competitors.

Mr. Best: Did not the OECD report show that we had been paying ourselves a 9 per cent. increase every year, which is a real increase of about 5 per cent.? The effect of that is that those in work become richer and improve their standard of living at the expense of those out of work. Is it not material that Labour Members always advocate higher wages and side with those who seek to push through higher wages when those policies directly damage those who are unemployed?

Mr. Grist: Indeed, and the figures show that in 1985 hourly earnings in the United Kingdom rose by 9 per cent. compared with a 5 per cent. average in OECD countries, and that this year the increase will be 8·5 per cent. for the United Kingdom and 4·5 per cent. for the total OECD countries. That is at least one of the answers to the question of the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) why we have lost jobs. They have been lost because of the inefficiency, out-of-dateness, uncompetitiveness and unawareness of what competitors are up to in industry after industry, and political party after political party. For many years the Tory party was as guilty as the other parties of being unaware of what was happening outside the United Kingdom.

Within the overriding priority of dealing with inflation, I hope that it will be possible to reduce interest rates. Their present levels are especially damaging to small businesses and to all those with mortgages. Today many more people have mortgages because more people are buying their homes than when we first came to office. I hope that more funds — even more than my right hon. Friend could announce today—can be made available for housing and house repairs. They are essential in constituencies such as mine, which have many ageing houses teetering on the brink of becoming slums, and many ageing constituents in need of specialised safe accommodation. During the past six years a marvellous job has been done in that respect. When I walk round my constituency I can see how many new roofs and windows have been installed, and the effect of the enveloping scheme in Rumney street. Much more remains to be done, and what better way to provide work and socially necessary investment than through housing?

Just as the Government have done so much to further home ownership and bring to reality the dreams of many people, I hope that my right hon. Friends have taken careful note of the opposition from all quarters to the proposals to review the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order 1972. The need to lighten the bureaucratic and tax burdens on small businesses and enterprises is well recognised by all Conservative Members. Nevertheless, the virtual free-for-all proposed in the use of private houses is not, and never will be, accepted.

Equally unacceptable is the extraordinary, and extraordinarily damaging, proposal of the South Glamorgan county council to raise local rates by 25 per cent. I quote from a letter that I received last week from one of my constituents. He writes:

"Dear Mr. Grist, I have just penned a letter to the Rev. R. Morgan to protest, most strongly, about the proposed 28 per cent."— the figure has gone down to 25 per cent. since then, thanks to my right hon. Friend's actions—

"rate increase by S. Glamorgan. What you can do about it, I really don't know, but I feel I really must let my feelings be known, in the hope that others like me will put on enough pressure to reverse this diabolical situation.

Let me say I am, and always have been, a Socialist, but"—[Interruption.] The fact that I cannot read this properly speaks for former education standards.

"whatever happens next year neither I, nor my family, will ever vote Labour again . . . I am being used as a political pawn and I object to that.

The Rev. Morgan blames the present Government—and I admit that there is some truth in that."

That is fair enough.

"But I feel there is also a lot of bad management and many crocodile tears being shed. I pointed out to him for instance that much can be saved with a more competent Administration than exists at the moment."

The Audit Commission would agree with my constituent in that respect. He concludes:

"the effect on industry, small businesses and so on could be catastrophic."

My constituent is quite right. I told him that I would be making use of his letter today. There speaks a local resident who understands better than the county council the effect of rates rises on businesses.

We all appreciate that the change in rating support this year favoured cities at the expense of counties to some extent, but it was nevertheless a remarkable achievement that Cardiff city council held its rate steady. It is equally remarkable that the county council should put up its rate by 28 per cent.—a staggering figure and the greatest in Wales. Even now, the 25 per cent. increase that it is now going for will have profound effects. For example, a firm such as Amersham International will have its rates bill increased by £37,000.

Such increases, when applied to all the hotels, shops, and other businesses, firms and manufacturers around South Glamorgan, mean that claims by the county council that making cuts would cost jobs hide the fact that increases in costs mean that jobs go elsewhere. The person who retires is not replaced, the extra hand who could be taken on is not. These effects are not so easily seen, but they are there, and they make the area that bit less competitive than others.

Clearly, money is being wasted, for example in the education system, as schools are run half-empty, and painful decisions about their future are being shelved. That damages not only the economy of the county, but the opportunities for our children, who are consequently robbed of a wider curriculum and better equipment as a result of spending on echoing classrooms and underused facilities.

A further opportunity that is wasted locally, and this applies to county hall, city and local health authorities, stems from the appalling refusal to put out services to tender. Only by doing so can we be sure that local ratepayers are not being asked to subsidise inefficiency. The savings for many authorities have been outstanding and nationally the Government and the National Health Service have saved over £50 million by going out to contract. For instance, Ogwr council, in a slightly different league, has saved over £100,000 by putting out its building and local housing maintenance for tender. Bath city council, a little town in comparison to South Glamorgan, has saved £63,000 by putting out to tender catering in the council and the sports hall. Dudley council has saved over £600,000 on school cleaning and Kent county council has saved nearly £1·4 million on the same service. There is now a long list of such savings. When will local authorities and health authorities in South Glamorgan and elsewhere wake up to their opportunities in this sector?

We should all be looking for opportunities. By their taxation policies, investment schemes and general ethos, the Government are seeking to promote a risk-taking and opportunity-taking state, and a responsible one.

This brings me to the teachers' dispute. I declare an interest as the father of two boys taking their O-levels in a local comprehensive school. Not all teachers are taking part in the dispute, and all credit to them for putting their pupils first. Many teachers, including some now taking action, are first-rate in their jobs, many are perfectly adequate, and some are downright poor. Most deserve higher pay, and, especially where their subject is in short supply, notably higher pay.

However, there must be a pro for this quid. The terms insisted on by the Government of assessment, job definition and increased in-service training are neither remarkable nor onerous. The only remarkable thing about them is that they have not been the norm for years. To deny that and imperil the future of our children as so many teachers have been doing, especially those in the NUT, is a scandal and a shame on the teaching profession. Let us hope that the current talks lead to better treatment for teachers and pupils alike.

We heard little today from the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside about the multifarious and manifold promises that he goes around making in Wales, but even they pall beside the £24,000 million extra expenditure promised by the Labour party leaders. Even if such promises could be kept, which is almost unthinkable in reality, the resultant rise in taxes and inflation would bleed the economy dry. Investment would flee the country, the pound would crash and inflation rocket. What choice then for jobs to maintain all the social expenditure called for by the Labour party? The country's course must be that set by the Government — realistic but imaginative. It must not be the opportunism—or occasionally the dishonesty—built on populism shown by the alliance. It must be built on a coherent, well-tried and deeply-rooted philosophy.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): In these debates, it is easy to go over the Government's global failures in their policy in Wales and look at the massive and increasing unemployment figures that are blighting every part of the Principality, at the increasing dereliction of our housing stock and the increasing waiting lists, and at the effect of public investment in social services, which have caused such misery in the Principality. I propose not to look at the global figures.

The hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Sir R. Gower) enjoined us to be, as he intended to be, non-partisan and non-parochial. I shall be parochial and partisan—I make no apology for that—because these debates give us a good opportunity to invert the process of looking just at the overall picture, and instead look at the effects of Government policy in our localities among the people whom we have the privilege to represent.

I came back from my constituency today in a state of anger and shock at some of the things that I had seen and learned. I shall mention only two factors contributing to my state. The first came when I picked up my local newspaper, the South Wales Evening Post, of 27 February. One page has the heading "We Want to Work". It has photographs of 24 people in the local area, whose ages range from 19 to 59. On the left of the advertisement, we are told that the feature has been made possible by generous donations from various companies. What are we coming to when decent people have to go through the humiliation of parading themselves in such a way?

I do not criticise the local newspaper, which is trying, albeit against the odds, to get these people into jobs. I do not criticise the jobcentre or the advertisers who paid for the advertisement. Least of all do I criticise those who are desperate for jobs and who are prepared to suffer the indignity of having their faces put before their friends, relatives and neighbours in a kind of cattle market. Conservative propaganda would have us believe that the unemployed are in some way at fault. That is reflected in the Government's social security policies for the unemployed. If the Government looked at the employment histories of those 24 people, they would say, as I do, "What a waste of talent and training." Decent people are being forced to allow their photographs to be so published in a local newspaper.

The Government were completely unprepared for this avalanche of job losses. I recall that, at the second meeting of the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs, Sir Hywel Evans, who was then the permanent secretary at the Welsh Office, was imprudent enough to answer a question about the figures that the Welsh Office was working on for the expected ceiling in unemployment. He said that they were working on the basis that unemployment would peak at 125,000. The Government have massaged the figures, but they still show that unemployment is over 170,000.

The Government were completely unprepared for what has happened. Their policies mean that they are ideologically and psychologically ill-prepared to deal with a situation that is largely of their creation. Who can doubt that the policies pursued in 1979, 1980 and 1981, when the value of sterling was high, were responsible for the destruction of so much of the manufacturing base upon which Wales depends? During the last five years, 2 million jobs in manufacturing industries in the United Kingdom have been lost. Wales has lost far more jobs than any other part of the United Kingdom because of the structure of its economy. Wales is dependent upon public investment in the economy as a whole.

I had my second shock over the weekend when I met two trade union representatives from the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre at Morriston in my constituency. The traditional theme of this Government has been to cut the public sector, to curb trade union rights and to increase the privatisation of services. The hon. Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Grist) praised those policies a few moments ago, but let us look at their effects in one place, the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre.

In practice, the Government's policies mean that, because a three-year cleaning contract expires on 24 March, the DVLC management has negotiated a new contract with Exclusive Cleaners Contract (Western) Ltd. The old contract was for £287,000. The renewal tender costs amount to £155,000. Therefore the DVLC — in effect, the Government — can say that £132,000 of public expenditure is being saved. The director and the personnel chief at the DVLC are happy and the contractor is no doubt happy; he is keeping his profit margins.

[Mr. Donald Anderson]

But what is the effect on the cleaners—women who are already on low wages of £27 a week gross? The effect will be a reduction in cleaning staff from 139 to 102—a loss of 37 jobs—a reduction in cleaning supervisors from five to four and a reduction in wages—let us, in our comfort, listen to this—from £1·80 an hour to £1·50 an hour. There is also to be a reduction in hours from three to two-and-a-half. Thus, the women employed as cleaners at the DVLC will have to cover a larger floor area, because there will be fewer cleaners, in a shorter time. To add insult to final injury, their holiday pay is to be abolished. They have been told by the contractor that they can take it or leave it. If they do not like the new terms, he will go to the jobcentre, where he will find women who are more than ready, in a high unemployment area, to take their jobs.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Does my hon. Friend accept that these figures, appalling and unacceptable as they are in their meanness and in their penny-pinching character, are made even worse when one bears in mind that, over the life of the last three-year contract, there has been an increase in inflation of over 15 per cent.? One therefore has to bear in mind that an increase would be necessary just to keep the wages at their original value.

Mr. Anderson: My right hon. Friend makes an entirely good point. They are miserable wages for women who are at the bottom end of the working sector. Many of these women are from one-parent families, or they are the only breadwinner in the family. The industrial relations legislation does not cover them. The Government have so dismantled the protection that was available to workers that the fair wages legislation has disappeared. This means that they can either take it or leave it. Is this the brave new Tory world? Is this the model for other privatisation contracts in schools, hospitals and Government service?

The unions at the DVLC advise me that the next group of workers whose jobs may be contracted out could be typists and the reprographic staff. In their defence the Government cannot say, like Pontius Pilate, that they were not responsible. They cannot be absolved from their responsibilities. They must have known what would be the effect of the contract into which they were entering. There will probably not even be a public expenditure saving. There are to be job losses which will have a consequential effect upon social security expenditure because the families of those who are made redundant will have to be maintained. Even according to the narrow and petty economics of this Government, it does not make economic sense. They have increased the misery of these miserably low-paid workers in west Glamorgan.

I shall contrast the effect of that policy on these women in Swansea with what is happening in the City. The Secretary of State is personally much more at home there than in dealing with low-paid workers. The investment climate in the City has seldom been more favourable. There has been a bid frenzy in the City and a shares boom.

If they wish, those ladies on slave wages at the DVLC in Swansea can read in the newspapers that during the last 12 months there has been a shares boom of 26 per cent. and that there has been an 8 per cent. increase in the last month. They can read about the City gold frauds. The bullion fraud amounts to an estimated VAT loss of £500 million. They can also read about the salary explosion in the City. The Government are doing nothing about that. There is to be a salary explosion in preparation for the "big bang" deregulation which is to take effect in October. The salaries of many young men in their twenties will be increased from £30,000 to £60,000 per annum.

Mr. Best: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Anderson: No.

They toil not, neither do they spin. They are pushing around figures in the City, yet these ladies in Swansea are to have their wages of £28 a week, gross, reduced to £25 a week.

Mr. Best: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Anderson: No, I shall not give way.

That is the direct result of the Government's policy. It is a mean Government who pursue such policies. There is a sour smell of decline about the Government's values. Perhaps the party of the City cannot comprehend the effect of their policies on those ladies in my constituency. Those effects—deliberate in that they arise from Government policy—should shame the Government.

A critic wrote of an earlier state of national malaise in which "wealth accumulates, and men decay".

Wealth is certainly accumulating as the two-nation divide deepens as a result of Government policies. The Government's priorities are those of the City while men and women decay. Our people are the losers, and the Government should go.

5.40 pm

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): I was going to say that the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) was carried away by his own rhetoric, but it was not even rhetoric because much of it lacked any semblance of plausibility. The hon. Gentleman declined to give way to me as is his right, although it does not make for good debate, when he referred to share prices. He will be aware that recent new issues have been heavily oversubscribed if they appear to have any chance of going to a small premium. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that if that amount of private money is available in the United Kingdom it should be harnessed to the kind of infrastructure projects that both he and I wish to see?

Mr. Anderson: I see nothing wrong in principle in harnessing every element of private capital to help build the infrastructure in Wales. I heard the appeals made to the City by the Secretary of State in Cardiff, but they were rejected because the prospective profits did not suit the City. If the hon. Gentleman disputes the figures that I gave, I assure him that every one of them was based absolutely in fact.

Mr. Best: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that statement. I shall remind him of it when we debate privatisation of the water authorities. He has now confirmed that, like me, he believes that private money should be harnessed wherever possible, rather than always relying on the public sector. The dinosaur attitude of the Opposition suggests that they are still living in the 1930s and 1940s when it was thought that the only way out of certain difficulties was to use the public sector rather than the more adventurous and successful attitude of the present Government. Why bleed the taxpayer and increase inflationary pressures by creating a heavier public sector borrowing requirement — a method that the Labour Government tried and failed — when there is the alternative that we now see? It is no coincidence that companies going into the private sector invariably do well after privatisation because there is a new sense of entrepreneurial movement forward which was totally lacking when they were in the public sector. I shall give an example of that later.

Mr. Williams: Inadvertently, I am sure, the hon. Gentleman is misrepresenting the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson). My hon. Friend referred to inflation in existing share prices. Those shares represent past investment, so their prices merely represent the price at which existing investment is changing hands. There is no accretion of investment as such. The privatisation of BT is a good example. Within a month or so, shares first issued at 50p were changing hands at £1·90—an increase of £1·40, not one penny of which was added to the investment in BT or received by the Government in extra taxation, but all of which went in windfall profits to shareholders.

Mr. Best: I am sure that the mistake is mine, but that is a different point. The right hon. Gentleman will agree that there are two aspects to this. The first is whether one can harness private sector capital for purposes hitherto regarded as the preserve of the public sector. As I understood it, the hon. Member for Swansea, East agreed that, wherever possible, private sector funds should be harnessed to achieve what in the past has been regarded as a matter for public sector investment. That is exactly what the Government are doing through privatisation, especially in the water authorities.

The second aspect is the movement of share prices. I remind the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) that many people of very modest means throughout the country, probably including a number of the right hon. Gentleman's constituents, who had never owned a share in their lives, took up the BT share offer because they wanted to have a stake in their country, an opportunity hitherto denied them.

Mr. Williams: They already owned BT.

Mr. Best: The right hon. Gentleman digs himself a deeper grave by saying that. The general public did not own BT. The right hon. Gentleman's concept of public ownership is quite different from ours. To him, it means that the state owns the assets. To us, it means that members of the general public own the assets. That is a fundamental philosophical difference between us. The right hon. Gentleman merely digs himself into a deeper hole by making that apparent.

The right hon. Gentleman will be very disappointed by the attitude of the Labour Opposition Front Bench to those assets which have been returned to the general public by the Government. The Labour Opposition Front Bench—I could say, uncharitably, under electoral pressure—knows that it would be electoral disaster to seek to renationalise those assets, to re-acquire them by the state and to confiscate them from the members of the general public in whose ownership they should properly remain. That is true public ownership, and there will be no Opposition commitment to dismantle it.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rymney): The hon. Gentleman talks about ownership by the British public. Does that include the 20 per cent. of BT shares sold on the New York stock exchange in the first week for £180 million? What contribution did that make to development and investment in Britain?

Mr. Best: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman is now a convert to the concept of dispersing assets as widely as possible. I look forward to hearing him press the Government for further privatisation to ensure wider share ownership by individuals rather than institutions.

Mr. Rowlands: Answer the question.

Mr. Best: The hon. Gentleman and I will agree on one thing—that, unfortunately, the percentage of individuals owning shares is still in decline compared with that of institutions. I regret that, but I had not realised that the hon. Gentleman also regretted it. I am glad that he has now made it clear and that he accepts my premise that public ownership means ownership of shares by as many individuals as possible.

Mr. Grist: Does my hon. Friend accept that what is happening to shares now is in remarkable contrast to what happened when the Labour party was in power, when savers, often individuals, and pension funds, into which virtually everybody was paying, were robbed blind by inflation, putting money into the Exchequer, not into people's hands?

Mr. Best: My hon. Friend is right. There is an inherent dichotomy in what the Opposition say. I do not think that I have heard one Opposition Member say that pensioners should not have Treasury bonds. What is the difference between having a Treasury bond which fluctuates in price and a share in the ownership of a company at home or abroad? There is no conceptual difference. That is another hang-up that the Opposition must face when considering private ownership.

Listening to Labour Members, one is reminded that the late Sir Winston Churchill said:

> "The inherent vice of capitalism is the unequal sharing of blessings. The inherent virtue of Socialism is the equal sharing of miseries."

That can never be more uppermost in one's mind than when one has the misfortune to have to listen to the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones). If anybody is capable of sharing misery as widely as possible, he has the greatest voice for that in the House.

I want to concentrate on a matter of critical importance which has been adverted to already—the problem of unemployment. I was interested to read in the National Institute Economic Review:

> "Each year that goes by with unemployment at the present level represents additional loss of national output, income and economic well-being. Moreover, both the social and the economic consequences of unemployment may well be cumulative, so that the longer that action is delayed, the worse the ultimate condition of the country will be even after unemployment is reduced."

I do not suppose that any right hon. or hon. Member would dispute that contention. The argument arises over how best to overcome that difficulty.

If we had been having this debate 20 or 30 years ago, it would have been regarded as impossible for a Government to sustain office with the levels of unemployment that are experienced now in the United Kingdom, and in Wales in particular. The fact that the Government have sustained office and the fact that, unlike their predecessors, the Labour Government, they not only won the 1979 election but went on to win the 1983 election, proves two things. I shall be charitable and say that it may well have had a lot to do with the state of the Labour party rather than policy but it also had a lot to do with the public realisation that the answers to unemployment are not as facile as the Labour party sometimes suggests. It is because of that root change in the understanding of the British people that the promises of politicians to overcome the level of unemployment through massive public expenditure are seen to be false. That was why, notwithstanding the high level of unemployment, the British people still voted in a Conservative Government.

Labour Members — I say this to them in all seriousness—must address their minds to why that was so. They must ask themselves how it can be that they are still promulgating the policies of yesterday and still articulating the same remedies now as before the 1983 election and yet they lost that election and lost it overwhelmingly. They must look into their souls and philosophy and wonder whether they have got it right.

It is accepted that the answers are not easy. I fully appreciate that the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside makes up in simplicity what he lacks in academic argument. But his answers are not persuasive. They will not persuade the people of Wales. The hon. Gentleman believes in massive public expenditure. He thinks that is the answer. But I must remind him of what the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) had to say only the other day to the London Business School. He said:

"The days of the Keynesian dash for growth are over, at least for the Labour party."

I do not know how long the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside will hold his place on the Front Bench if he continues to push out what he did a moment ago, because he is at variance with the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook went on to say that a Labour Government would only proceed "as the inflation constraints allow."

That was an interesting description of the state of the Labour party today, because it was an acknowledgement that the control of inflation must come before expenditure to increase employment. That is an interesting acceptance by some Labour Members of the realities of life that I have been mentioning.

The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside often talks about Holyhead in debates on Welsh affairs and in Welsh Question Time, but it is obvious that he does not often go there. If he did—unless he flew, like some of his ideas in fancy—he would have to travel along the A55 and he would realise that massive public sector investment, in excess of £400 million, is going into roads in north Wales which will have the most dramatic effect on the income and economy of my constituents in Anglesey. Anglesey has a great deal going for it. It has a beautiful environment and a multiplicity——

Mr. Ray Powell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will recall that on the last occasion on which we had a debate on Welsh affairs, several Labour Members were not called because Conservative Members took more than their allotted time. I draw that to your attention, because Mr. Speaker made an appeal for short speeches. The hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) has been speaking now for 16 minutes. One would have thought that he would have appreciated the appeal from the Chair and at least made a short contribution. If he is to make a contribution, let it be a contribution to the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Speeches so far have been commendably short, and I hope that we shall continue in that way so that we can hear every hon. Member who wishes to speak.

Mr. Best: I shall adhere to your injunction, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I appeal to the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell)—if he is capable of noticing an appeal when it is made—not to seek to intervene from a sedentary position, as is his wont, so that he does not delay me. No doubt he will then have an opportunity to make his contribution.

The improvement of the A55 will have a dramatic impact on the economy of Anglesey, as also will the improvements——

Mr. Rogers: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Best: The hon. Gentleman is delaying the debate.

Mr. Rogers: The hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) referred to my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) making his remarks from a sedentary position. In fact, my hon. Friend was standing. I know that he is short, but he was standing.

Mr. Best: I shall not respond to that. I would not want to see the hon. Member for Ogmore having to stand on the Benches in order to prove that he was standing rather than sitting.

I hope that when my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary replies to the debate he will take on board my exhortations for bypasses along the A55 on Anglesey. He has been extremely helpful in that predicament that I have brought to his notice. It is largely the result of those representations and my hon. Friend's kind response to them that we have a consultants' report on the bypasses coming about. I hope that the contents of the report will come to fruition.

A nationalised industry, Sealink, cried out year after year for investment in Holyhead, and no investment was forthcoming. However, as soon as Sealink was privatised, there was investment of £2·5 million in a deep-water berth at Holyhead. These matters speak for themselves.

The Welsh Office has provided £220,000 in grant under the urban programme for the development of a fishing facility at Holyhead. Following discussions that I had with a New Zealand company, I am happy to announce that the production of electronic pool tables will begin in Holyhead in the summer. Welsh slate will be used, which I know will be of great assistance to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas).

MEM is making advanced switching gear and Wells Kelo is undergoing restructuring. Anglesey Aluminium has seen an investment of £9 million, which has given it a more secure future than it has ever had previouly, but it will be going ahead with only half its work force. When I was first given the privilege of representing Anglesey in 1979, Anglesey Aluminium had 1,300 employees. That work force has now been halved. No Labour Member in his right mind, however rare that occurrence might be, would blame the Government for a reduction in the work force as a result of a diminution in the demand for aluminium worldwide. As I have said, the plant has a more secure future now than ever before. That is a case of massive manufacturing investment, but a reduction in the work force.

Things are moving elsewhere in Anglesey with the restructuring of Associated Octel at Amlwch and with £500,000 of European money gong to Halal in Gaerwen to enable a packaging facility to be established.

Last week I met the chairman of Pringle, which has recently bought Llanfairpwllgwyngyllgogerychwyrnirobwlrllandysillogogogoch station. The chairman told me that the company is spending £1 million at that site on its manufacturing capability. I met an old Army friend of mine last week whose colleague has developed a vehicle which is being tested by the Ministry of Defence. Apparently it has a one-in-three chance of being accepted. If it is accepted, it will be produced by Laird for both the domestic and export markets.

Much is happening which is good news for Anglesey, but the tragedy of unemployment in Holyhead, which is at 25 per cent., means that no one can afford to be complacent. That is why I began by mentioning unemployment. Indeed, it is the subject on which I wish to bring my remarks to an end.

I suggest that three courses of action should now be taken. First, we should set up task forces in order to concentrate resources on areas in Wales with unemployment rates of 25 per cent. or more. The National Institute Economic Review shows that if we can reduce unemployment by establishing a structure which is related to manufacturing, there will be a direct correlation between a person gaining employment and a reduction in the unemployment register. Secondly, sectoral regional aid should be directed to support manufacturing industry. Thirdly, National Health insurance contributions, the welcome reduction of which was introduced in the 1985 Budget, should be directed to those under 25 years and to the long-term unemployed.

If we were to reduce the cost of employing those who are most in need of assistance and employment—those under 25 years and those who have suffered long-term unemployment — we would not have to talk about reducing wages for those people. Instead, we would be able to ensure that employers found it more attractive financially to employ people in those categories than others. If we can keep labour unit costs down, and, therefore, inflation, we help to combat the pressure for higher wages, which so often reduces our competitiveness.

Mr. Rogers: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Best: If we were to introduce these measures——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) wishes to raise a point of order.

Mr. Rogers: When we last had a Welsh affairs debate, Mr. Speaker, some hon. Members were unable to participate because of the excessive length of certain Members' speeches. You have said, Mr. Speaker, that if our contributions are reasonably short, everyone will be able to participate in this debate. The hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) has been speaking for 25 minutes.

Mr. Speaker: I am aware of that. I understand that the hon. Gentleman is about to resume his seat.

Mr. Best: I was about to do so, Mr. Speaker. Before you entered the Chamber, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) raised a point of order and delayed the progress of my speech. He has caused that to happen yet again and he must be held responsible for the delay.

I was saying that if we were to introduce the measures to which I referred—I hope that it will be announced in the Budget that they will be introduced — we could make an even greater and more significant contribution to the reduction of unemployment which we all want to see.

Several Hon. Members: rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Many hon. Members wish to participate in the debate. Long speeches will not be helpful if they are all to be accommodated.

6.6 pm

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I shall not take up the remarks of the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) — neither their length nor their rambling nature. I believe that the annual Welsh day should have something to do with Wales, and I accept that constituency matters will arise. However, much of what we have heard from Conservative Members has been extremely general and could have been included in almost any United Kingdom-wide debate. The annual Welsh day debate provides an opportunity to take stock of what has happened and what is happening in Wales. It enables us to study the balance sheet to see how things are moving and to examine the gains and losses. Over recent years there has been a saga of losses.

We heard a few moments ago that the hon. Members for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Grist) and for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells), and my hon. Friend the Member for Merionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas) and I share a 12th anniversary. A seventh anniversary that stands out in my mind is that of the referendum on the Welsh Assembly. I should like to wager that if such a referendum were to take place today, the result would be very different from that in 1979. The people of Wales have experienced the consequences of voting against the creation of an Assembly.

I know that some hon. Members would argue that the first priority is to get the Government out of office as quickly as possible, and I recognise that there is validity in that argument. However, the long-term argument, which is even more important, is that we must ensure that a similar Government are not blown into office by the next ill wind. Such a Government would not be elected by Wales but Wales would have to suffer them although they were voted in by other parts of the United Kingdom. Our priority should be to obtain a system of government that keeps the Conservative party, that lot on the Government Benches, out of office permanently. We must have a system that stops them messing up our country's prospects.

It is worth recalling what happened from 1974 to 1979. In that period, many and varied arguments were advanced by Conservative Members, and regrettably by some Opposition Members, against taking any step towards greater Welsh autonomy. We were warned that it would kill off jobs. We had 80,000 unemployed at that time and we were told that unemployment would be very much worse if Wales gained greater autonomy. There are now 180,000 unemployed. We were told that, in the absence of an Assembly, regional policy and assistance would take off. We know what has happened. It has been killed off in the meantime. There is a great need for a new start for the young unemployed in Wales. That must be a reason for us to put a question mark against those who say that, provided we keep clear of Welsh autonomy, everything will be fine and dandy in Wales and London.

We were told that housing programmes would be cut if we had an Assembly. We did not have an Assembly, and housing investment in Wales has halved since the Government came to office. The people of Wales are suffering from inadequate housing and long waiting lists.

What would have happened to the hospital investment programme if we had had an Assembly? We were told how many hospitals could be built between 1979 and the end of the century if we kept clear of an Assembly. We kept clear of it and we know what happened to the promises. We know what happened to the promises of hospitals being built in Porthmadog, Western Dwyfor, other parts of Gwynedd and many other parts of Wales.

We were warned of what would happen to the road building programme if we had an Assembly. I accept that there is a continuing programme along the north Wales coast, but all parties know what happened to the county roads in Gwynedd, Dyfed and Powys. An increasing number of potholes and less and less investment—yes, we paid in terms of road programmes.

We were warned that splitting Wales from the rest of Britain, even with the minimal devolution talked about, would threaten investment in industries such as coal. Since 1979, the number of jobs in the coal industry has been more than halved. More than one third of the jobs in the Welsh coalfield have gone during the past two years. There were promises of investment in Margam, but they were not fulfilled. So much for the promises that, if we kept away from the idea of autonomy and were good boys, all would be well.

We were told that an Assembly would take money and power from local government but, during the past few weeks, we have seen what has happened to rates. Increases have been necessary because the Government have withheld grants. Yes, power has been taken from local government—it has gone straight to Whitehall, and we in Wales are paying the price in terms not only of lost resources but of lost control and a loss of plans and strategy for Wales. Powers have been centralised not in Cardiff but in London. There has been higher taxation for fewer services and no control.

We were told many things by certain hon. Members during the run-up to 1979. We were told that, if we had a Welsh Assembly, water rates would increase. The threat was that democratisation of the water authority would mean much greater rates. As soon as the Conservative party came to power in 1979, it did away with the Water Charges Equalisation Act 1977 and immediately, at the stroke of a pen, added £4 million to the Welsh water bill.

We were warned what would happen to the Welsh language if we had a Welsh Assembly. We are now living with the consequences of the statement by the tribunal at Colwyn Bay that county council and social services departments in Wales could not employ Welsh-speaking people to look after Welsh residents in old people's homes. The House is not willing to do anything about it.

There has been a long saga of arguments. One hon. Member said:

"there is not a single major deficiency in Welsh life or a single major problem in the Welsh economy that will be touched by devolution or any of the proposals in the Bill. Not a single interest of poeple anywhere in Wales — whether it be democratic, cultural or political—will be advanced one inch by devolution in Wales."—[Official Report, 18 January ,977; Vol. 924, c. 147.]

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): Who said that?

Mr. Wigley: Good question. The then hon. Member for Bedwellty, who is now the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock), said that. We have all made mistakes from time to time. I hope that the Leader of the Opposition has learned from his mistakes and from what has happened since then. I hope that he has learned particularly the lesson that, by playing the game with the Conservative party in the run-up to the 1979 referendum, he gave the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) the keys to No. 10 Downing street. The Welsh people are paying heavily for that folly.

We are not advocating a return to the 1979 model or a resurrection of the arguments used then. I put it to the House that there is a strong need for Wales to have more control over its affairs and for greater foresight than we had in 1979. We have paid economically in terms of jobs, houses, regional policy and agriculture. We have paid socially in terms of the cancer of unemployment and the social depression killing off initiative and hope. It is no use Conservative Members talking about community self-help when the Government have put such a damper on aspirations in Wales. We have seen the effect on a generation of the policy of "Get on your bikes and look for work."

We have paid politically by suffering a Tory Government whom we in Wales never elected and by the lack of democratic answerability of authorities, such as the water and health authorities. The hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) is trying to persuade the health authorities to save our ambulance services, just as we are. We know that our democracy is such that we cannot get into the same room as the representatives of the health authority and the Welsh Office to discuss this vital problem. That is the skin-deep nature of our democracy. The Welsh Office is totally lacking in sensitivity on planning appeals and similar issues which can have devastating effects on many communities, towns and villages in Wales.

The price paid is, at best, a total collapse of morale and, at worst, a total alienation of young people. A high price has been paid in terms of alienation. People wanted a framework within which they could work to improve the position in their country, but they were denied it. They wanted to put forward ideas, socially, economically and culturally, but the 1979 vote succeeded in killing off the exciting ideas bubbling up in the 1960s and 1970s.

The Secretary of State has said more than once that he is looking for new ideas in Wales and for positive thinking for the future. Does he not realise that the Government have helped to extinguish the flames of hope that burned in the 1970s? We were told that the answer for Wales would be found in a Select Committee. I am a member of the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs. Its members strive to do a good job but it is confined to looking at one subject at a time. We need a body that constantly monitors Government services in Wales. The Select Committee deals only with an investigation, when we need a greater power of initiating positive policy. The Select Committee deals with recommendations, but we want a body capable of executive action, not just of talk.

Mr. Keith Raffan (Delyn): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Select Committee has powers to carry out one-day inquiries into a particular crisis, event or organisation, if it decides to do so? The Select Committee has made wide use of that power since the last election.

Mr. Wigley: But when the Select Committee uses those one-day opportunities, its recommendations are voted down by Conservative Members, as happened with the plant breeding station at Aberystwyth.

The Select Committee can certainly do some work, but it is not enough. It is not a replacement for an assembly or for a national parliament motivated to sort out Welsh problems.

What has happened to the Welsh Grand Committee? It has not met since December, and we are almost through this quarter of Parliament. The Welsh parliamentary party —an all-party group—used to meet regularly. It now meets only once in the lifetime of a Parliament to elect people to serve on outside bodies and then goes back to sleep until the next Parliament. Welsh matters are rapidly disappearing from the House and it is nonsense to pretend that all is well and rosy in the garden. We have a total lack of control over our destiny. We have fewer opportunities than we had 20 years ago to discuss matters in an all-Wales forum. Under people such as Huw T. Edwards there was a Council for Wales. It was a non-elected body but at least it could bring thoughts together. It has been chucked overboard and there is nothing in its place.

People with common interests — a rugby club or social club — have an opportunity to elect a body to make decisions on their behalf. Of course the Welsh people can do this locally—at community, district and county council level—and we can do it at Westminster and in Europe, but not on an all-Wales level. There is something sacrosanct about that level. Power has to be kept in the hands of bureaucrats who can foist on the people policies they do not want. In recent years, we have been moving backwards with a vengeance.

I warn friends in the Welsh Office who may be sitting close at hand that, unless they are made directly answerable to Wales, questions will be asked about the justification of the Welsh Office. Unless the Welsh Office acts in an all-Wales context—bringing forward positive policies responding to Welsh circumstances, not just acting as a rubber stamp for the Department of Education and Science, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Department of Health and Social Security and all the rest—what is the justification for having a couple of thousand civil servants? We need something new and positive out of them, but we are not getting it. There is no point in having a Welsh Office which brings only bureaucratic inertia to Wales. We want something that provides a new dynamism, a Welsh response to the chronic conditions in Wales.

Dr. Marek: I am interested to hear the hon. Gentleman's remarks about the Welsh Office. Is not one of the problems of the Welsh Office the fact that it is too small and that it has to cover too many different aspects of work, which means that the quality of decision cannot be as high as it is in Departments in London which have the necessary expertise?

Mr. Wigley: I accept that in many cases the Welsh Office is weak in members of staff and in its range of expertise. None the less, it can gear policy to circumstances in Wales, but that is not happening sufficiently. There are many small countries such as Wales; one thinks of a country such as Norway. We can boo-hoo, but they have far fewer civil servants than we have in London and they are doing a better job of governing their country than our civil servants in Wales. We need a new start, a new dynamism in Wales. We need a new democratic answerability and we need a body which co-ordinates policies on an all-Wales level, bringing policies together in order to answer the needs of Wales, not the needs of the City of London and south-east England, as we heard a few moments ago. People of good will should come together now to accept the need for a co-ordinating body and for new initiatives.

We all accept that mistakes were made by all of us in the 1970s, but let us start looking forward to doing something ourselves to sort out our own solutions, not bleat and moan that London is not doing this or that. Until we do that, no one will do it for us. We need a solution now, after seven bleak years. We need a democratic Welsh Parliament, Assembly or council—whatever it is called —which co-ordinates policy and brings it all together on an all Wales level.

I hope that, when the hon. Member for Carmarthen (Dr. Thomas) replies for the Labour party, he will give us some idea of how the policy of the Labour party works on those lines, side by side with its policy achieving greater democracy in Scotland.

I began by referring to the need for more than temporary palliatives running as far as a piece of elastic which stretches no further than the next election, if we are unlucky, and to the election after that if we are lucky. That elastic will pull us back into the mess we are in today, and whatever alternative Governments build it will be demolished by another Tory Government. The only solution to the problem is an attempt to democratise our lives.

We in Plaid Cymru want long-term solutions. At the end of the day we feel that only in Wales will those solutions be found. It is up to us in Wales to find the machinery of our own salvation — in Wales, not in London. Until we get that, the rest is transient, trivial and temporary. If Wales has any future it must be up to us. The sooner the people of Wales realise that, the better.

Mr. Gwilym Jones (Cardiff, North): I find it most interesting to have this opportunity to speak in our annual Welsh day debate immediately after the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley). Many hon. Members would say that he is always interesting to listen to and I would often want to take time to hear what he has to say. I felt today that we heard the same passion that is always displayed in his contributions but I am not sure that we heard the same considered tones that we might otherwise expect from him. Perhaps I could forgive him because I believe that Opposition Members feel the need to appear more and more Left to appease the key people behind them at home.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon invited us to contemplate the Welsh debate by looking at the balance sheet of Wales to see how it all adds up. I am inclined to go a little way down the road with him, but much of what he said was projecting a balance sheet of politics and Welsh political life.

When this debate ended last year my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, who will reply tonight, replied then by pointing out that there were more Conservative Members in the Chamber than members of the Opposition. I think that he was right to mention the significance of that as one of the turning points in Welsh political life.

As we look at the balance sheet of Welsh political life, seldom has a Conservative Government had the opportunity to look across the Chamber at so many marginal seats. That is a delicious prospect. Those seats are in all parts of Wales. I look across to where the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) sits. With only 2,000 more votes, that will fall our way. The right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) is not in the Chamber but he was here earlier. With a similar number of votes, almost a handful, his seat will fall our way. The hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) is in his place. With only an additional 1,300 votes, that constituency would fall to the Conservative party. The hon. Member for Carmarthen (Dr. Thomas), who is replying for the Labour party, will know how closely the Conservative party is breathing down his neck.

Dr. Roger Thomas: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Conservative candidate for Carmarthen in the past two elections who cruised well on the tide of Thatcherism decided to disappear from the constituency with the introduction of milk quotas?

Mr. Jones: I think that the hon. Member for Carmarthen will reflect that he is not right to suggest that. I think that he might agree that our recently selected candidate in Carmarthen will at least prove to be the equal of our previous candidate, if not superior. I predict that when the hon. Member for Carmarthen relinquishes his seat it will be to our new candidate, who will take over as the hon. Member for Carmarthen.

Let us not confine this to south Wales or west Wales. I would like to give the Liberal party full credit for its temporary place in the House. The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) made a contribution earlier. He is not here but he has a small majority that will come our way. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) waves his pen at me and returns to his notes. [HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] I do not think I will. We have been much interrupted and there has been criticism about the length of speeches.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery is a recent gain in the House and I think that at the next election his seat will be a gain for the Conservative party. I do not even hold out as long a tenure for the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey).

I shall return to the Labour party Front Bench. The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) has a majority of about 1,600.

Mr. Raffan: Less.

Mr. Jones: I apologise. That is still a marginal seat. There is the other marginal seat in Clwyd, that of the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek). The hon. Member for Caernarfon gave me the idea for this political balance sheet. I look forward to travelling to that most attractive mountainous part of north-west Wales. I look forward to the early days when we see the seats of Meirionnydd Nant Conwy and Carmarthen falling to us. When were the Conservative party ever able to look from the Government Benches at so many marginal seats?

A major part of our Welsh debate should be occupied with our great concern about the disastrous actions of the Labour party where it is in positions of elective power in Wales. Traditionally, our debate is held on 1 March or as close to it as possible. In 1986, more so than in any other year, we are very mindful of the rate fixing episodes which take place in every district and county council in Wales. Especially burnt into all our souls must be the various decisions that are being taken by the Welsh county councils. Those councils have conspired to produce what in the words of one of their leaders was described—shamefacedly, I hope—as "monstrous increases". What better description can there be for the way the rates are going up and the prospect now facing the people of Wales?

I am sorry to say that that is nothing new for us in South Glamorgan. We have been in this position before. In 1975 we had a 94·5 per cent. increase in the rates and in 1982 a 54 per cent. increase in the rates. In 1986 we now have a 28 per cent. increase from South Glamorgan county council—or what would have been 28 per cent., as my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Grist) pointed out. It is now down to about 24·5 per cent. thanks to the intervention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. It seems that the percentages that I mentioned are decreasing, but at the same time we must remember the success that our Government have had in winning the battle with inflation, which now makes a 24 or 28 per cent. increase more significant than it would have been in past years.

Lest it be too obvious, I should like to mention the electoral pattern that lies behind the rate increases that we in South Glamorgan have seen at least twice previously, and now all of Wales is seeing. In 1975, when we had the first massive rate increase, it was engineered the wrong way round, because the following year we had local elections — the city council elections — and, hardly surprisingly, the Labour party suffered a defeat. The Conservative party took control in 1976.

The year after, in 1977, the Conservative party took control of South Glamorgan county council. Unhappily for the ratepayers of South Glamorgan, the pendulum swung back the other way in 1981, when Labour regained control of the county council, admittedly by the narrowest of margins, with the casting vote of the chairman. That meant that at every council meeting the Labour party was usually dependent on its Liberal allies to sustain it in office. However, at least Labour learnt in the intervening period that instead of going for such a massive rate increase one year before an election it should go in for a massive rate increase one year after the election. There was a 54 per cent. increase, which included a supplementary rate. Now, thankfully, that is not possible.

When the 1985 elections came, Labour was returned to power in South Glamorgan. Due to the electoral reverses of the Liberals, particularly in my constituency, Labour could cheerfully ignore its Liberal allies. The policy was still the same. One year later there was a 28 per cent. rate increase, now to be a 24·25 per cent. rate increase. It takes no genius to predict that that is motivated by the same electoral considerations. The 9 per cent. budgeted increase in the spending of South Glamorgan county council is not for spending this year. A little bit will be let out in time for the district council elections in May 1986, a little for electoral, party political purposes, but overwhelmingly it is for stoking up the balances. In the same way as in 1985, it will be used in an attempt—a forlorn attempt, I trust —to buy electoral victory in 1989.

That is the cynical cycle of the Labour party in power in Wales, but what is the price of that cynicism so cyclically applied? Where is the caring Labour party, constantly referred to by the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside? He seems to talk about the caring Labour party in every part of Wales but Alyn and Deeside. I wonder whether he has now given up any forlorn hopes of defending his own marginal seat in Alyn and Deeside? Is there still such a thing as a safe Labour seat anywhere in Wales? [HON. MEMBERS: "Yes."] But where is the caring Labour party? What is the answer when a pensioner asks, "How can I pay for a Labour council?" What is the answer to the people who will lose their jobs? I am sad to say that it was in my constituency that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State visited a company and received the unwelcome briefing on how many jobs would be lost through having to meet the rates increase imposed by South Glamorgan county council.

Dr. Marek: This is a point of information. The hon. Gentleman asked whether there was a safe Labour seat in Wales. I draw his attention to the seat of my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), who got over 70 per cent. of the vote. That is probably the safest seat in the whole of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Jones: I am not sure whether to be grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. Is it significant that he did not mention his own seat, or is he starting a rumour that the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) will make room for the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside? I wonder

I was trying to bring to the House's attention the plight of companies in my constituency. I am sure that it is not just one company. How many jobs will have to go to pay for the cost of all those increases, not just in South Glamorgan? Surely many, if not all, employers are in the same boat.

Mention has been made of the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs. I recall it taking evidence in north Wales, when a representative of one of the county councils was before us. We got on to the subject of past patterns of rate increases and the future implications. The representative sought to assure the Select Committee that his council, and, for that matter, all county councils in Wales, were all too well aware of the impact of high rates on jobs and job opportunities. I can remember him even volunteering the further assurance that the hard Left was not in control of the Labour party in Wales. That description was meant to cover places such as Liverpool and the Greater London council.

Mr. Best: No one is in control of the Labour party at the moment.

Mr. Jones: Perhaps the representative meant to add a codicil that the hard Left was not in control at that time. In the few short months that have passed since the Select Committee took its evidence in Flint on Courtaulds, all those assurances and statements have flown out of the window.

There has been a wide welcome for the Green Paper on the reform of rates. While every hon. Member could find imperfections in the Green Paper's proposal of a community charge and the other components, I think that in all our hearts we would join together in saying that, at the very least, it is infinitely preferable to the present system. It seems to be the only answer to the way in which Labour councils are choosing to increase the rates—the only answer for the pensioners, the unemployed and everybody else who will be hard hit.

I can readily understand the calls by business and industry for rate capping as the only answer to the latest savage attack being mounted on their finances, and, more so, their real fears that that is but a trend that will continue, as councils bleed employers to the maximum, perhaps attempting to establish the highest possible non-domestic rate as a prelude to the reform of rates and the levels that councils will have to operate from when that happens. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will have to give the closest attention to those fears of business and industry.

Those monstrous increases are not necessary. I ask hon. Members to come to Cardiff to see the example of the council of the capital city of Wales, which levied its rate for this year last Friday. There is to be a nil increase. Effectively that has all-party support. We have two other Left-wing parties on the Conservative-controlled city council. Neither party chose to table an alternative rate for debate on Friday. The city council's rate is being held. It shows that it can be done. Thank goodness that it is being done. There has been a threat of a 28 per cent. increase on the ratepayers of South Glamorgan, but at least with the contribution of the city council the burden on the people in Cardiff, and in my constituency, is only—I use the word advisedly—16 per cent. That greatly benefits the ratepayers.

I particularly welcome the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State earlier that low spenders will receive priority in his consideration when he next examines the allocations of taxpayers' money. I very much hope that Cardiff and other similar councils will benefit not only because they are low spenders but because we can be confident that taxpayers' money will definitely benefit the ratepayers and will not be frittered away or used to stoke up the balances.

In conclusion, I would briefly like to mention what might be the greatest complaint against the Labour party in Wales today. That complaint arises out of the Labour party's contribution to Saturday's rugby defeat. On Friday I was amazed to read the first letter in the correspondence column of the Western Mail written by Mr. J. Vaughan-Jones, the Labour party's research officer. Mr. Vaughan-Jones' letter tried to make a statistical case—and we all know that there are lies, damned lies and statistics—that a Welsh win on Saturday meant the writing would be on the wall for the Tories.

However, as no one would accept that a Labour victory is feasible, even though we are aware that the other Left-wing parties are busy forging alliances to help bring about a Labour victory, clearly all the omens were against the Welsh rugby team as they went out to face France at Cardiff Arms park on Saturday. A veritable pall must have descended on the team. Everyone must have realised what were the implications for the hoped for victory against France in the light of that letter in the Western Mail. It will be a long time before the people of Wales forgive the Labour party for its damaging interference in Welsh sport, Welsh culture or even, as some would describe it, the religion of Wales.

[Mr. Jones]

I hope that the hon. Member for Carmarthen, when he replies this evening, will give the House the assurance that this damaging intrusion will not be repeated and that the officer of the Labour party involved will retreat, never again to comment on Welsh affairs.

Mr. Gareth Wardell (Gower): Today was to be a special day for me as a bus full of pensioners from my constituency were to grace the Strangers Gallery. I am pleased that they postponed their visit for another time.

I should like to bring to the attention of Conservative Members the effects that the Government's proposals for the reform of social security will have in a particular area of the life of the Welsh people.

The reform was supposed to be needed to simplify the system and to direct help to where it is most needed. Of course, all of us in the House who advise constituents on welfare rights and maximising income recognise the need for simplifying the regulations. However, it seems that the Government have gone through the yellow book with a red felt pen and slashed thick red calculation lines through the pages referring to the death grant, pension schemes, maternity grants, single payments, hospital fares, widowhood, free school meals, extra heating and diet additions, invalidity benefit and housing benefits, among others. The Government have sometimes added their own mumbo-jumbo so that people will continue to be overwhelmed when they try to find out which benefits they are entitled to claim. The so-called simplification is basically a new way of denying crucial help at times of greatest need.

The new system will also mean that, far from directing funds to people who need them most, those who need extra help will get as much and no more than others in need. For instance, Shelter calculates that some single parent families will lose up to one-eighth of their net income while some couples with older children may gain from the Government's £450 million cut in housing benefit.

Of course, Conservative Members will know that that is what the review is all about—cuts. To reduce public spending, the Government intend to cut massive holes in what we have regarded as being, and paid contributions to support, a safety net of a minimum income to prevent debilitating poverty in times of need.

On the best estimates that we have—the Government have refused to provide official figures — in Wales nearly 21,000 pensioners aged over 80 will lose up to £5 a week in benefits and housing benefit. Over 100,000 pensioners aged 60 to 79 will lose up to £5 a week. Almost 6,000 sick and disabled people, 6,000 low wage earning families, 18,600 unemployed families, and almost 65,000 single people, childless couples and widows will have their benefits—the supposed safety net—cut by up to £5 a week.

In total, more than 250,000 people in Wales will lose about £459,000 of benefits. That is nearly £500,000—an average across the population of £2 a week. In Wales, the pensioners, the sick and disabled, the unemployed, single parents, new mothers, students and their parents, widows and low wage earners will know what the review is about. It is about cutting costs and cutting public spending on public need.

Last week, we were supposed to rejoice at the Government's commitment to the welfare of pensioners by the uprating of benefits by 40p for a single pensioner and by 65p for a couple. If last week Conservative Members could support platitudes about "every little bit helping", they should know that 20p will pay the 10 per cent. Government enforced increase in Welsh water rates. The other 20p will exactly cover the price rise for a bus trip into Swansea for my constituents who still have a bus service. Will Conservative Members remain silent when ordered to vote for cuts of £5 a week for 120,000 Welsh pensioners who are, by definition, the poorest of Welsh pensioners?

Last Thursday the Minister for Social security went to the media to proclaim that the Government were hoping that all DHSS offices would declare February an exceptionally cold month, so that extra heating allowances could be paid. What absolute hypocrisy. First, the fact that the Minister had to make that statement shows that some benefit offices are so out to touch with reality that they have not got the message from the meteorological officers around the country that last month was the second coldest February of the century. By last Friday, only 360 of the 451 local DHSS offices had declared exceptionally severe weather in their areas. So much for local decision-making. That bodes ill for the working of the proposed social fund, which will also operate on the basis of local discretion.

Secondly, the Minister implied that the Government do not understand why people do not claim the extra heating allowance. More than 80 per cent. of those eligible to claim do not do so, and this represents a saving of £25 million a year to the DHSS budget. Claiming the extra benefit is difficult and, according to the welfare benefits handbook, the benefit is difficult to obtain. Claiming means going to the benefit office armed with fuel bills dating back as far as December 1984 and bank statements showing that the claimant has less than £500 in savings. If he has just bought a bed, for example, which takes his savings to less than that figure, he needs the bill for it and other documents to support his claim. Should he prove all this to the saisfaction of the S manual, he may get £1 a week, or less, for as long as long as the severe weather lasts.

Meanwhile, apart from the increase in the more mundane effects of enduring cold conditions, such as pneumonia, heart attacks, chest and other infections, and the proneness to falls and other accidents, the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys reports that this year more than an extra 100 people a day are dying of hypothermia compared with last year. That is despite increased awareness of the problem by caring agencies and volunteers. The House, as the guardian of the nation's well-being, should be ashamed of that. During exceptionally severe weather conditions, there should be an automatic bonus payment to all people on supplementary benefit and supplementary pensions and all those in receipt of housing benefit should be allowed to claim. That would be simple, cheap to administer—records are already kept of all those people — and effective.

Finally, the Minister for Social Security claimed that the Government have "dramatically increased" the payments for heating allowances paid as part of supplementary benefit and pensions. He claims to care about people getting help, yet the extra heating allowance campaign was not mounted by the Government. It has been left to charities and welfare groups to advise people on the availability of help. I am sure that the House will wish to congratulate Age Concern on its initiative in distributing survival packs to pensioners.

The Government should have mounted a campaign in 1982 using, if necessary, the money that was left unclaimed after the exceptionally severe weather spell during that year. By the time members of the public have absorbed the information and realised their right to benefit and how to claim, all the extra allowances for heating will have gone. The new Social Security Bill abolishes them, in the name of simplicity.

The new income support scheme will include premiums for heating. No doubt they will relate closely to the present figures for heating additions, which are paid at three rates. The lower rate is £2·20 a week. A higher rate for a fully centrally heated home is available at £4·40. An even higher rate of £5·40 is paid to those who can prove that their homes are damp, unable to be draught-proofed and exceptionally difficult to heat. Yet coal, which is still the commonest form of heating in Welsh homes, in my constituency costs £14 for two bags, which is the minimum needed for one fire for a week. The South Wales electricity board's standing charge is 60p a week, before one takes into account lighting, cooking and heating for other rooms.

For years, Age Concern and citizens advice bureaux have been reporting that those rates are inadequate and that they result in hardship, physical or financial, by way of fuel debts and consequent disconnections. The rates are miserly and disgusting. Where is the Government's realism? They were quick and keen to increase energy prices as a cheap and easy way of imposing indirect taxation on us all. Where was their commitment and interest in ensuring that the poorest and neediest could cope with such increases without having to choose between debt and warmth?

It has taken the British preoccupation with the weather to bring this issue to the forefront of the public's mind. Now we all know about the problem and we know that improvements must be made. When the Social Security Bill comes before the House again, the people of Wales —especially pensioners— will be waiting to see how much Conservative Members really care about their needs and welfare.

Mr. Keith Raffan (Delyn): In contrast to the passionate speech of the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell), I shall be my usual low-key self. I respect the hon. Gentleman's feelings, as I do his chairmanship of the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs, but he must be aware that the Government have substantially increased heating benefit and supplementary heating benefit. Would that the Labour Government had shown similar concern for pensioners and refrained from stopping their £10 Christmas bonus for two years running. That can hardly have helped pensioners to pay for their heating.

In reply to last year's Welsh day debate, the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) said that it was the "annual general meeting" of Welsh Members of Parliament—the day when we stop and take stock of the previous year in the Principality. The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) echoed that sentiment tonight.

Tonight, I shall look back at and take stock of the part of Wales that I know best—my constituency. The most notable event in Delyn in the past year was not the closure of Courtaulds at Greenfield, our largest factory, but rather the vigorous, effective response to that closure by the local community, fully supported by the Welsh Office. Within hours of the closure announcement, I and the chief executive of Delyn borough council, John Packer, had arranged to meet the chairman and deputy chairman of Courtaulds. Within days, we had impressed upon them the fact that Courtaulds could not simply walk away from the community which had served it for so long and so well, as the company was allowed to do after the closure of the Castle works in 1977, with the loss of 1,500 jobs, after the rundown of the Deeside mill between 1969 and 1980, with the loss of 1,200 jobs, and after the earlier rundown of the Greenfield plant between 1973 and 1981, with the loss of 1,290 jobs.

Within weeks, Delyn borough council had drawn up detailed plans for the future of the Greenfield site and I initiated an Adjournment debate on the closure and the convening of the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs in Flint—as an aside, it was the first time that the Select Committee had met outside Westminster or Cardiff—to take evidence on the closure. Within months, the Government and Courtaulds had announced a package to regenerate Delyn's economy—to bring new industry and new jobs to the area.

Now, little more than 10 months after the closure announcement and seven months after the actual closure, the number one site at Greenfield has been transferred by Courtaulds to Delyn borough council. The site has been cleared of all toxic waste by the company and a former manager of Greenfield, David Watson, a high flier with Courtaulds, has been seconded to run the Delyn enterprise agency — shortly to become the Delyn Business Partnership. Plans are far advanced for new micro workshops on the site. A short distance away, at the former Grosvenor Chater works, the Greenfield young enterprise centre has been set up. This is an exciting project, under the energetic leadership of John Murray, designed to help young people to translate an idea for their own business into the reality of being self-employed.

The old adage applies: "The sky is darkest just before dawn." During the past year, we have begun to see the dawn in Delyn, even if the Labour party cannot. I should also add that the job replacement scheme has been encouragingly successful. Of the 600 people made redundant by Courtaulds at the end of last July, 240 have found new jobs. There are high hopes that the remainder will also be placed in jobs.

It is not only at Greenfield and in the immediate neighbourhood that we are witnessing the rebuilding of our local economy. I mentioned at Question Time today that at Point of Ayr the construction on the coal-to-oil liquefaction plant has begun. Completion is scheduled for December 1987, with the employment of 80 people. At Flint, the Delyn enterprise zone is beginning to make a substantial contribution to the development of a new, diverse and dynamic local economy. In the words of the chief executive of Delyn borough council, Mr. John Packer:

[Mr. Keith Raffan]

"Perhaps the most enouraging features are the developing commitment of the private sector, and the very positive contribution to the formation and development of small companies, which would not have been possible without enterprise zone benefits."

I notice that the hon. Member for Carmarthen (Dr. Thomas) is listening carefully. I hope that the Labour party is also listening carefully. If it had its way, there would be an end to enterprise zones. The shadow Home Secretary, in his former incarnation, said in a celebrated statement that he would have none of them.

I am aware—I say this in my usual generous spirit—that Labour party policy tends to mutate. I will give the hon. Member for Carmarthen a second chance. I hope that, when he winds up, he will tell us exactly what Labour party policy is now, today, on enterprise zones. It may have changed from yesterday. That is quite possible, as we have seen Labour party policy change before within a short time and on an ad hoc basis. I hope the hon. Member will respond directly to the point, but if he does not I am sure he will give way to my intervention.

If the Labour party is still against enterprise zones, I must warn Opposition Members that that policy will be a vote loser second to none in my constituency. As an issue, it will make Sunday trading look like an afternoon tea party. Since designation, 500 new jobs have been created in the Delyn enterprise zone. That is a remarkable achievement when one considers that for nearly 18 months after designation only two and a half acres of development land were available due to the extensive nature of existing industrial dereliction. The council has now completed its reclamation programme and it has carried out a substantial proportion of essential infrastructure works. As a result, during the past year there has been a quite remarkable response to the opportunities now offered by the Delyn enterprise zone—three new factories were completed, two are under construction, four sites are under offer with the potential of 700 jobs and only three sites totalling just over seven acres are not under offer.

I emphasise the words in the Delyn borough council's report on the enterprise zone:

"Enterprise zone benefits have been the critical factor in securing the location and development of each of these companies."

Considerable public sector pump priming has secured significant private sector commitments and new small businesses are beginning to develop. Much has been achieved, and great credit is due to all those involved—particularly to the local borough council, and to the councillors of all parties who have worked so hard together.

The Labour party at the local councillor level seems to have a vision and a far-sightedness not shared by the Opposition Front Bench. I have tried to get them to convert the Opposition Front Bench, and I hope that in time—after another election defeat or perhaps the one after that—they will be persuaded. Great credit is due not only to the borough council but also to the Welsh Office, which has supported it. I am delighted to give way to the hon. Member for Carmarthen.

Dr. Roger Thomas: Will the hon. Member tell us, despite the near-miracle which he has described to us this evening, what has been the actual fall in unemployment in his travel-to-work area?

Mr. Raffan: I will come to the economic statistics later. I shall be quite happy to give these statistics to the hon. Member as I come to them later in my speech, if he will allow me to do so. I have no intention of hiding them. Indeed, I had planned to give them to the House. They are, sadly, very high. There has been a significant increase in employment which would not otherwise have happened but for the determined action of the borough council.

I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman by his words seems to imply an attack upon the local Labour councillors. Such an increase in jobs would not have been achieved but for the determined efforts of the borough council, supported imaginatively and effectively in financial terms by the Welsh Office. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not being affected by the disease which afflicts the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside, for his intervention has boomeranged.

Dr. Roger Thomas rose——

Mr. Raffan: No, once is enough—I do not want to mutilate the hon. Gentleman.

Much has been achieved and great credit is due to all those involved. More would have been achieved—I hope the hon. Member for Carmarthen, as he is taking such a close interest in my speech, will support me—but for the tight physical constraints of the enterprise zone. There is a limited area of land available for development. This is preventing the enterprise zone from realising its full potential in contributing to the economic regeneration of north-east Wales.

The problem which the Delyn enterprise zone faces is simply its small size. It extends to only 263 acres, whereas the average for all enterprise zones in the United Kingdom is 360 acres. The amount of land available for development is in fact considerably smaller than 263 acres—only 136 are capable of being developed and only 89 of those are available for genuinely new development. The extension of the Delyn enterprise zone to cover the former Courtaulds Greenfield site would make up that deficiency and add 102 acres. That would bring the zone up to the average size for enterprise zones in Britain.

I know that the extension of the zone is ultimately a matter for the Treasury, but I hope that Delyn borough council and I can count on my right hon. Friend's strong support for the application to extend the zone. We want an average-sized zone—the same size as the enterprise zone in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. The redevelopment of the Greenfield site and its inclusion in the enterprise zone will not only create jobs for Delyn residents. The review of the Clwyd structure plan has identified a shortfall of between 70 and 122 acres of industrial land in the boroughs of Rhuddlan and Colwyn. The addition of Greenfield would help make up that deficiency.

We must remember the famed mobility of the local work force in north Wales and the fact that over a third of the former Courtaulds Greenfield work force actually live in the borough of Rhuddlan. The redevelopment of the Greenfield site and its inclusion in the zone would of course principally help the town of Holywell, where one in four of the working population were employed at Greenfield.

I now come to the statistics for which the hon. Member for Carmarthen asked earlier. I always answer his questions; I hope that he will take note of that.

In January 1985, the unemployment rate in the Holywell jobcentre area — before the closure — was already 27·1 per cent. The male unemployment rate was even higher—tragically higher—at 30·5 per cent.

As many hon. Members will know, Holywell was at the heart of the industrial revolution in north Wales. But as L and R Leisure Consultants says in the Holywell regeneration study which it has prepared for the borough council,

> "Industrial life has drained out of Holywell . . . Mold has developed as an administrative and cultural centre. Flint is the focus of new industrial activity".

I might add that the fourth town in my constituency—Prestatyn—is established as a seaside holiday resort and retirement area. Holywell is the unemployment 'blackest' spot in an area, which has suffered from massive structural unemployment.

As I am sure the hon. Member for Carmarthen will concede, that has not simply happened since May 1979, when the Prime Minister crossed the threshold of 10 Downing street. The area has suffered from massive structural unemployment during the last 20 years. If the hon. Gentleman wishes, I shall give him the figures for the closures in my constituency during the time of the last Labour Government. I am sure that he will not share the amnesia of his hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) and forget that, during the time of the last Labour Government, unemployent doubled in the Principality.

That massive structural unemployment occurred because of an overdependence on the steel and textile industries. The destruction of our far too narrowly based local economy in Delyn means that we must do nothing less than create a new and much more widely based local economy if we are to make a significant impact upon unemployment in the area.

In Delyn, as is widely conceded by Ministers, officials and Members of Parliament, we have an enterprising and determined local authority. We have a labour force which Dr. Norman Wooding, deputy chairman of Courtaulds, has described as second to none, first class, hard working, highly motivated and extremely flexible. Dr. Wooding has gone further and said that he is personally prepared to recommend that work force to any company that is thinking of moving into my constituency.

All we need is for the land available for industrial development at Greenfield to be given enterprise zone status. When fully developed, Greenfield will have the potential of creating approximately 2,300 jobs, which will go a long way towards tackling the local unemployment problem. I repeat that the borough council deserves every credit for its determination, hard work, and imaginative drive to regenerate the local economy. In response to its straightforwardness, its direct approach and determination, I hope that the Government will continue to give in the future the very strong support that they have given in the past.

I have described developments in Delyn over the past year. I have given the good news—and it is good news —with significant expectations and hopes for the future. The picture that I have painted is true, but it is at variance, in sharp contrast, with the speech of the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside. That does not surprise those of us who have heard the hon. Gentleman's speeches in the past.

The hon. Gentleman belongs to the "weeping and gnashing of teeth" school of parliamentary oratory. As the Bible adds:

> "Behold he cometh with clouds."

The trouble is that, at the sight of the hon. Gentleman and his clouds, potential inward investors may flee. They do not know the hon. Gentleman with the same affection as we do. They do not hear him deliver his speeches, but merely read reports of his words. If they had to listen to him, they might be less convinced. In Nye Bevan's words, they might realise that he seems determined to make a trumpet sound like a tin whistle. Indeed, the hon. Gentleman's hectoring style is about as convincing as the last balcony speech of President Marcos before he made a quick getaway in an American helicopter.

The hon. Gentleman carries no conviction. We Conservatives know what he is up to. Like Marshal Foch —and Marshal Foch's words are highly appropriate to the Labour party—he says:

> "My centre is giving way, my right is in retreat; situation excellent. I shall attack."

The only slight trouble is that the hon. Gentleman lacks Foch's generalship, his style and his infantry.

If I were in the hon. Gentleman's shoes I would follow exactly the same strategy, although—I say this with my usual modesty—I would not make quite the same mess of it. How can anyone defend the last Labour Government, least of all the hon. Gentleman, who served in it, when they made a 20 per cent. cut in total capital expenditure, a 38 per cent. cut in NHS capital expenditure and a 36 per cent. cut in capital and current expenditure on roads?

The hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) has suddenly found an attraction in his pencil. How can anyone, least of all the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside, defend that record when faced by a Government who have raised capital spending in the NHS by 12 per cent. in real terms and on roads by 10 per cent. in real terms, and when faced by the Secretary of State who in 1986-87 has increased local authority capital allocations by 23 per cent. and urban programme expenditure by 20 per cent.?

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Has my hon. Friend noticed the contrast between the correct picture that he has painted of a united area trying to regenerate the district and the characteristic support that the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) gave to a Labour councillor in Alyn and Deeside who said that I and the Welsh Office were not welcome in that district? That is absolutely characteristic of the destructive intervention that my hon. Friend has been describing.

Mr. Raffan: I wholeheartedly agree with my right hon. Friend. Humour apart, it is more than destructive. It is tragic that the Labour party for petty party political purposes, in order to scrounge a few votes, should demean itself by such a totally unacceptable and unjustifiable attack upon my right hon. Friend, his fellow Ministers and the officials of the Welsh Office. The Labour party should at least give credit where it is due, and applaud the achievements of the Welsh Office and the local authority to which I have referred.

I am a modest man, even though I have a 6,000 majority in my constituency. I do not regard that as safe, although like Churchill I believe that a majority of one is enough. I intend to have a majority of 16,000 at the next general election, and speeches such as that we have heard from the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside will enable me to convert my constituency into a permanently safe Conservative seat. The hon. Gentleman will not give credit to the Government's real achievements. He paints a black picture of Wales, which drives off not only inward investors but also companies from England and within our own community that wish to create new jobs. It is tragic that the hon. Gentleman demeans himself in that way.

I have sympathy—almost amounting to pity—for the hon. Gentleman. After all, he must worry not only about his past, but also about the future. The then second permanent secretary to the Treasury described the first year of the 1974 Wilson Goverment as a period "of collective madness". The madness that the Labour party now has planned would be infinitely longer, more intense and more painful should it ever be given the opportunity to implement its policies.

Generously leaving out one-off promises, at which the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside is so adept, as well as renationalisation—which I know is embarrassing for the Labour party, given that the Leader of the Opposition says that it is not a top priority whereas the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) says that it must be—the Treasury has calculated the cost of Labour pledges to be £24 billion a year. There are only three ways in which to raise the money to pay for that extraordinary bill—to tax, to borrow or to print. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) has said that he will not raise the basic rate of tax to pay that bill, although he will increase the tax on those earning more than £30,000 a year. Even a 100 per cent. increase in tax on people earning more than £30,000 a year would raise only £1·5 billion, still leaving him with a somewhat uncomfortably large bill of £22·5 billion. Opposition Members could follow the helpful suggestion of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and increase value added tax, but it would have to be to 41 per cent., which might cause them slight problems.

I think that the Opposition will negotiate with Rupert Murdoch, buy his old printing presses, move them to Llantrisant and start printing notes like there was no tomorrow.

I am not surprised that the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside is not prepared to defend either his record or his party's policy for the future. If Labour's continuing——

Mr. Wardell: Leave him alone.

Mr. Raffan: I am working very hard, overtime for the hon. Member's promotion. He should be grateful.

If Labour's continuing civil war, and Militant and Mr. Hatton, do not put people off the Labour party, their policies surely will. They carry no credibility. They create only incredulity. Their former leader Lord Wilson of Rievaulx, now revered, considering those who have followed, put it in a nutshell:

"Labour gives a pantomime performance. It is a party of prehistoric policies."

We have had this evening yet another pantomime performance from Labour.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): I will not follow the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan). That type of supercilious speech ends in electoral defeat. We shall wait for the electorate to decide. I suspect that, after the next general election, my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) will be here and that the hon. Member for Delyn will not.

I want to look forward to a much more interesting and important aspect of the debate and to respond to the initiative that the Secretary of State launched this afternoon in the document "Community Investment: An Initiative for the Valleys". It will inevitably be a first response because the documents needs to be considered with great care. The hon. Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Grist) said that we come here and run down our communities. I do not believe that we have ever done that. Those of us who represent communities to which this initiative is directed spend our time arguing, fighting and campaigning for the very community investment that the document's title suggests.

I hope that we reflect pride, commitment and belief in our communities. We have lots of problems, and directing attention to them here should not be taken as running down or knocking our communities. We know and understand our problems and we feel angry about them, so we come here and express them.

The document purports to be an initiative on community investment, and to direct itself towards the environmental problems and challenges of our communities. It is not very difficult to identify those environmental problems—they are very easily observed and do not require detailed analysis. We witness them and live among them.

I would categorise the dereliction in three forms. The first is the huge, historic backlog of dereliction left to us by the Victorian coal owners and the iron masters in, for example, Merthyr Tydfil, Dowlais and Rhymney. It is a backlog of blasts, indiscriminate tipping and wasted land down the lines of our major roads, in and out of our communities. Such land overlooks the church that I attend —Christ church Cyfarthfa—and stands cheek by jowl with homes.

The second form of dereliction is to be found in and around urban centres. We have become increasingly resigned to it and accept conditions that would not be tolerated in other communities. The process starts with the decline of one of the traditional commercial properties or retail outlets that cannot keep up with the retailing revolution. The shop falls empty. Sometimes it just remains empty and sometimes it falls into such disrepair that it is cleared, so that only rubble is left. The rubble is almost as bad as the empty property. Such properties are often in the very heart of the town.

We have accepted a third form of dereliction. I still feel angry about it, but I cannot get my own people to feel the same way. It is what I call doorstep dereliction. It is found in ordinary streets. An elderly person dies, for example, and the house falls derelict. The rest of the street might have been redeveloped and have benefited from improvement grants. The problem can arise at the back of houses. The condition of back lanes in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) shook me rigid. Merthyr has done up most of its back lanes, or what we used to call gullies. Unmade lanes still survive, though. They grow weeds, such as those from which we used to make pea shooters. I accepted that as part of life. Derelict fencing might let the sheep in, which makes this doorstep dereliction worse.

I hope that I am not painting a picture of a derelict community, for it is far from that. The communities are tremendously vibrant. There is commitment. The money spent on homes shows people's determination to develop and improve. Nevertheless, the problems exist. It is against that background that I consider the community investment initiative to see whether it measures up to our need.

Mr. Stefan Terlezki (Cardiff, West): I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's anxiety about dereliction and the environment. Will he admit that Labour was in power for 15-odd years? The hon. Gentleman was a member of a Labour Government. What has he done about the environment and dereliction in his area?

Mr. Rowlands: I should not have given way to the hon. Gentleman, as I was trying to address myself to the future. If he wants me to accept some collective guilt from the past, I shall by all means take my modest percentage of it, but that is not the argument. We must try to improve matters. There was tremendous improvement under Labour. Perhaps it was unfortunate that we handed the running of derelict land reclamation schemes over to the Welsh Development Agency. I had the privilege to be a Minister in 1969 and again in 1974-75, and I saw what could be done through an expansive derelict land reclamation programme run by the Welsh Office. Each five years we should see progress and development. We are measuring progress and making demands for present and future community investment against that backlog.

I have read the document only since lunchtime, and I find it difficult to understand. It is curious, and I am not sure what to make of it. Paragraph 14 deals with the objectives, and states:

"The Government is anxious, therefore, with the co-operation of local authorities and the communities they represent. . . to help to bring about substantial"— that is the key word—

"and visible improvements in the valleys and the environment of town centre areas and the areas immediately leading to them."

The message is that the Welsh Office and the Secretary of State, together with local authorities and community groups, will launch a substantial, visible improvement to our environment, both in the town centres and areas leading to them. I then looked at the document to see how we are to co-ordinate and finance that substantial improvement. Appendix I contains an illustrative list, which includes my constituency. I hope that it is not too parochial to use the illustration of my constituency.

One of the major needs in a community such as mine is to make the access to and from it as attractive as possible. The road built from Treharris Quaker's yard is a fine piece of engineering and, environmentally, a most attractive road as it opens up the valley. If I were driving an inward investor along that road even on a cold day with snow on the hilltops, it would give him a remarkably romantic introduction to our community. The road is designed sensitively, and I pay tribute to the designers for some of the finishing touches. The trouble is that then one hits the bottom of the valley and the next major area connecting Merthyr with the midlands is the slip road. It provides the major access to the Heads of the Valleys. I do my damndest to ensure that no one goes near that slip road if I can help it because it reveals the backlog of dereliction and the consequences of large-scale opencast mining. Virtually half the length of a major access road to our community is a disaster area in reclamation terms.

For that reason I turned with eagerness to see how the Government's initiative would address itself to such an area. Paragraph 1.2 of the Merthyr Tydfil illustration states:

"The approach to Merthyr Town Centre . . . is inevitably influenced by the somewhat bleak scenery and exposed nature of the road. While it is not easy to grow a great variety of trees in these conditions, much could be done by planting shelter belts and removing some of the more unattractive eyesores on the northern fringe of the town."

That worries me, especially as I would like to assist the programme to make it work, because it implies that the scheme is about planting and painting. I hope that the Secretary of State does not want to leave us with that impression. The access problem cannot be about the gentle issues of clearing up eyesores and investing in more tree planting. I am not demeaning or dismissing those ideas. Indeed, they have a place in our town centres, as other paragraphs suggest, and we can certainly produce such projects. However, the environmental access problem of my community requires a significant vision of change to the environment. It must also include the decision whether to allow opencast mining along the line of the road. That could continue the dereliction for years to come.

My worry about the document is that, compared with its objectives, some of the illustrations show an ambivalence to facing up to what are not small projects —although small projects are useful and important—and to substantial investment in the community.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: We are looking for a combination of big and small. I am listening with great attention to the hon. Gentleman's speech, and I hope that he will recognise that what we have done in Cardiff is beginning to trigger a major change. I hope that by a combination and variety of initiatives we can trigger a similar change of comparable scale. In putting forward suggestions, we are merely giving some direction to stimulate proposals. I welcome the type of proposals that the hon. Gentleman is making now.

Mr. Rowlands: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for intervening. As this is an important initiative affecting all our communities I shall spend a few more minutes on it. We shall want to fasten on to the triggering-off concept. The Secretary of State may have to convince us further that the initiative can work in Dowlais and Merthyr, as well as in south Cardiff and the docks. We must first understand the nature and character of the environmental problem with which we are grappling.

In paragraph 1.7 two different propositions about the environmental needs of the community stand cheek by jowl. One is tree planting along the river Taff. The point is made that sometimes jobs are half done and dereliction is not cleared up, even after important investment, such as in the Morlais Brook scheme. A huge slag heap lies behind and overlooks the technical college. We have campaigned for a considerable time for capital reinvestment to do something about that.

The Welsh Development Agency has treated land reclamation schemes which do not produce immediate industrial land as Cinderellas. The figures sound impressive, but matched against the needs and previous programmes in real terms, I am not sure that the WDA has given priority to investment in first-class land reclamation schemes of the type that we have been seeking. I hope that the document will act as a catalyst in bringing the WDA, the Welsh Office, local authorities and local community groups together to ensure that the WDA plays a bigger and more prominent role than it has. During the past few years, the WDA has been less interested in that aspect of its functions.

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman is making an important point. I think that the WDA would say that it was a priority to prepare the ground for industrial sites in the recent past. However, the chairman has asked me to ensure that the WDA plays a major part in this initiative. It wishes to be involved in it, and regards it as a priority. It will seek to direct the resources for this type of objective.

Mr. Rowlands: I am grateful for that extremely important statement. The investment aspect in the document is extremely important, and the role of the development agency will be vital in making this community investment initiative work.

We have valuable land lying in wait close to, and in, the town centre. The document illustrates the case of the major railway site. I add to that the major Georgetown site, which is super. It is close to the town centre, but at the moment it looks as if it is developing—I hope I am not being critical of the borough council—in a piecemeal fashion. One grabs what one can. If somebody volunteers to carry out a big development on part of the site, rather than wait for a comprehensive and enveloping investment scheme, one grabs the first opportunity, because at least one has done something rather than wait for the grand design, for which one can wait for ever. Many local authorities have tended to go for piecemeal developments on sites such as the one about which I am talking.

We have looked with some envy at the way in which the south Cardiff scheme has got off the ground. Here is an opportunity that we would love to see in our area. We have no political hang-ups about the ideology of private investment combined with public investment to develop the community, as long as the developments are ones that we require and have mutually agreed.

I have been to the director of a major store and pleaded with him to look at the major central site close to the station. It is one of the prize Heads of the Valleys retailing or commercial sites. We have found that it is much harder, being 40 miles north of Cardiff, to trigger off the combination of public and private investment. Rather than say that we know everything, I would be grateful if the Secretary of State would help us to trigger off a Swansea or south Cardiff-type development. That would be ideal and would help us to balance the growing pressure on Cardiff and Swansea.

The director of one of the major retailing outlets told me that the Cardiff and Swansea developments are having a major sucking-in effect, and even the in-between communities such as Pontypridd are finding it harder to get such investment going. I do not say that the Secretary of State has a magic wand, but if he can help us to trigger off such developments and to achieve the success stories of Swansea and Cardiff, Merthyr borough council would, I believe, be the first to welcome it and give four cheers for it.

Mr. Williams: We are proud of what has happened in Swansea, as I expect that Cardiff Members are proud of what has happened there. However, one must recognise that real eyesores—the old dead docks—have turned into assets that are readily convertible and have created premium sites. Therefore, it has been relatively easy to attract private capital. The problem that my hon. Friend faces, for example with the coal tip, is that even when it is cleared, it is by no stretch of the imagination a premium site. Therefore, his area will need a larger infusion of public capital than the coastal strip needed.

Mr. Rowlands: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for underlining my point, which he has made rather better because of his experience and understanding of what happened in Swansea. Any results from the document will be dependent upon triggering off the mixture of public and private investment.

We want this community investment programme to work. We wish to give every support that we can to the initiative. We do not want it to be, and I am glad to understand that it will not and cannot be, a small-time paint and planting exercise. It must be something much bigger and more expensive. In that regard, I should be grateful if the Minister will tell us a little more about the extra allocations set out in the document. For example, £2 million has been allocated for housing programmes. Will we have to bid for six parcels of the £2 million, can all local authorities come in together, or is it to be selectively offered to two or three local authorities? There is also £1 million for urban provision.

I want to believe that this is the beginning of a major community investment programme. It is what we have fought for and will continue to fight for. However, we are worried that in its resourcing and financial provisions, it will fall short and will end up as nothing more than—useful and important as such things are—a rather better version of earlier schemes to clear up eyesores. I hope that the Secretary of State will come to the Heads of the Valleys standing conference and talk about the document. He has declined a general invitation, so let us make a specific invitation to him to come to discuss the document. We need to learn and listen as much as we want to tell him of our views and feelings.

We have seen remarkable developments on the coastal strip. We, as Members representing the communities in the Heads of the Valleys, want to see such exciting new investment in developments in our communities.

Mr. Robert Harvey (Clwyd, South-West): With the exceptions of the speeches made by the hon. Members for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) and for Gower (Mr. Wardell) on heating allowances, which will strike a chord with many on both sides of the House, speeches by Labour Members have repeated the depressing and dismal litany of despair and gloom that we have heard month after month, week after week. It is all the more depressing because that litany fails to take into account the fact that Wales has a Secretary of State who has pursued one of the most imaginative industrial and economic policies to be found on the island.

We have seen how it is possible for the Government, by acting as an innovator, not a crutch, for dying industries, to stimulate a whole economy. One would have thought that Labour, instead of decrying this new, pioneering, innovative role for the state, would be learning from it and seeing where the old experience of the wrong kind of state interference has strayed. Instead, Labour

Members stick to the old dogmas that today, in the only strongholds that they possess—in Liverpool and in the councils that they still control—are ravaging the lives and well-being of those whom they claim to represent. In Wales, they seek to pull us back into the economic horse and buggy age from which we have emerged.

The strategy of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has been straightforward. It has been to stop wasting taxpayers' money supporting dead-end industries producing goods that no one wants, to stop disguising unemployment by this method and to pursue four major objectives. The first is to stimulate outside investment in Wales. Over the past three years, Wales has obtained about one fifth of all inward investment into the United Kingdom, and visits by overseas companies to Wales have been maintained at 300 annually over the past two years. By any standards, that is a staggering achievement. During the last year alone, 25 overseas companies announced that they were setting up bases in Wales, and there were 23 expansions by companies already operating in the Principality. We have heard a great deal about jobs tonight. Taken together, those projects will create some 2,800 new jobs and safeguard a further 1,300 existing jobs.

The second part of the strategy is to channel all available state aid to the task of creating new jobs. During the last year alone, 143 offers were accepted for regional selective assistance, worth more than £35 million. Those offers will help to create 6,679 new jobs and safeguard a further 4,745 existing jobs. In the five years between 1979 and 1985, 49,000 jobs have been created and 24,000 safeguarded at a cost of £158 million, in contrast to the appalling Labour record of 27,000 jobs created and only 8,000 safeguarded, at a cost of £80 million, in the four preceding years.

The third part of the Welsh Office strategy has been to develop the infrastructure needed to provide those jobs in terms of roads and factory development. Last year 282 units were allocated, creating 4,000 new jobs. The vacancy rate at these factories has now fallen to about 12 per cent. Since 1976 more than 9·6 million sq ft of new factory space has been built, 86 per cent. of it under the present Government's policies.

The fourth part of the Welsh Office strategy has been to pursue that dream of Welsh economists through the decades—diversification away from the two products upon which Wales depended for so long, coal and steel, into everything from colour television and vacuum cleaners to car engines, aircraft wings and printed circuit boards. That has been an imaginative, undoctrinaire strategy, using the state not as a burden or as a drag on industrial development, but as a helpful partner to private enterprise in bringing jobs and prosperity to the people of Wales.

In this debate, as in previous debates, the Opposition have made it clear that they reject this approach. They have a duty, though, to tell the people of Wales what they would do instead. Such fragments of an industrial strategy as one can make out from the mushroom cloud of negative gloom that pervades the Opposition Benches suggest the following. No doubt I shall be corrected if I am wrong.

First, from what it has said, I assume that Labour proposes to reopen those collieries and steelworks that it considers have been unjustifiably closed by this Government. The Opposition have a duty to tell us which ones, how much this will cost and for how long they propose to maintain non-jobs in this way. Are the Opposition able to provide an absolute assurance to those of my constituents who were tossed by a Labour Government on the scrap heap of colliery closures during the 1970s, with a pittance in redundancy payments compared with what has been offered under this Government, that that will never happen again?

The second part of Labour's programme will, I understand, be to undertake major public works projects to get people in Wales back to work. The Opposition have a duty to tell us what projects they are considering, in addition to the massive expenditure on new hospitals and roads that is already being undertaken by the Welsh Office, and by how much taxes will be raised to pay for them, or, if the money is to be printed, by how much they reckon inflation is to be permitted to rise.

Thirdly, a Labour Government would encourage greater local authority capital expenditure. Can the Opposition offer a categorical assurance that capital spending will not be slashed again as it was under the last Labour Government when things start to go wrong, as they inevitably will under their kind of programme?

Fourthly, Labour would direct investment into the areas that it favours. Can the Opposition tell us what will happen if the Japanese firms that have found a welcome in our valleys prefer not to be told what to do and pull out instead, or if the domestic investors that Labour wants to direct prefer to spend their money on consumption rather than to be told where to put it by those with the financial management expertise displayed by the Opposition?

Fifthly, as regards the rural economy, the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) has pledged to slash the European Community food surpluses. Again, I shall no doubt be corrected if I am wrong. Will the Opposition tell the House and the nation what effect that would have on the small rural communities of Wales that are already struggling in an increasingly hostile environment? I do not believe that the present farm crisis is being taken seriously enough by the Government. In Wales the effects have mercifully not been felt as badly as in the rest of Britain, which suffered a 43 per cent. fall in farming incomes last year. Nevertheless, the farm management survey, just published for 1984-85, shows that there has been a fall of 10 per cent. in the dairy and livestock sectors over the year. Net incomes in the dairy sector have fallen by 28 per cent.

I am also critical of the decision by the Welsh Office to subordinate justice to administrative convenience in the granting of the otherwise very welcome bad weather payments last autumn. But let the Labour party, for goodness sake, stop pretending that it has the interests of that capitalist class of farmers at heart and tell us how many farmers it intends to put out of business by reducing agricultural surpluses.

I shall end with a word about unemployment. Unemployment in Wales and in Britain is too high. I believe that in the next Budget the problem must be addressed directly, along the lines suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for the Vale of Glamorgan (Sir R. Gower). I hope that the unions will play their part in addressing the problem by ending their practice of seeking higher and higher wages for those in work at the expense of those who are out of work. I am convinced that anything like the industrial strategy proposed by the Labour party would have a devastating effect upon the jobs and prosperity of Wales. The Opposition seem to be incapable of learning from experience, but I urge them to take a leaf out of the Government's book and to start putting the state at the service of Wales, not Wales at the service of the state.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): No amount of huffing, puffing and posturing by Conservative Members can mask the fact that for Wales this period of Conservative government has been a painful and unmitigated disaster.

I wish to associate my remarks with those of my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) who referred to the report that was published this afternoon by the Welsh Office, "Community Investment: An Initiative for the Valleys." He made a passionate case for the valleys, a case that the Opposition have made constantly since 1979 when this Government came to office, and he spoke for all Opposition Members who represent the valleys of south Wales. We feel passionately about the problems that face our communities —the dreadful unemployment rate, the waste of young and middle aged people who want to work but who cannot find work. Day after day they write out applications for jobs. When one has completed 50 or more applications but still has not been offered an interview, one can imagine —perhaps some cannot—the despondency felt by those people. They see no hope.

A man of 35 came to my surgery and told me about his attempts to get a job in Cynon Valley, which has the highest male unemployment rate in Wales and one of the highest male unemployment rates of any industrial area in the United Kingdom. As he went out of the door, he said, "I feel like throwing myself in the river." What does a Member of Parliament say to somebody who feels like doing that? Can one talk about hope? During the almost two years that I have been the Member of Parliament for Cynon Valley, I have seen the unemployment rate climb relentlessly month by month. That is why Labour Members constantly ask the Secretary of State what is to happen about jobs.

I welcome the report as a recognition of the improvements needed in the valley communities, but I must ask, as my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) asked: how many jobs will the proposals in the report produce? I appreciate that that question may be difficult to answer at this stage, but it is one of the most pressing questions in the constituencies that most of us represent. I hope that in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney the Minister will give more information about the £2 million capital allocation for housing and the £1 million urban programme resources mentioned in the report.

I agree that it is important to do something about the environmental problems in the valley areas, especially as we know that industrialists coming to an area look specifically for a good environment. We need to be more scientific about this in Wales, and in Britain as a whole, to discover precisely why industrialists go to some areas and not to others. The Irish Government have carried out a proper scientific analysis. One of the researchers on that project told me how surprised he was that Britain did not carry out similar analyses. My right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) will recall that when the steel industry in his constituency was decimated the local council carried out its own investigation into why industrialists would or would not come to the area. That type of analysis should be carried out systematically and scientifically throughout the country. I hope that the Welsh Office will give special consideration to that aspect.

One of the worst aspects of the environment in the areas that we represent is poor housing. In the valleys of south Wales there is massive and appalling urban deprivation, which is increasingly unlikely to be tackled in view of the pitiful financial resources at the disposal of local authorities. In a recent study, the Cynon Valley, Merthyr and Rhondda were identified as the three most deprived districts of England and Wales. In the Cynon valley, 92 per cent. of private housing stock—about 40,000 houses —is in an unsatisfactory condition, and 48 per cent. of private houses have been deemed unfit for human habitation. The cost of rehabilitating the housing stock in that one valley is estimated at nearly £105 million. As the Secretary of State knows, the county council has been pressing for extra funds under the urban development programme, but I am sceptical about the likely result. The £2 million capital allocation for local authority housing will not even scratch the surface of the problems of one valley.

I do not wish to be churlish about the report, but I am sure that I speak for all my hon. Friends when I say that we hoped for a lion, but have been given a mouse. To deal with the problems of the south Wales valleys we needed a roar of indignation followed by resources on the scale that those problems require. Instead, we have been given a squeak, although even a squeak is welcome.

The Cynon valley has one of the biggest environmental pollution problems in Britain—the Phurnacite plant at Abercwmboi. The loss of any jobs in the valley is to be deplored, and that plant provides 600 jobs. Since the coal dispute ended, the pollution from that plant has increased, but it is difficult for people in the area to protest because the jobs are so badly needed. Last week 14 members of the Abercwmboi anti-pollution lobby came to my surgery and dumped bags of soot on the table in front of me— the result of just one night's emissions from the Phurnacite plant. When I asked how many of those people worked at the plant or had relatives who worked there, not one hand went up. Yet again, the pollution of the environment had to be balanced against the number of jobs provided.

If the Secretary of State is serious about dealing with the environmental problems of the valleys, and especially of the Cynon valley, he must ensure that the National Coal Board behaves responsibly towards residents in the area. People need the jobs but they do not need the current levels of pollution. Any responsible industry would ensure that people do not have to suffer such pollution just because they need the jobs. It is essential that pollution in the Cynon valley should be properly controlled.

The pollution from the Phurnacite plant is the first thing that people see when they come down the new road. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney, I welcome new roads. I only wish that the road to Merthyr came through the Cynon valley, but I am glad that my hon. Friend has such a splendid road in his constituency and that we have the important link road into the Cynon valley. I hope that there will be many more such developments. I certainly do not wish to vie for resources with my hon. Friend in the neighbouring valley, but in the present situation that is almost inevitable.

The Secretary of State and I constantly argue about Japanese firms. I should make it clear that we welcome any investment, Japanese or otherwise, in an area of such high unemployment. My only objection to the firm in question was to some of its employment practices. I am sure that the Government and Members on both sides deplore the pressure put on workers to take so-called voluntary redundancy because they had reached the age of 35 and were regarded as over the hill. I hope such practices are not common to Japanese firms generally and that there will be no repetition of a practice which I think the firm now admits to have been a serious error of judgment as well as a serious error in public relations.

The Secretary of State talks about community self-help in his report. We are not short of ideas, and he is well aware of that. My council has applied for money for industrial and commercial development in Aberdare, which is mentioned in the report. It wanted money to develop the commercial sector of Aberdare and various other corridors of land in the older industrial areas. It asked for £210,000. So far it has received £125,000. That is obviously not enough, and it needs the balance. An idea has been put forward which the council would put into action if only it had the money.

The council also wants to reclaim derelict land. My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney talked about some of the worst eyesores in his area. One of the worst in my area is opposite the Phurnacite plant. It is a large hill, with black stumps of trees, which is burning underneath. Clouds of smoke can sometimes be seen above the trees. That is an obvious eyesore. It is on the main road and it needs to be removed if it is not to deter industrialists from coming to the area.

My council has put forward a list of schemes to the Welsh Development Agency for the forthcoming financial year. The total sum is in millions rather than thousands of pounds. The basic objective is to clear as many derelict sites as possible for the benefit of industry and the environment. The main schemes are Cmw Cynon and Deep Dyffryn, for which it needs £1·2 million; Aberaman and Cwm Neol colliery sites, Aberaman, for which it needs £1·1 million; and Penrhiwceiber colliery for which it needs £518,000. The council has ideas about clearing those sites, but again it needs the cash to do the job. If the Secretary of State is serious about wanting to clear up the environment in the Cynon valley, he will know that the council has put forward schemes for which it would be pleased to receive the necessary sums of money.

Where people live has important bearings on their health and well-being. Poor housing stock and low levels of household amenities are recognised signs of social deprivation. They increase the difficulties faced by people in coping with illness at home. They also militate against the early discharge of patients from hospital, particularly for families with young children and elderly people.

The south Wales housing officer group produced a report in 1984 which drew attention to the special housing problems in Wales which are compounded by the high percentage of pre-1919 homes compared with the rest of the United Kingdom; the high percentage of houses lacking basic amenities compared with England; the low level of spending per head on housing in Wales; and the particular problems of the elderly and other unwaged groups who tend to be concentrated in unfit housing.

We have heard a lot about severe weather payments, and we know that many elderly, particularly in our valley communities, are suffering because of bad housing. Many of those people have low incomes and are unable to improve their houses, even if they live in private accommodation, because they do not have the income to do so. Many elderly people come to our surgeries and show us how they spend their money, how much they get by way of pension and how little they can afford to spend on heating. Therefore, the improvement of the housing stock is necessary to improve their conditions as well. In 1984 that report concluded that a housing crisis lay ahead unless urgent action was taken to allocate resources for house building and renovation.

The Mid Glamorgan report on deprivation and health drew attention to the particular needs of the Health Service for people in Mid Glamorgan. It talked about the Black report, which drew attention to the association between social class and health, to the increased levels of illness among unskilled workers and to the links between poverty and ill health. The authority's strategic plan highlighted those statements and concluded:

"It will be necessary to exercise positive discrimination to the benefit of those communities in Mid Glamorgan whose social structure implies a greater need for services."

The Royal Commission on the National Health Service, of which I was a member, suggested that community health services are often inadequate in areas of social deprivation and that improvements are ugently needed. The Royal College of General Practitioners' survey of primary care and the Acheson report described geographical variations both in the problems encountered by primary health care teams and in the characteristics of primary care services delivered.

In the past, following the 1971 census, considerable efforts were made to analyse the collected data. Areas of multiple deprivation, broadly defined by the excessive presence of those factors which together show a low level of welfare, have been the target for social planning, particularly in the context of the physical environment in the past. Policies for positive discrimination are already, to a limited extent, present in the nation's health care strategies and RAWP, SHARE and SCRAW embrace a belief that areas of greater need should receive more resources.

Health care services alone cannot resolve all the problems identified in areas of social deprivation, but adverse social economic and environmental factors affect a disproportionate number of households in Mid Glamorgan. I have previously gone in some detail into the links between unemployment and health, and I shall not do so again this evening. There has been a lot of research into the effects of unemployment on death and sickness among people out of work, their spouses and families.

The work of people such as Harvey Brenner has shown a consistent relationship between depressions in national economies and changes in the death rate. A recent British study compared mortality rates among the unemployed and the employed in the week before the 1971 census. It clearly demonstrated excessive numbers of deaths among the unemployed, even after allowing for socio-economic differences between the groups.

There is, and there has been for 50 years, enough evidence to show that the duration of unemployment is associated with poor health and even death. In 1984 Mid Glamorgan had a higher unemployment rate for men and women who had been out of employment for one year or more than for Wales or for England and Wales together.

[Mrs. Ann Clwyd]

Long-term male unemployment is particularly high in the Cynon, Rhymney and Rhondda valleys, and the effect of long-term unemployment on the health of men and women out of work and their families has not been taken into account by the Welsh Office in its calculations.

All the evidence shows that Mid Glamorgan, with its large population, suffers disproportionate levels of illness and disability and at the same time suffers high levels of adverse social conditions, greater than other areas in Wales and England, and that is not simply a matter of the environment.

Much as I want to welcome the report—and I hope that I have been positive in my appreciation of some of the problems that it proposes to tackle—the other areas that I have mentioned this evening must also be taken into account and acted upon because they also affect people in the valleys of south Wales who are looking to the Government for an answer to the intolerable situation in which they find themselves.

Mr. Stefan Terlezki (Cardiff, West): I shall not take up the remarks of the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd). Her speech was long and was not of great substance. She shed quite a few crocodile tears and indulged in a good deal of rhetoric.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Grist) mentioned Councillor Bob Morgan, the leader of the South Glamorgan county council. I remember Councillor Morgan saying that the Labour party in Wales is a broad church. If it is, it will need a broad churchyard to go with it. It is clear that a shepherd like Councillor Morgan is a leader only of sheep.

There is the presence of the Liberal-SDP alliance on the South Glamorgan county council. Part of that alliance is formed by the semi-desperate people who want Socialist policies as long as they do not impinge upon them personally.

Before I address myself to the South Glamorgan county council and my constituency, I shall make a few comments about the assertion of Opposition Members that the National Health Service has been subject to cuts, cuts and more cuts and that the Government have an uncaring attitude towards the NHS.

Since the 1983 general election, Labour party spokesmen have shamelessly promised the earth to every conceivable interest group. The cost of the Labour party's commitments has been calculated by the Treasury as £24 billion annually. I intend to give the facts and figures clearly so that they will not be misquoted by Opposition Members and will not be misrepresented in the propagamda leaflets which they so readily distribute in their constituencies.

The Labour party has a clear duty to explain how it would finance the introduction of a 38-hour working week, minimum wages and huge council house building programmes that would involve the expenditure of many billions of pounds. It appears that the VAT rate would have to be increased to no less than 41 per cent. to meet indirect costs. If the Labour party does not accept that its programme would lead to the expenditure of £24 billion annually, it must explain to the country generally, to Labour-controlled constituencies and to the House which items of its programme it will abandon. If it decides not to take either course, it will confirm that it has not moved forward from the apology of a programme that it put forward during the 1983 general election.

The Labour shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), has been forced to acknowledge the scale of the Government's achievement. The right hon. Gentleman has admitted that the Government are right to say that, allowing for the normal corrections for inflation, health spending during the past six years had increased by 20 per cent. Where are the cuts talked about by Opposition Members, when their finance spokesman has stated categorically that expenditure on health provision has increased by 20 per cent. in real terms? That means that that area of spending is breaking all previous records. Top priority will continue to be given to the NHS and by 1988 NHS spending of £20 billion will mean that this item will be second only to spending on social security.

One of the greatest hospital building programmes ever is under way. The Opposition should realise that 58 major schemes, each costing over £2 million, have been completed. Nearly 150 more schemes are being planned, designed or built. In 1984, over 6 million in-patient cases were treated, which was 800,000 more than in 1978. There were 37 million out-patient attendances in 1984, over 3 million more than in 1978. Over 112,000 more elderly patients were treated in our hospitals in 1984 than in 1978. Kidney transplant operations increased by over 50 per cent. There are 5,000 more hospital doctors and nurses, 3,000 more general practitioners and 58,000 more nurses and midwives working to provide better patient care.

That is the national picture but it alone will not counter the talk of cuts, cuts and more cuts. It is the practical evidence of the results of record spending, especially in the form of new and improved hospitals, that will convince voters in different localities that the NHS is safe with the Conservative Government.

We can go to extremes and talk about expenditure of £24 billion, but where is the £24 billion to come from? Would a Labour Government borrow to finance that level of expenditure? Labour Members should realise that, when money is borrowed, the borrower has to pay interest. We all know that the previous Labour Government borrowed and that the borrowings still have to be paid back with interest. If it is Labour party policy to increase taxation and print money like confetti, how is it to face the nation in advocating such a programme? Does the Labour party want to bankrupt Britain? Does it want to return to the winter of discontent? Does it want to return to 28 per cent. inflation? Does it want to take the country back to the power which was once held by trade union barons? Does it want to take us back to the IMF and to mortgage Britain for generations to come? There is no alternative to facing the facts and to carrying on as best we can with the resources at our disposal.

We are all extremely sorry that unemployment is so high. Nothing would please me more than to see thousands of my constituents rising at 5 am or 6 am, clocking in at 7 am and working until 5 pm five days a week, earning wages unashamedly and being proud of having a job. I want to see that. I am sure that we would all like to see buses, cars and bicycles filling our streets in the mornings with people going to work in industries and coal mines for a week, a month, a year, or the rest of their lives.

There is no magic wand. It does not matter how much rhetoric there is or how much we pull the punches—the fact is that we are part and parcel of the industrial world. Unemployment is worldwide. Unless the shop stewards, trade union leaders, management and work force get together, decide what is good for their jobs and industries and put their backs into the work we cannot expect unemployment to decrease. We must never price ourselves out of work. If we ask for wages in two, three or four figures, we shall create unemployment and, once again, hon. Members will be crying crocodile tears because unemployment has increased.

Unemployment will be sustained as long as we cannot compete and as long as we price ourselves out of employment. Some union leaders—I would call them apparatchiks—stop at nothing but continually demand money on the table before using their tools. Unless we compete, we shall always be in the fourth division and not in the first where we belong.

Mr. Brynmor John (Pontypridd): The hon. Gentleman wants to be the new chairman of Cardiff City.

Mr. Terlezki: I hope that the team will be in the second division next year.

I should like to consider my constituency, especially South Glamorgan county council and Cardiff city council. It is intolerable and unacceptable that South Glamorgan county council intends to increase rates by about 25 per cent. As a former member of the South Glamorgan county council, I assure the House that, before the election, Labour party members were politically bribing the electorate, promising anything and everything. They were promising to build bridges where there were no rivers, no highways or railway tracks. They were promising everything just for a vote. Now they have been elected, they are robbing the electorate.

It is true that, if one allows a Socialist a free hand, he will put it in the ratepayer's pocket. Before the ratepayer realises what is happening, £50, £70 or £100 a year will be levied in increased rates. First it is bribery and then it is robbery. That is typical of Labour councillors. The same applies to the SDP—those semi-desperate people. They cannot get out of their concentration camp, so they join the Socialist bandwagon and try to promise everything to everyone without being accountable.

I am sorry that my constituents will suffer because of mismanagement by South Glamorgan county council. I am proud—this has nothing to do with politics, unless the Opposition want to interpret in that way—that the city council, which is a good housekeeper, is not increasing rates. The city council must be commended for its courage and good housekeeping. I am sure that Cardiff ratepayers appreciate the fact that the city council is able to manage properly.

I am perturbed because South Glamorgan county council is deliberately selling playing fields in my constituency, preventing children from my school from utilising those grounds for sports and for annual and seasonal events. It is disgraceful that, for 30 pieces of silver, South Glamorgan county council is prepared to deny children of all ages, their mums, their dads and their grandfathers the right to enjoy participation in sport and other activities in summer and winter. That is deplorable. The county council has said that the Government are forcing the council to sell the land. That is a deliberate lie. The council is misleading the mums and dads. Councillors must speak the truth. If they will not, they must offer themselves for election. We will see whether they will be re-elected.

The South Glamorgan education authority is offering so-called peace studies in our schools. I deplore that. The teaching of so-called peace studies in some of our schools is totally phoney, as it is being used to push Left-wing and unilateralist propaganda at our young people. Our young people should be taught the "triangle"—how to read, how to write and religion. Teaching of so-called peace studies is a blatant perversion of the teacher's traditional role and responsibility. Parents should have the right to withdraw their children from political indoctrination classes. Parents want their children to be given a decent education in traditional disciplines and skills. "Peace studies" are a squalid abuse of our children and should be banned from our schools. That is vital.

I should like to go forward, but at the same time backward to 1985, when Marxism received a decisive rebuff in Wales. Arthur Scargill tried, like many aspiring dictators before him, to topple a properly elected Government, and he failed. His coal strike was planned confrontation on a titanic scale. "Profit" was the word which Arthur Scargill spat out in hatred; and, let us never forget, he drew ecstatic applause from the so-called leaders of the Labour movement for so doing. I was here; you were there—every time Arthur Scargill and his apparatchiks were mentioned, you applauded the name. You were supporting him throughout, and the coal industry——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The hon. Member knows that he must not attribute those actions to me.

Mr. Terlezki: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The coal industry is being turned around because the miners are putting their jobs and the welfare of their families above doctrinaire politics. In place of Socialism, the people's democracy has arisen. Two thirds of the people already own their homes. They are now on the way to real ownership of the economy.

Mr. Rogers: Tell us which army you served in.

Mr. Terlezki: The Labour leader, who is starting to give an impression of Lord Wilson as Mike Yarwood, is beginning to realise that. The hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) behaves in a way that is below his intelligence. He looks like Tom Jones' grass, only twice as green. No wonder he became a Member—the Europeans would not have him.

The voters in Wales will not be fooled when it comes to the next local election for the county council or city council. They certainly will not be fooled when it comes to the next general election.

8.40 pm

Mr. Brynmor John (Pontypridd): Welsh day is a curious mixture of the national and parochial but at the end of the day it is a little easier because one concentrates on one's own constituency.

I do not want to follow the relentlessly juvenile pursuit of the South Glamorgan county council elections, like the hon. Members for Cardiff Central (Mr. Grist), for Cardiff North (Mr. Jones) and for Cardiff, West (Mr. Terlezki). You can hardly wait for tomorrow morning, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and, after a debate such as we have endured, particularly the contribution by the hon. Member for Cardiff, West, I suspect, neither can I. When you do recover your composure to the extent necessary to peruse Hansard, I suggest that you peruse the amazing similarity in subject matter between the three speeches of the hon. Members for Cardiff, Central, for Cardiff, North and for Cardiff, West: three minds without a single thought.

[Mr. Brynmor John]

I take on board the points made by the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best). He made a misguided, but at least thoughtful, speech about the relationship of money in the economy and the effect upon investment in Wales.

I shall look at that with an example from my own constituency. What we are witnessing today is the accretion of money in corporations, to be used not for organic growth in promoting those corporations, but in takeovers.

Just such a triangle—it is almost as rubber triangular as the three hon. Members from Cardiff—is the Argyll, Distillers and Guinness triangle. I shall tell the hon. Member for Ynys Môn how I think Welsh employment is affected by the consequence of an unchecked growth and slopping around of money which is spare and which is not being used properly. Argyll has made a bid for Distillers. That is common knowledge. It is clear that Argyll wants only some of the commercial products which tie in most naturally with its shop activities. That means that a factory in my constituency which makes dry ice, which is badly needed for medical purposes, will be divested by Argyll if it takes over Distillers. It will mean the loss of 60 jobs and the loss of a great facility for the south of Britain.

Mr. Best: I will not detain the hon. Gentleman. I fully accept what he is saying about money slopping around, but I was endeavouring to say that it is a shame that we cannot harness private money for public sector infrastructure work. I do not accept that it is being done at the moment to the extent that I would like.

Mr. John: With respect, before we start wishing good works on the private sector, perhaps the Government should redirect their efforts within the private sector towards creating jobs and a manufacturing structure of which we can be proud and in which we can look forward to the future with some confidence.

The hon. Member for Ynys Môn said that he believed in public ownership. His public ownership involved people going along to buy one to ten shares, perhaps 250 shares, in a company. That is a myth, like the golden age. Even the privatisation measures which have recently been so lauded have been shown on analysis to be heavily biased in favour of large corporations and large institutional investors. Therefore, we have seen a transfer not from a monolithic state corporation to private individuals who represent the country in microcosm, but from what the hon. Member for Ynys Môn might call an impersonal state corporation to equally impersonal financial institutions. I do not believe that that is good. I am not in favour of an impersonal corporation approach, but I do not believe that going to the other extreme and making what is virtually a private monopoly——

Mr. Rowlands It is a private monopoly.

Mr. John: It is a private monopoly in the sense that the large institutions control the investors. I do not think that that counts.

Much has been said about the discussion document issued today about the valley areas. Some Conservative Members seem to think that the valley areas need to have everything done for them. Let me remind hon. Members, certainly those who have little or no experience of pre-war south Wales, that our areas were built upon self-help and self-education. If the hon. Member for Ynys Môn provided the money, he would run out of money before we ran out of energy.

I have no wish to dampen the initiative but I suspect that we will fire our energy once more, in great corporative pride, only to find that another recession has come about, with another financial cut. That will create a cynicism more erosive than anything else that has been done by the Government. If the Government mean what they say, they will take care to have the money to be ready to be spent.

I want to concentrate on the Pontypridd hospital, a symptom of health care in my constituency. I listened to what the hon. Member for Cardiff, West said. I have dealt with him several times but he is more used to talking than listening and more used to standing on his feet than reading Hansard but I would ask him to read what I say again. No one is saying that in absolute terms the Government have cut Health Service provision. The gravamen of the charge against the Government is that, now that medical and surgical techniques have exploded and there is great demand for techniques which were unavailable a decade ago, the Health Service is not matching demand.

I want to refer to my own area. The Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Robinson), has implied, as has the Secretary of State, that the real fault with the Mid Glamorgan area health authority is that it is profligate with its money. The hon. Member for Cardiff, West in part gave the answer to that. He said that we should look at all the extra people being treated. He is right: there has been a 41 per cent. increase in the number of X-ray patients seen at East Glamorgan hospital. There have been 88 per cent. more cardiology patients treated, an 80 per cent. take-up of home prescriptions in the pharmacy, a 66 per cent. increase in the pathology department and at our geriatric hospital, Dewi Sant, there has been a 736 per cent. increase in out-patients and a total increase of 121 per cent.

Hon. Gentlemen cannot have it both ways. I concede that more people are being treated, but the opposite side of that coin is that Mid Glamorgan area health authority must be using its revenue to good advantage to enable that to happen. However, when it runs short of money because of the explosion of medical demand and demand on the Health Service, it is told it cannot manage. It is told that a firm of accountants will look at it and that it is its own fault. So the Government propose to close the Pontypridd hospital.

It is inconvenient for the Government that this morning the Western Mail carried an item that showed that the Pontypridd hospital is the most efficient in Wales because its bed utilisation is 100 per cent. That far outstrips any other area. It is inconvenient for the Government that it is the only hospital in the area where beds are committed to general practitioners and it is doubly unfortunate, at a time when out-patient clinics and waiting lists are lengthening, that 8,000 people are treated at that hospital as out-patients, including rheumatology patients.

I ask the Under-Secretary to give this message to the Secretary of State. When he next makes one of his unmemorable visits to my constituency, will he please tell the people what will happen if that hospital closes permanently to the 8,000 people a year whom it now treats? Are they to go on to the waiting list, lengthening it by another 10 per cent.? Are they to wait indefinitely while the Minister says, "We shall get around to that when another firm of accountants becomes more expert at the subject." Will that be the answer?

If the Government are so confident in their belief, why is it that Ministers failed to answer a request that I made to meet a delegation to discuss the closure of the hospital? This is the Government who brook no opposition, and who can take on all comers, yet they cannot take on a delegation from the constituency to discuss the closure of the hospital. Why is that? Why, in defiance of all parliamentary conventions, was my request for a delegation ignored? Concern has also been expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) and others outside Parliament. That does not give us much confidence in the stewardship of the Welsh Office over health matters, if it can be insensitive to the demands of people who are asking to keep their hospital open. What is it like towards the patients themselves?

Therefore, I believe that Pontypridd hospital is not an optional extra. It is not a cigarette lighter in the motor car of the Health Service. It is a vital service. The county has better economic and social conditions than many of the areas represented by my hon. Friends, but it has a higher morbidity rate and greater suffering. Therefore, it has a greater claim upon the public purse for health reasons than many other counties. Unless the formula for funding reflects that, the people of Mid Glamorgan will be let down at a time when we cannot afford to let people down. Elderly and young people have an expectation of life that their grandfathers and grandmothers never had. To allow them to die wantonly and needlesly for lack of treatment would be the greatest crime of all.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): I am glad to see that the Secretary of State is back in the Chamber because I want to address a few remarks directly to him. This is the third time that I have heard him present his address at our annual Welsh debate. It inspired no more confidence in me than on the other two occasions.

The essence of the Secretary of State's remarks was that we have just about managed to survive; we have weathered the storm. The right hon. Gentleman talked about agriculture and said that the Government policy on milk quotas had not been that disastrous. He talked about the National Coal Board, and said that it had not been too disastrous—productivity is up. However, he did not say anything about the new pits and the investment that he talked about in his speech last year. We heard the right hon. Gentleman talk briefly about education and very briefly about the one new Japanese factory, presumably the product of his stewardship at the Welsh Office. We also heard him talk about the new valleys initiative.

It is not satisfactory when all that the Secretary of State can say to us at our annual debate is that we have managed to weather the storm and that things are bad, but it does not matter because they could be a darn sight worse. That is not an encouraging message.

Suggestions that we have weathered the storm or that things might be worse, or the manipulation of statistics to suggest that things are not quite as bad as they could be, are not satisfactory for the people of the valleys. There is only one criterion that has any value to the people of Wales, particularly those in the valleys. There is only one quality that they look for, and that is the quality of life that they enjoy. They are not concerned about the way in which the Welsh Office manipulates, or about the arguments from the Secretary of State and his Ministers about whether we have spent more this year than last year, or whether we are managing to survive. The only issue that is of any concern is the quality of life.

That depends entirely on employment. The only possible hope for our valley communities is opportunities for employment. The only hope for improving our environment is if we have people in work. The only way that our houses will be improved is if we have people in work, the only way to have a decent Health Service or education service is if we have people in work. Not only does that give them dignity and the personal security that they need to organise their own lives, but it gives the community the resources that are necessary to fund co-operative ventures. That central point is not recognised by the Secretary of State. Either he does not understand it or he will not acknowledge it.

In 1979, when we had the "Labour isn't working" election slogan, we heard all the excuses and all the criticisms of the figure of 1 million unemployed. We had all the suggestions of what was wrong with the British economy. We were told by the Tories that they had the answers. We were told that the problem was inflation. Let us concede the Government's success in reducing inflation from 10·1 per cent. in 1979 to 5·7 per cent. last year. We were told in 1979 that the problem was strikes, and that so many days were lost through strikes. Let us concede that we now live in a different era and now we do not lose 30 million days a year as we did in 1979. Last year the total of days lost was 6 million, one fifth of that total. We are told that British industry, was not profitable in 1979. Trading profits have gone up from £39 billion in 1979 to £68 billion in 1985. We were told that the exchange rate was too high. It has come down from $2·06 to the pound in 1979 to $1·37 to the pound in 1985.

Therefore, all that the Government said was wrong in 1979, by their standards, has been put right now in 1985. What do we have as a result? We have 25 per cent. unemployment in Wales. In parts of our valley communities, there is 75 or 80 per cent. unemployment. In my constituency four out of five people in housing estates are dependent on benefits. That is the product of the success of the Government's policies over the past seven years. The reason is that we have not had manufacturing investment. We heard some interesting arguments from Conservative Back Benchers, who said that investment is now at record levels. It is now lower in real terms that in 1979. In 1979 it was £8,230 million and in 1985 the figure was down to £6,780 million, the lowest rate of investment in manufacturing industry other than in Greece and Portugal, out of 18 Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries surveyed last year. It is not a record to be proud of. It is at the root of the problem that we have in the valleys. We do not have employment or investment, so there is no cohesion in our communities.

Government spokesmen will tell us, "Do not talk about unemployment figures or about the 200,000 people in Wales who are unemployed. Talk about the people who are employed." Even on that basis, using the criteria that the Government prefer to use, in every county in Wales there are fewer people in employment now than there were in 1979. Every index reveals that there are fewer people in employment than there were in 1979.

In June 1978 there were 837,000 people in full-time employment in Wales. On the latest date for which figures are available, there were 745,000 people in employment. Whichever criterion the Government wish to choose, the figures show that the Government have neglected the people of Wales.

One would have thought that the Secretary of State for Wales, when he sits in Cabinet, would represent the interests of Wales. The Prime Minister and the Cabinet are now isolated from all opinion in the country. The Confederation of British Industry, the Trade Unions Council, the Churches, the House of Lords, the House of Commons, large sections of the Conservative party and large sections of the public all recognise that the Government are a disastrous failure and that the Government are retreating day by day into a bunker. I believe it is distressing that, in that bunker, the Prime Minister has a staunch ally in the Secretary of State for Wales. Instead of arguing the case for Wales, the right hon. Gentleman is encouraging the Prime Minister to believe that what she is doing to this country will be of long term benefit to our people. That is a terrible indictment of the Secretary of State whose special Cabinet responsibility is for the one area in the United Kingdom which has been worst hit by the Government's policies.

The Government say that there is no alternative. I believe that there is an alternative. The Secretary of State has today announced his new initiative. It strikes me as ironic that the Government, who for the past seven years have said that public expenditue is bad and that problems cannot be solved by throwing money at them, are suddenly now saying that they recognise the problem and that now is the time for a community initiative. I am aware that the Secretary of State has made some move and I welcome his new initiative. I welcome the fact that the right hon. Gentleman has now recognised that the Government have a role to play and welcome the new initiative, the new money and the new idea. I will encourage my local authority to make a submission and I hope that the Secretary of State will recognise the value of all the submissions when they are put to him.

I will not pretend that I have any regard for what the Secretary of State has done today. The Secretary of State's initiative is nothing more than a gimmick to divert attention from the real issue which should be the subject of today's debate, which is that, as a direct result of Government policy, one out of four Welsh people are out of work. The Secretary of State will not solve anything by using £3 million of public money to invest in the valleys. To use the Secretary of State's words, that will not even prime the pump. Three million pounds is £15 for every unemployed person in Wales.

The Secretary of State intends to put the money into the valleys of south Wales. If the right hon. Gentleman spent one sixth of that money in each of the six districts of Mid Glamorgan, that would not make a pinprick on the problems there. It would certainly result in some minor improvements but if the right hon. Gentleman spent that money equally in each of the districts in Mid Glamorgan —as he said, to promote employment opportunities— how many jobs will he create?

If we assume that £10,000 of public money will provide a job, he will provide 300 jobs. If that money is spent equally in the six counties of Mid Glamorgan, he wil provide 50 jobs. If all the money goes to Mid Glamorgan, the right hon. Gentleman will provide 50 jobs in the Rhymney valley. There are 10,000 people out of work as a result of the Government's policies. No amount of projects or schemes which depend on planting trees, tarting up the local bus station, painting the outside of public buildings — welcome though all those schemes may be — will do anything to solve the deep-rooted problems of the valleys.

We need real investment in new industry as it is only by having new investment and new industries that we will get the jobs we want, and if we do not get the jobs, the valleys will have no prospects or security for the future.

9.4 pm

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): I should like to comment for a few minutes on the new proposals that the Government have made in relation to the valley communities. I follow in the footsteps of many of my hon. Friends who know intimately what has happened in the area and the scale of the problem. It is partly because of the scale of the problem and partly because of the effects that the problems are inflicting on our communities that we welcome almost any proposal that can bring any alleviation whatsoever. I welcome the proposal in the sense that it offers alleviation.

There is a certain irony in that I attended a meeting on Friday in my constituency which represented all the valley ares covered by the scheme and we discussed the matter. Local authorities from all the areas put forward a range of proposals. They had previously suggested that they should meet the Secretary of State for Wales, but he refused to meet them on the ground that he felt that it was better that such matters should be dealt with separately.

A few weeks ago, as soon as I heard about the proposals to assist the inner cities, I wrote to the Secretary of State saying that it would be unfair to leave out the valleys. However, the right hon. Gentleman replied that it might be better to continue with our present machinery. It is peculiar that, after all those refusals, the right hon. Gentleman, in the document that he distributed, should have said:

"These deficiencies can only in part be removed through financial injections."

He is talking about deficiencies in the valley towns. The document continues:

"The conditions arise partially from the industrial dereliction and economic decline; but they also stem from the absence of any co-ordinated action by local communities and the responsible agencies and authorities to work together with sufficient imagination and drive to make the very best use of the potential that exists."

All the democratically elected valley authorities have been crying out for exactly such co-ordination to help them to overcome their problems. It is strange that, at the very moment when the right hon. Gentleman refused to meet valley representatives, he should try to put some of the blame on them. However, we welcome the initiative, small and belated though it is, for the reason that I gave at the beginning of my speech.

I welcome the Secretary of State's reply to the question posed by my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) about the Welsh Development Agency. Some of us have been telling the Welsh Office for years that it is absurd that the WDA, which does such good work, must make painful choices between spending money on assisting new factories or providing new factories and limiting the amount that it can spend on land reclamation and the development of sites. We have asked why the Secretary of State does not go to the Cabinet and ask for more money to enable the WDA and other authorities—I do not say that it can do it alone—to spend more on reclamation and development. To some extent, the right hon. Gentleman's proposals will mean that the WDA and other agencies will receive more money.

I assure the Secretary of State that there will be no shortage of schemes for which we shall need money and assistance under his proposals, but it is a great pity that it was not done years ago when thousands of construction workers first became unemployed. Indeed, in the valleys, many construction workers have joined the dole queue during the past five or six years, and we have pleaded with the Government to spend more on construction. We have a little money now. But if the projects are to work properly, that sum will be insufficient. One need only compare the £2 million or £3 million which the Government propose to spend with the figures which show what has been spent in Merthyr and Aberdare during the past six years, even on Government schemes. The amount is far more than £2 million or £3 million.

If investment is to be effective, it must be on a much bigger scale. We must also ensure that the Government do not remove with one hand what they offer with the other. They have done that many times. The Government who say that they will help us in some areas are the same Government who have removed much larger sums by cutting the rate support grant.

That is why I was so eager to press my question about the training scheme, although I have not yet received an answer from the right hon. Gentleman and I do not expect one now. I welcome the two-year training scheme. It is no good the Secretary of State comparing the present position with what happened under the Labour Government. When we were in office, much more training was provided, there were many more apprenticeships and many more people obtained jobs in industry. We welcomed the youth training scheme from the beginning, but it is completely unfair that a considerable part of the increasing burden of the scheme should be placed upon the local authorities, some of which cannot afford it. We have always been eager—the same could be said of all other valley constituencies and communities—to play our part in the YTS. Whatever our criticisms, we have always wished to encourage them.

What has happened? My local authority and all the other authorities—as the Minister would be aware if he had attended the meeting on Friday—are having to bear a considerable extra burden for the second year of the training scheme and for the years after that. The authorities are having to commit themselves now to this type of expenditure. The expenditure could be more than the proposed expenditure to be given to the authorities for this scheme. When the Government propose extra resources for local authorities—I repeat we are eager to make the best use of all the resources we can get out of this Government—they must also look at the way in which they cut resources in so many other areas.

There is a simple comparison between what happened under the previous Labour Government and what is happening now. We had to face the same problems—a world slump, rocketing oil prices, the consequences of such a price rise and increasing unemployment: We faced those problems. If the present Government achieved the figures which we achieved in the last months of office, they would be regarded as the biggest miracle since the loaves and the fishes. In the period 1979 to 1980, when my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) was Prime Minister and when the right hon. Gentleman and his friends were placarding everywhere with "Labour isn't working", employment figures — the Government tell us to look at the employment, not the unemployment, figures — were greater than they have ever been in British history. They were certainly greater than they have been since. Employment has been heavily cut in this period, and unemployment is now greater than ever before. That is the simple comparison.

In the last year of the Labour Government, facing all the problems—and we dealt with all the democratic problems as well—we increased employment to the highest level ever achieved. This Government have increased unemployment to the highest level in the history of this country. Unemployment is worse in Wales than almost anywhere else.

We will certainly take any small consideration we can get from the Government and which the local authorities can use. We have been crying out for this for years. We shall try to turn this pittance into a real programme for tackling unemployment.

9.12 pm

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): My right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) has put his finger on the problems from which the country has to suffer under the present Administration. I have listened to this debate this afternoon and the way the Government have misinformed the public and have said that A is A when it is not and that B is B when it is not. It has been their modus vivendi. That has been the Government's policy since 1979.

We have heard a number of speeches from Conservative Members this evening and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) has commented, they were of a similar nature. I hesitate to say that they were from the same brief, although that question springs to mind. What is at stake in the debate is not the Government's policies but the Opposition's policies. The Conservatives have asked what the Opposition will do if we come into government — which we will. The Conservative Members have told us that we will either have to print money or borrow money. The Treasury has worked out that our programmes would cost £26 billion. What Conservative Members did not say and what did not occur to them is that we would place a priority on employment.

If we had the country working again more people would be paying tax and that is where the Government's money would come from. It is no use Conservative Members shaking their heads. The Government are not interested in employment. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent has said, they have raised unemployment to the highest level ever. That is the essential difference between the Government and the Opposition. Consequently, they need taxation from elsewhere, and they have increased taxation to a higher level than I can remember. If a Labour Government get people back to work, those people will be paying tax because they will be earning money. That is what the next Labour Government will do.

Like my other hon. Friends, I welcome this latest initiative, but it is very little indeed. The housing aspect of it comes to £2 million, but the cost of building a council house today is between £25,000 and £30,000. In other words, all the money available this year will build about 80 council houses, yet we have all this trumpeting that at last the Conservative Government have seen the light and intend to do something.

Almost every Labour Member represents a council with a waiting list of about 1,000 people. How far will that sum help? It is an absolute pittance. The newspapers and the media must not be beguiled by the message of millions of pounds. A few months ago a report said that to put right the housing stock in the United Kingdom would cost £20 billion, but that is not mentioned by the Conservative party.

We must never lose sight of that fact, and I do not believe that the Welsh people will lose sight of it. They have had six years of this Government and see hospitals that cannot take patients because they are full and can only treat emergency patients. They see schoolchildren without adequate books, and they see social services crumbling before them.

Mr. Raffan: The hon. Gentleman has espoused a new aspect of Labour economic policy, which I am sure will be listened to with great interest by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley)—perhaps with some horror. How quickly will he get people back to work? He said that he will use revenue from taxation to support this extraordinary programme, which has risen by £2 billion since I spoke. How will the hon. Gentleman support that programme between the time of taking office and getting people back to work?

Dr. Marek: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will excuse me if I do not answer now, but I have only three minutes left. Perhaps next time, when I have half an hour or an hour, I will be able to respond.

Whenever possible, this Government like to govern in secret. They were badly caught out over Austin Rover, and they will be caught out over the closure of the Cartrefle teacher training college. I hope that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary will tell us whether that college is to be closed. If it is, it will mean a couple of hundred redundancies, and it will have a marked effect on the rest of the north-east Wales institute as many of the courses are interdependent. There is much apprehension in north-east Wales, and in Wrexham in particular.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wyn Roberts): I know that this matter was discussed last week at a meeting of the Welsh Advisory Board. The hon. Gentleman will know that there is to be a meeting of the committee that rules the board on 4 April under my chairmanship. No decision has been recommended as yet to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman is quite wrong in saying that a decision has been taken.

Dr. Marek: I understand from a telephone call to Cardiff that the working party has recommended to the board that Cartrefle college should be closed. I understand that on the chairman's casting vote—the chairman is a university person, and no doubt his university departments are quite safe — the board will recommend to the committee of the Welsh Advisory Board that the Cartrefle teacher training college should be closed. If the Government do not intend to close the college, will they say so clearly? If they cannot, I am sorry, but that is symptomatic of their treatment of Wales for the past six years.

My final charge is also of incompetence. The Welsh Office has allowed British Rail to single-track the line between Chester and Wrexham. The Welsh Office took BR's advice. How incompetent can the Government be? Now, of course, trains are delayed for two hours every week. The result is that nobody will take the rail service from Wrexham General any more. That is incompetence. The Welsh Office was beguiled. Instead of spending £22 million on the Gresford to Pulford bypass, they had to spend only £21·5 million because the bridges have to go over a single track. How stupid the Government are when they take such considerations into account, thus ruining the transport system in north-east Wales.

The Government are incompetent. They have been in office for six years and done no good. They should go.

Mr. Best: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have no desire to delay the hon. Member for Carmarthen (Dr. Thomas), to whom the whole House always enjoys listening, but I know that you will have noticed that every hon. Member who has been rising in his place has been called. I wish to put that on record only because of some of the interventions in my speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. The Chair is always very happy — it does not happen very often — when every hon. Member who wishes to speak has the opportunity to do so, as has been the case today.

Mr. Ray Powell: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Some of us deliberately did not rise, in order to give others a chance to speak. If the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) had limited his speech, more Opposition Members would have been called.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I did the hon. Gentleman an injustice, and I apologise to him.

9.22 pm

Dr. Roger Thomas (Carmarthen): The Secretary of State must have set some sort of record today. He presented his seventh state of the nation report since attaining his high office. I must add hastily that the senior Under-Secretary of State for Wales must also be the proud possessor of a record. There cannot be many members of the Government who occupy the same post, allowing for departmental variations, as they did in 1979. Conservative Members can draw their own conclusions.

I am sure that I will not be in breach of any secret act if I say that the Secretary of State little thought that his leader would still be expecting him to carry the Wales portfolio seven years on. Moreover, it is likely that he has another two to go as there is every likelihood that this Parliament will run its full course.

It is singularly regrettable that the Prime Minister continues to feel that no other Conservative Member can be entrusted with the overall responsibility of the Welsh Office. A little while ago, there were palpable signs that the understanding methods of the former Minister of State, who I am sorry not to see with us today, would have brought a welcome consensus to Welsh politics. That would have removed the monotony of clash and counter-clash of the past seven years. We fully understand the disappointment of several very able Conservative Members. I am not looking in any particular direction.

We have reshuffle after reshuffle, but no Welsh Tory Member ever appears to come to the top of the pack. It is a remarkable coincidence that there has been only the welcome promotion of the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Robinson). Not only have Tory Members not qualified to go to the Welsh Office, but none appears to have been suitably qualified to be a junior Minister in any other office of state or Department. What can they have been doing wrong? One notices many promotions among their counterparts in Scotland. There have been many changes in the Scottish Office, yet we do not appear to have had changes among Welsh Tory Members. I have often dwelt on that, but it is a matter for the Prime Minister.

The other day I watched a television interview with the Leader of the House. Apparently, he was told at a meeting of the 1922 Committee that one of the Tory Whips with a Welsh name was responsible for the promotion of so many wets into the Cabinet. I cannot understand how a Welshman would not do more for fellow Welshmen, and at least most of them are fellow Welshmen.

Year after year the Secretary of State requests patience and prudence from his critics because just a little more time is needed for Government policies to come to palpable fruition. Each year the tide is about to turn, and each year the unemployment tide obstinately refuses to turn. Our resources keep on ebbing away, and the latest to ebb away is North sea oil.

Thousands of jobs have vanished since 1983, let alone since 1979. How much longer do the people in Wales, especially those now in their second or third year without work, have to wait for Government policies to work? Positive intervention has become imperative. It is not only the accelerated pit closures of the past year that leave people jobless. Joblessness now roams the rural areas as well. Creameries, the backbone of rural viability, now become as desolate as the urban coal mines. In rural areas the spin-off effect of closures can be even more widespread and devastating.

We protest at the inadequacies of NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. It is miserly, if somewhat increased in funding, and it wholly fails to meet the massive pit closure redundancies. That limp scheme appeared late in the day, deceitfully publicised, but woefully short on practical application. Pits close, but coal is now extracted in many of our areas of south Wales by overpowering open-cast methods that bulldoze through much-loved landscapes, human amenities and surroundings. Opposition is cast aside scathingly, as if to oppose such gigantic schemes is a form of treachery and a denial of work by local communities.

I am sure that many Tory Members noticed the article in Saturday's Western Mail. The significance of the St. David's day declaration on the urgent need for powerful Government initiatives to expand the economy, thus ensuring that many who are at present without work are allowed to contribute usefully to society, cannot be over-emphasised. I am sure that hon. Members will know the names of those who have signed this declaration—Sir Cennyth Traherne, Sir Brian Hopkin, Sir Goronwy Daniel, Dr. C. W. L. Bevan, the Earl Lloyd-George, Professor Glyn Phillips. They are not notable people in the political life of Wales, not notable Welsh men and women. These people speak over and above party politics and their aims cannot be disregarded. The Conservative party cannot afford to sweep this declaration under the carpet. These people have no political axe to grind or political strategy to exploit.

The Labour party is not alone in emphasising the dire need for direct spending to reduce unemployment rather than rely on the haphazard beneficial effects of tax reductions. The support of the CBI has been further bolstered by last week's National Institute report. It said that tax cuts would have for what spending power is made available through tax cuts is either saved or frittered away upon imports.

"a paltry effect upon registered unemployment"

Registered unemployment is expected to stay at 3 million well into the last quarter of this decade, the pace of growth for this year falls to just over half of that during the previous year and most economic experts tell us that by 1987 there will be an adverse trade balance, including oil balances. The Government are being deaf to much of their own hitherto loyal supporters, as the latter press for more spending on roads and infrastructure—that is what we heard from the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Sir R. Gower)—with warnings that frugality in this sector will lead to an even more helpless position in hard-pressed regions such as Wales and particularly the more inaccessible parts of Wales.

There is much to commend in a building improvement programme primarily aimed at finding work for the long-term unemployed young who are itching to work. The Select Committee on Employment feels that a scheme could reduce unemployment totals by over 300,000 over the first two years of its implementation. Such urban regeneration and the tackling of substandard housing provision would be of particular benefit to Wales because our valleys have long been left stranded by such neglect of a basic human provision.

Government policy, as exemplified by years that do not immediately precede an election, make no inroads. Such cynicism will linger long in the minds of the electorate, but I do not propose to give such a list of Tory marginal seats as the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones) gave of Labour marginal seats.

The Government's complacent inaction, as the teachers' industrial action continues to damage the prospects of thousands of children, has been lamentable. The more caring and informed Government supporters such as the right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle), the previous Secretary of State for Education and Science, have pleaded for the setting up of a review body prepared to take full recognition of the position of teachers compared to similar and allied professions. Teachers, irrespective of union representation, feel that their training, qualifications and responsibilities are far from adequately remunerated and that their contribution has been taken for granted.

We have listened in this Chamber to teachers being accused of the worst form of hypocrisy and of aggressive self-interest, but the Secretary of State concedes that many teachers will leave because of poor wages and conditions and that many potential teachers of high calibre quit prematurely during training because their future in the profession is so bleak and will be so deeply unappreciated.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State said that spending on education in Wales is at a standstill and that, with falling school rolls, this should mean, arithmetically, that greater provision can be made for each child. However, this is a false argument. No allowance is being made for providing greater choice and catering for more variable and diverse interests, let alone contending with more widespread parental expectations. Comparative education costs should not be confined to years gone by, or even, for that matter, to years ahead. Comparisons should be made with the amounts being spent by our main industrial and technological rivals. During the last six years, our efforts have failed lamentably.

In his wind-up speech last year during the debate on Welsh affairs the Under-Secretary of State for Wales said that the National Health Service was advancing on a broad and variable front, yet it is remarkable how few people express complete satisfaction with it, particularly when there are problems over admitting the elderly to hospital and when the social reasons for such admissions outweigh the medical reasons. There appears to be general unease about the frequency with which expert opinion and subsequent treatment has to be sought outside Wales.

The National Health Service was debated recently in the Welsh Grand Committee, but I make no apology for discussing it in this debate. To quote annual increases over the rate of inflation and increases in staff and increased out-patient attendances can be a very unsatisfactory and deceitful method of assessing advancement. Patient expectations may be difficult to quantify, but whatever area of medical activity one studies, investigations and treatment appear to be in greater demand as facilities become more widely available.

I shall quote one example. The costly medical advance of five or six years ago soon becomes regarded as old-fashioned and second best when the general public realise that something better is available elsewhere. The clever, sophisticated, and technically expert removal of fluid from around the developing baby in order to detect foetal abnormalities which meant that desquamated cells could be examined for chromosomal and other biochemical abnormalities was costly from the standpoint of training surgeons and pathologists.

However, it is now possible to obtain a specimen of the placental cells. Therefore, what appeared five or six years ago to be a remarkable advance has lost its technical glamour now that this new and even more costly method of examination has taken over. The latter technique is infinitely more costly, but the community demands that this technique should be provided. Abnormalities in developing babies can now be detected not at 19 weeks but at 10 weeks. This is a great advantage in case management, but it accounts for the escalating costs of the National Health Service. That is why a 2, 3 or 4 per cent. increase means that the NHS is merely standing still.

Similar examples can be found throughout the NHS. I have quoted only one example out of 30, 40 or 50 examples. When the additional costs are considered, a purely mathematical basis of year-to-year expenditure or year-to-year staff availability — as happened in the remarkably bland and anodyne Conservative party broadcast last week—completely loses its relevance.

Mr. Raffan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Thomas: No, I have only one minute left.

We cannot afford to ignore the warnings of such bodies as the Alliance for Science of the effects of under-funding projects undertaken by such bodies as the Medical Research Council. That has led to a serious loss of expert staff and to the closure of units essential to our medical research capability.

Conservative Members may approve and even revel in privatisation, but the community as a whole suffers when Treasury frugality causes a shortfall in the public funding of medical research, with resultant over-emphasis on private funding which ignores the less important and more mundane sectors of research such as preventive medicine. The people of Wales know that the Health Service is not safe in the Government's hands.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wyn Roberts): I am glad that the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) and other Opposition Members in their various ways have welcomed the concept of the valleys initiative launched by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State today. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) was particularly constructive, and we shall carefully consider his helpful suggestions. The hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) was also most constructive, and I apologise for not having been in the Chamber to hear her speech.

It was entirely predictable that some hon. Members would complain about the level of resources allocated to the initiative. To them, I make two points. First, proposals are to come forward by the end of June and work on approved projects will not begin until the autumn. The additional £3 million initially being made available in 1986-87 is in respect of anticipated expenditure in six months only. The level of additional resources in future years will reflect the quality of the projects which come forward.

Secondly, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made clear, this is a pump-priming exercise aimed at triggering investment by the private and voluntary sectors. Community investment means just that. Moreover, these resources are additional to what is already being spent. I do not think that that point has been fully appreciated.

We are looking to local communities to come forward with ideas, energy and resources. Experience in Cardiff, Swansea and elsewhere has shown what can be achieved through public sector support for revitalisation in projects involving a partnership between the public and private sectors. The initiative is an exciting challenge to the valley communities to join central Government in an environmental programme which will transform the appearance of valley towns, making them more attractive places in which to live, work and invest. The hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) missed the point entirely. It is by adding to the attractiveness of the valleys that one creates work in the valleys.

Concern about unemployment has been at the heart of today's debate. That so many of our fellow countrymen and women are out of work in Wales is a most regrettable fact, and we all wish that it were otherwise. Nevertheless, there are some consolations. The remaining 82·3 per cent —the majority—are in work, and those in work have been doing well. As my hon. Friends the Members for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Grist) and for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) pointed out, one of the basic problems in the past year has been that the rate of earnings is still rising faster than the rate of productivity. Those in work must understand that their high pay rises are keeping the unemployed out of work.

We are doing our utmost to increase the number of people in work, and we have had some success. The total number in civilian employment in Wales rose by 2·1 per cent. between 1983 and 1984 — from 1,028,000 to 1,050,000—mainly as a result of an increase in the number of self-employed and those working in the service industries.

Wales is part of the United Kingdom economy, and between 1983 and 1985 the United Kingdom economy topped the growth league of major EC countries, despite the coal strike. Over the previous decade it was bottom of the league. In 1985 the United Kingdom is expected to have been the fastest growing economy in the EC and to have grown faster than the United States.

The Government's policies will continue to be directed towards a sustained and sound economic expansion, founded upon an efficient and competitive economy and a viable and strong economic base. Those policies represent the only practical way forward for improvements in the prospects for industry and employment. They are backed by realistic and comprehensive measures designed to deal with the net causes of the problems affecting the economy — measures to contain inflation, encourage enterprise, industrial diversification and growth and large-scale programmes of training and measures to promote employment.

I have heard nothing in today's debate which persuades me that those policies are wrong or that other policies hold out better prospects for Wales. The best hopes for Wales still lie with those policies, and when the time comes the electorate will show its faith in them and in us, too.

Many Opposition Members put their faith in increased capital spending, except for the hon. Member for Caenarfon (Mr. Wigley) who took us back to the referendum on devolution, and we had a resurrection of that elephant on our doorstep in this Chamber. He pleaded for new ideas, but I was not aware that he offered a single one.

Let us be clear that capital spending is not necessarily labour-intensive, so it is not the easy cure for unemployment that the Labour party thinks. But let us look at the Government's record.

Mr. D. E. Thomas rose——

Mr. Roberts: Under the Government, gross capital expenditure within the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has averaged over £743 million a year at 1984-85 prices. That represents an increase of almost 6 per cent. in real terms over the average annual spend over the last two years of the previous Labour Administration.

Mr. D. E. Thomas rose——

Mr. Roberts: That was £703 million per annum.

On roads we have spent an average of £185 million, an increase of 24 per cent. in real terms over similar spending in the last two years of the Labour Government.

Mr. D. E. Thomas rose——

Mr. Roberts: For industry, the average spend runs at about £80·5 million, an increase of 13 per cent., and for health and personal social services the annual spend is more than £54 million, an increase of 9 per cent. over the previous Labour Government's spending.

We have heard a great deal about housing. There was a large underspend by local authorities in 1981-82 and 1982-83. The facts are well known and I have rehearsed them before in the House. But over the past two years, total gross housing capital expenditure has averaged almost £250 million at 1984-85 prices, an increase of 6 per cent. in real terms over the average of the last two years of the previous Labour Government. So who are they to lecture us on housing?

All in all, our gross capital expenditure has totalled more than £4,460 million in Wales over the six years to last March. That represents a massive level of investment by any standard. There is silence on the Opposition Benches.

Mr. D. E. Thomas rose——

Mr. Roberts: Do Labour Members suggest that they could have bettered that record? No, they do not.

Mr. D. E. Thomas rose——

Mr. Roberts: Although I have heard much in the debate about the need for even more spending than the Government propose—my hon. Friend the Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan) outlined the Government's expenditure plans extremely well—no one has said a word about how much money is to be raised and only little about where it will come from. Is it to be borrowed, raised by taxation, or possibly both? My hon. Friends realise that there is some confusion in the upper crust of the Labour party on this issue. There is talk of using accumulated local authority receipts, which amount to about £250 million to £300 million in Wales and £5 billion in the country as a whole. That cannot be enough to do anything but send local councillors on a grand slam of a spending and borrowing spree.

The source of the £24 billion, which was added to by the hon. Member for Carmarthen (Dr. Thomas), that the Labour party is dreaming of for Britain as a whole is taxation.

Mr. Roberts: No, I cannot give way to the hon. Gentleman.

The source of the £24 billion that the Labour party has in mind was referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central in a powerful speech and by my hon. Friends the Members for Delyn and for Cardiff, West (Mr. Terlezki). I do not expect Labour Members to be able to say what part of that sum is attributable to Wales. Some tax boffin — probably the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley)—said that it could be creamed off those earning £30,000 a year or more. When it was pointed out that the yield would not be enough, the Leader of the Opposition lowered his sights to those earning £20,000 a year, and that would produce £3 billion.

Mr. Ron Davies: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the Minister to present to the House exactly the same speech that has been made by five of his Back-Bench colleagues this evening? Is this not an abuse of the procedures of the House?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is a point of argument, not a point of order for me.

Mr. D. E. Thomas: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I ask you to rule whether the Minister's speech amounts to tedious repetition of the speeches of Conservative Back Benchers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister is in order.

Mr. Roberts: I know that Opposition Members do not like to hear about the £24 billion that would be expended by a Labour Government. That goes for the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas) as well.

Mr. D. E. Thomas rose——

Mr. Roberts: As I understand it, a Labour Government's purpose in spending that sum would be to boost employment. I must tell the Labour party that it would produce only a temporary boost. At the same time, it would destroy incentives to earn. In the longer term, jobs would be dissipated as inflation and interest rates rose. The truth is that a massive reflation would destroy jobs.

The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside is prone to present the gloomier side of life in some of my hon. Friends' constituencies, especially that of my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn, of which he seems to be especially fond. Let me picture for the hon. Gentleman the brighter side of life in his constituency. Since May 1979, the Welsh Development Agency has completed 77 factory units in the district. There is another 50,000 sq ft factory under construction. Currently six units are vacant and available for letting.

During 1984, 15 units were allocated to firms forecasting about 360 jobs. In 1985, seven units were allocated with a promise of 120 jobs. So it is not all gloom and doom, even on Alyn and Deeside. Obviously, it is not the same dawn as we have in Delyn, so wonderfully described by my hon. Friend the Member for Delyn.

The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside referred to the recent report of the Select Committee on Employment. He suggested that the Government should spend £165 million in the next three years in Wales and that this should provide work for 37,500 people. We are considering the Select Committee's report. However, we must be careful in talking about expanding programmes that we do not take jobs away from those already in employment.

Mr. Ray Powell: Ha, ha.

Mr. Roberts: Projects under the community programme must provide work that would not otherwise be undertaken. I do not think that the union friends of the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) would like his laughter about the community programme taking jobs away from people. We must be extremely careful. The last thing anyone wants are schemes, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General and Minister for Employment put it, of the lamp post counting kind. These are not of benefit to the community, nor do they provide any kind of satisfying work for the unemployed.

Mr. Rowlands: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Roberts: I have many points to answer.

The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) has referred more than once to the two-year youth training scheme. The transitional funding arrangements for the two-year YTS are to be reviewed later this year. The Manpower Services Commission is confident that there will be enough places available for this year's school leavers. Indeed, a large number of providers showed a willingness to take up additional places had Mid Glamorgan county council reduced its YTS commitment.

The hon. Members for Alyn and Deeside and for Gower (Mr. Wardell) referred to the plight of the elderly in this severely cold weather. There were two speeches on the subject. The supplementary benefits scheme provides for extra help for claimants in periods of exceptionally severe weather when heating bills are higher than they have budgeted for. The DHSS has written to each of its regions emphasising that the severe weather payments should be given priority and that all appropriate steps should be taken urgently to publicise the arrangements to provide advice to all who need it. Supplementary benefit heating additions amounted to £400 million in the last financial year—about £140 million more in real terms than was spent in the last year of the Labour Government.

I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Sir R. Gower) that the Government are committed to ensuring first-class crossing facilities of the River Severn. The fact that we have commissioned a study into a possible second crossing is proof of that commitment, and it is nonsense to suggest otherwise. Work on strengthening the existing bridge is well under way. There is no reason to doubt that, when these works are completed, the crossing will be capable of operating at its full capacity.

It is clear from the debate that Wales needs firm Conservative government and strong leadership now more than ever. Britain's needs are the same. In the past few weeks, we have seen the Socialist alternatives preening themselves for office and the alliance parties grooming themselves for a supporting role. Most of us have recoiled at the prospect. Such a Government would be abysmally weak and indecisive and would quickly succumb to pressures. Inflation would flare up, wiping out the value of people's savings and making our industries uncompetitive. All the gains made during the years of Conservative rule would be lost and the chance, which we still have, of creating worth while and lasting jobs would disappear. The closer one looks at the Socialist-alliance alternative, the more determined we become that it should never become a reality. We on the Conservative Benches all share that determination and shall fight to win people's hearts and minds to our cause. This Government have a clear view——

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed without Question put.

European Social Fund

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Ian Lang): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 7711/85, a Commission Decision on guidelines for the management of the European Social Fund in the financial years 1986 to 1988; 9901/85, a Commission proposal to amend Council decision 83/516/EEC and Regulation (EEC) No. 2850/83 on the tasks of the European Social Fund, in view of the accession of Spain and Portugal; and 9854/85, Thirteenth Report from the Commission on the activities of the European Social Fund (financial year 1984), and welcomes the contribution to employment and training schemes made by the European Social Fund.

I should like to begin by thanking the members of the Select Committee on European Legislation for having provided us with the opportunity to debate the activities of the European Social Fund. The last time its activities were debated at length in this House was in 1983, and we should clearly have been remiss had we allowed much more time to elapse before we debated the fund again.

We shall, of course, want to consider during the debate the specific Commission documents set out in the motion before the House, which cover the fund guidelines for 1986 to 1988; the amending regulation following the accession of Spain and Portugal; and the Commission's own annual report on the fund's activities in 1984.

Before doing so, however, it would perhaps be as well to remind ourselves why the fund is in existence and what its objectives are. It was established in 1957 under article 123 of the treaty of Rome, which defined its main purposes as:

"to improve the employment opportunities for workers in the Common Market and to contribute thereby to raising the standard of living . . . by rendering the employment of workers easier and . . . increasing their geographical and occupational mobility."

The fund is thus essentially concerned with employment and training measures and provides financial support for schemes to help people who are unemployed, threatened with unemployment or under-employed.

There can be little doubt that those activities can never have been more relevant than they are today. In our debates in the House there is often a tendency to believe that unemployment is a uniquely British phenomenon. In fact, if we look — as we must tonight — at the Community as a whole, we see that it is a problem that besets the entire Community. Unemployment in the member states has risen from 2·4 per cent. in 1973 to 11 per cent. today. Indeed, since 1980, unemployment in the Community has doubled, reaching 13 million in 1985 — or 16 million if Spain and Portugal are included. Within these overall totals both youth and long-term unemployment have continued to increase. Between 1981 and 1983 long-term unemployment in the Community increased as a proportion of total unemployment from 25 to 39 per cent.

It is true that if we look at employment as opposed to unemployment we see a slightly more encouraging picture. In 1984 — the last year for which complete figures are available—there was an increase of 0·3 per cent. in total employment within the Community. In the United Kingdom in that year the increase in employment was 1·7 per cent. and our overall employment has continued to rise since then, as the House will be aware.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): Does the Minister accept that in the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s, Britain's unemployment was always the average of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development European level? Since 1979 it has risen to about 2 per cent. above the average, which is equivalent to 1 million more people unemployed in this country due not solely to the world recession.

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman will have to bear in mind that the work force in Britain has been growing at a faster rate than in most European countries and the percentage of unemployment in the past four years has increased by less in the United Kingdom than in France, Spain or Germany. It is also worth pointing out that the United Kingdom has 65 per cent. of its working age population in work. That is 7 per cent. above the OECD average.

Clearly, no fund can hope to solve the problem of unemployment in Europe. That problem has too many deep-seated causes for it to be capable of being removed simply by more spending—whether that spending be at Community or national level. The reality is that for too long all over Europe we forgot that jobs are created only when businesses produce goods and services that people want at prices they can afford. That in turn requires a stable economic framework in which both inflation and public expenditure are kept under sustained control, not least so that business can plan with confidence in the future. It also requires a concerted attempt to introduce greater competition; to encourage enterprise and remove unnecessary burdens; to reshape our education and training policies to ensure that they are relevant to tomorrow's world; and to work towards a more flexible labour market that encourages small firms, the self-employed, part-time and temporary work and the removal of outdated working practices. It is now very notable how those priorities are shaping the policies not just of the United Kingdom Government, but of the Community and the member states as a whole.

Within that overall framework, however, it is clearly necessary at the same time to take more direct action to remedy the immediate and pressing problems of unemployment. The European social fund is a major instrument to that end, and I should like, without the slightest hesitation or qualification, to express the Government's appreciation of the contribution that the fund has made for some years past to both Government and non-Government programmes of employment and training in this country.

Last year the United Kingdom's total allocation from the social fund was some £300 million — that is approaching 25 per cent. of the total funds allocated in that year.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Is my hon. Friend yet able to tell us what he estimates will be the impact on the United Kingdom's share of the social fund of the accession of Spain and Portugal to the Community? He may recall that during the debate on the accession no one was able to give an estimate of that impact. Is my hon. Friend now able to tell us how he believes our share of the social fund will be affected by the entry of the new members?

Mr. Lang: There is no doubt that our share is likely to decline, not just because of the entry of Spain and

[Mr. Lang]

Portugal, but because several other countries are making increasing applications to the fund. However, the fact remains that we have derived substantial benefit out of proportion to our contribution to the Community over the past few years, and we continue to do so.

The United Kingdom is thus among the leading beneficiaries of the fund, and it is one of the most clearest and tangible benefits of our membership of the Community.

Among the major programmes to which the fund made a substantial contribution last year were the youth training scheme, the training opportunities scheme, the community industry scheme and training programmes for the disabled and for women. As from this year, as a result of decisions taken at last December's meeting of the Heads of Government of the Community, the fund will also be helping us to expand the enterprise allowance scheme—which, as the House will know, is proving enormously successful in encouraging the unemployed to set up new small businesses or to become self-employed.

At a different, but no less important, level, the social fund administration last year approved applications from the United Kingdom for support in respect of 1,500 projects being run by local authorities, charities, training institutions and private companies. There is no doubt that, without that support, the many programmes and projects in question would have had to be drastically curtailed and, in many cases, abandoned altogether.

So the importance of the fund to the United Kingdom is clear. It will be obvious from what I have said that the United Kingdom Government are naturally concerned that we should continue to secure the substantial benefit from the fund in the future that we have obtained from it in the past.

Of course, no situation is ever static, and the entry into the Community of Spain and Portugal — which we greatly welcome—means that there are now two more countries with major problems of unemployment bidding for the available funds. That is as it should be, for the fund is there to help alleviate problems of unemployment in all member states. Nevertheless, it is extremely important that the fund should continue to reflect the clear and undoubted needs of the older industrial areas of northern Europe alongside those of the Mediterranean regions when it comes to setting priorities for its future support.

I would also hope that the fund might be able to give a somewhat higher priority in future to the needs of the long-term unemployed. As I said, long-term unemployment in the Community — by which I mean those people who have been unemployed for over a year — has risen dramatically throughout the Community in recent years. In most member states of the Community it is now more than a third of total unemployment and in many it is closer to, or even above, 50 per cent. In the United Kingdom, some 40 per cent. of those unemployed have been without work for over a year. That is roughly in line with the Community average.

It is now, I think, generally accepted that the longer a person is unemployed the more difficult it becomes for him or her to get back into employment. That is why I should like to see a somewhat greater degree of priority given within the rules of the fund to support for measures in member states which are helping the long-term unemployed, whether through work experience, training or participation in work of benefit to the community.

As a Government, we should also like to see—as we have made known to the Commission—some redrawing of the priority areas boundaries which effectively set which areas of the United Kingdom are likely to benefit most from the fund. As with all decisions on boundaries, inevitably some arbitrary lines have to be drawn. There are, none the less, some clear anomalies, such as the exclusion of Powys and the Western Isles from the list of priority areas, which we should like to see the Commission look at again. We shall continue to urge the Commission to re-examine its present guidelines in this respect.

I turn now to the specific documents which the Select Committee has drawn to our attention. The first concerns the Commission guidelines for the management of the European social fund in the financial years 1986 to 1988. As the Committee noted in its report of 23 October last year, there is no doubting the importance of the activities which the fund supports which are in turn largely determined in any one year by the fund guidelines. The guidelines, adopted annually for a three-year programme, say which types of scheme will be given priority in different regions of the Community. I should make clear at the outset that they are adopted by the European Commission on its own responsibility, though the Commission naturally takes account of such views on the guidelines as member states may put forward.

Because of the heavy demands on the fund, the Commission proposed stricter limits on the types of scheme to be given priority in 1986. In slightly more detail, the guidelines gave priority to substantial training schemes involving at least 200 hours training. They also required training to contain an element of introduction to new technology, recognising the vital importance of this to people's future work prospects. Priority was also given to training in small firms adapting to new technology, and the existing priority for schemes for women, migrant workers and the disabled was reaffirmed.

The second Community document before the House contains the Commission's proposals for accommodating the needs of Spain and Portugal within the fund's budget following their entry into the Community. Before their entry, 40 per cent. of the fund was devoted to a number of regions within the Community judged to have special priority status. These included the whole of Greece and the Republic of Ireland, the mezzogiorno region of Italy and the whole of Northern Ireland. The Commission proposals were to extend these special priority areas to include the whole of Portugal and a number of regions of Spain. The Commission also proposed an eventual increase from 40 per cent. to 44·5 per cent. in the proportion of the fund allocated to these special priority areas.

At the December Social Affairs Council, which was attended for the United Kingdom by my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General and Minister for Employment, there was pressure from a number of countries to raise the percentage of the fund devoted to these areas to 50 per cent. While mindful of the needs of Northern Ireland, we were at the same time also conscious of the needs of the rest of the United Kingdom, and I am pleased to say that the eventual decision to raise the percentage of the fund to 44·5 per cent. but with immediate effect, was one which we judged to be a fair balance between the differing interests involved.

The third document before the House — the Commission's annual report for 1984—has inevitably become a little dated with the passage of time. This was the first year of operation of the fund after the 1983 review. It was a particularly good year for the United Kingdom, since we secured some 32 per cent. of the available commitments, and 38 per cent. of the payments made were to our schemes. We cannot expect to do so well every year, but the outline of the type of projects supported makes it clear that, as a nation, we are both imaginative and persistent in the variety and scope of the schemes we are putting forward to help the unemployed. The United Kingdom is very much in the lead on this aspect of Community policy, and we are pleased to see other countries following our example and getting support from the fund for similar programmes.

One statistic that emerges from the report is the increase in the applications to the fund—an increase of about 90 per cent. in 1984 compared with 1983—to a total of about 3,300. That figure rose again in 1985 to nearly 4,800 —a further increase of about 40 per cent. It is fair to say that the fact that this volume of applications is processed within the Commission by relatively few staff is a considerable compliment to those concerned in the Commission. At the same time—as they will know only too well—the continuing increase in applications has heightened some of the administrative problems associated with the fund's operation—not least the fairly long delays that can occur between applications and payments. These are matters which my Department continues to take up with its counterparts in the Commission with a view to identifying ways in which the administrative process might be made easier, and I hope that some useful changes may emerge as a result.

I hope that I have said enough to demonstrate the importance that the Government attach to the European social fund and to the clear benefits that it has brought to the United Kingdom. As well as leading to numerous local initiatives, it has helped us to mount at Government level several major programmes—such as YTS—which have much to offer not only within the United Kingdom but, by way of example, to the Community as a whole. At the same time, it is clear that the social fund, in attempting to ameliorate some of the worst problems of unemployment in the Community, has an especially valuable role to play as a positive expression of the Community's commitment to many of the less fortunate members of our society. Therefore, I welcome tonight's debate and I look forward to listening to the views of other hon. Members.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): As the Minister said, it is almost three years since the House debated the European social fund. That shows that the Government do not wish to debate the many problems that exist in Britain and the rest of the European Community. The social fund was designed as part of the strategy to correct the regional imbalances of the EC. Originally, it was a two-pronged attack, with a regional fund to stimulate the growth of employment in the underdeveloped and depressed regions, and the social fund to assist with vocational training, and retraining for the young, the under-25s, the long-term unemployed — those who have been unemployed for more than 12 months — the disadvantaged, women, ethnic groups and the handicapped. No one denies that it was a fine principle—the idea of a Common Market in which the rich nations and regions would contribute to the well-being and welfare of the poorer nations and regions.

However, what has happened in practice? Has the gap between the richest and the poorest regions widened or narrowed? In 1975, when the European regional fund was established, the gap between the richest and the poorest regions could be measured on a ratio of 5:1. The poorer regions were five times poorer than the richer. In 1975, Britain had 1·25 million people unemployed and our trade in manufactured goods with the EC was roughly in balance. Since then, unemployment in Britain has trebled and the gap between the poorest and the richest regions has widened to a ratio of 7:1 or 8:1. The richer regions have become richer and the poorer regions, including much of Great Britain, have become poorer. Britain's deficit in manufactured goods with the EC has increased to an incredible and frightening £9 billion. That is a measure of what has happened to Britain since it became a member of the EC.

Mr. Forth: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the increasing disparity between richer and poorer regions is a fairly widespread phenomenon? For example, Athens is much richer than the rest of Greece, while Milan and Turin are much richer than the mezzogiorno in southern Italy. Is not the disparity a fairly constant phenomenon in every Community country? Therefore, does the hon. Gentleman agree that any Community wide attempt to reduce the disparities will run up against the fundamental laws and effects of economics?

Mr. Evans: That is the phenomenon of capitalism.

Mr. Forth: Yes, absolutely.

Mr. Evans: That is why the Labour party is opposed to the phenomenon of capitalism and to allowing capitalism to run rampant, so that the richest regions develop and grow rich whereas the poorer regions decline. The original concepts of the regional and social fund were to attempt to stem that tide. It has failed abysmally and later in my speech I shall give some of the reasons for that failure.

The backdrop to the debate is the massive growth of unemployment in the EEC. In the original 10 member states—we are now 12, of course, and we will discuss the accession of Spain and Portugal and its impact— there are more than 13 million people unemployed, 11·1 per cent. of the total work force in the original 10. With the advent of Spain and Portugal, the figure is over 16 million. I am sure the Minister will agree that one has to be cautious about the statistics issued by the various EEC countries. I have great difficulty in believing unemployment figures which tell me that the total in Greece is 5·8 per cent. whereas in the Netherlands the figure is 15·2 per cent. I suspect that the Dutch include everything in their unemployment statistics, whereas the Greeks are apparently measuring something else altogether.

Britain can hardly complain about figures and the way they are used, because the Government have repeatedly fiddled the unemployment figures and they are currently under-measuring the figure by about 750,000 people.

Mr. Colin Moynihan (Lewisham, East): Nonsense.

Mr. Evans: The hon. Gentleman says it is nonsense, but I wonder how he would describe the fiddles which the Government have got up to over the past six years, the effects of which have been to under-measure unemployment by 750,000.

[Mr. Evans]

The amount of EEC money that is spent on the social fund is a relative pittance. It is also a pittance for the regional fund. According to the statement on the 1985 Community budget presented to the House in October 1985 by the Minister of State, Treasury, the payments for the social fund were £832 million and the expenditure on the regional fund was £950 million. That is the two-pronged attack on correcting the regional imbalances in the EEC — £832 million, when we have unemployment levels of over 13 million. It is hardly surprising that the social fund has had virtually no impact on ameliorating the problems of unemployment.

The figures and the categories that are covered by the remit of the social fund show that more than 5 million of the 13 million people were under 25 years of age. More than 4 million were classified as long-term unemployed —the very categories that the social fund was designed to do something about. As the Minister has pointed out —though not in the way that I would look at it—the applications for aid from the social fund far outweigh the funds available. In a debate of this nature it is always worth while to compare expenditure on the social fund to the expenditure under the common agricultural policy.

In 1985, the expenditure on the social fund was £832 million. The expenditure on the CAP was £12·148 billion. I put it to the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) that that is one reason why the social and regional funds have had no impact on the distribution of wealth and prosperity in the EEC. The CAP has certainly succeeded in extending and expanding the wealth of the EEC but generally to relatively few pockets. The EEC spends 14½ times more money on growing food that nobody wants than on assisting and training the unemployed.

In that context, it is worth looking at the statement of the then Minister who is now the Prime Minister's PPS. Referring to the amount spent on the social fund as opposed to the CAP, he said:

"This situation provides further vindication—if any were necessary—of the Government's firm view that there should be a shift in Community spending away from agriculture and towards activities meeting other needs of high priority such as are covered by the regional and social funds." — [Official Report, 28 April 1983; Vol. 41, c. 1071.]

Those words mock today's unemployed, because there has not been a shift of a penny from the CAP towards either the social fund or the regional fund.

What of the future? From a British point of view it is somewhat bleak. Document 7711/85 gives the guidelines for the management of the social fund and document 9901/85 relates to the accession of Spain and Portugal. Document 7711/85 outlines three categories of regions or areas that will qualify for assistance under the social fund. The first relates to "absolute priority" areas. The second relates to the "industrial and sectoral restructuring" of certain areas, which mainly relate to areas in which there has been considerable rundown and redundancy in coal and steel, and these are assisted by the ECSC.

The third relates to

"areas of high and long-term unemployment".

In that context, about half of Britain qualifies. It is a depressing list of the areas that now qualify for assistance under the social fund—areas that have been decimated because of the Government's policies over the last six years. They are:

"Central, Cheshire, Cleveland, Clwyd, Cornwall, Derbyshire, Dumfries and Galloway, Durham, Dyfed, Fife, Greater Manchester, Gwent, Gwynedd, Hereford and Worcester, Highlands, Humberside, Isle of Wight, Lancashire, Lincolnshire, Lothian, Merseyside, Mid Glamorgan, Northumberland, Nottinghamshire, Salop, South Glamorgan, South Yorkshire, Staffordshire, Strathclyde, Tayside, Tyne and Wear, West Glamorgan, West Midlands, West Yorkshire; Workington (Cumbria), Coalville (Leicestershire), Corby (Northamptonshire)."

That is a measure of what has happened under this Government. Those once-prosperous areas now qualify for payments under the social fund.

But a different picture emerges from document 9901/85, which amends Council regulation No. 2950/83 on the tasks of the social fund. That document relates to the accession of Spain and Portugal. As we are all aware, these two largely impoverished Mediterranean countries have very high unemployment, and they have been added to the list of "absolute priority" areas. That applies to much of Spain and the whole of Portugal.

None of us would quarrel with that. Those areas have substantial problems, and in my view they will have a lot more now that they are in the Common Market. I welcome the advent of Spain and Portugal to the EEC. It just might help to bring the CAP crashing down around the ears of those who have benefited from it over a long period. That would be very good. If absolute priority areas are extended, that must be at the expense of other areas. The rate of assistance paid to absolute priority areas has been raised from 50 to 55 per cent. There has also been an accelerated rate of depreciation in the cost of training centres. The amount of assistance paid to projects that qualify under the social fund will be raised from 50 to 55 per cent. The amount available to the regions from the social fund will be increased from 40 per cent. to 42·5 per cent. in 1986, to 43·5 per cent. in 1987 and to 44·5 per cent. in 1988.

Mr. Forth: I am trying to follow the hon. Gentleman's logic. If his party supports Spain and Portugal's accession, which he says it does, and if his party believes in the redistribution of wealth to the less well-off, which I believe it does, will he support the redistribution of wealth from a country such as ours to Spain and Portugal? Does he agree that, with that very accession, the likelihood of reforming the CAP and reducing the share it takes of the EC budget becomes less likely? While welcoming the accession of Spain and Portugal, the hon. Gentleman and his party have reduced the opportunity to reform the CAP and reduced the take from the social fund for Britain.

Mr. Evans: I was a member of the European Assembly for three years and I have spent the past 12 years listening to stories about how we will reform the CAP. I have yet to see it happen, in spite of all the fine talk from a variety of sources. I said that the accession of Spain and Portugal might have the welcome side effect of bringing the CAP crashing down because of the contradictions that have been built into it.

If there were a substantial increase in the social fund, we would be able to meet the commitments which I assume that the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire wants to achieve as much as me. The Commission has stressed the importance of keeping the right balance between relatively underdeveloped regions and those with serious unemployment. The words are fine, but where does the money come from to ensure that areas such as Spain, Portugal, Greece and the mezzogiorno receive help? It must come from areas such as St. Helens, which I represent, and Merseyside, although the problems there are growing almost weekly because of the Government's policies.

Page 36 of the 13th annual report tells us about applications under point C1 of the fund, which covers young people leaving full-time education. It says:

"In the case of the other regions in the Community, the United Kingdom obtained over 67 per cent. of approvals (61·84 per cent. overall) followed by France with 14·51 per cent. (14·21 per cent. overall). The Youth Training Scheme (YTS) accounted for the lion's share of United Kingdom approvals under point C1. Four applications presented by the Manpower Services Commission made up the entire amount requested (423·49 million ECU). Priority was accorded to three of these (232·97 million ECU and 309,000 beneficiaries) of which one bore the whole of the entire weighted reduction for the United Kingdom".

What impact will the reduction in the social fund moneys to Great Britain, flowing from the accession of Spain and Portugal, have on youth training scheme funding? Will the EEC provide less funding for it? Has the EEC responded to the new proposal for a two-year YTS? I understand that no agreements have been reached on funding from the Commission, but I would be grateful for information because it will affect the viability of the scheme as many employers are unhappy about signing people on for a two-year scheme.

Page 35 of the 13th annual report refers to certain types of practical training, such as that given by the Übungsfirmen or practice firms in the Federal Republic of Germany, or in the information technology centres, the ITECs, in the United Kingdom, which are regarded as work experience. I have an excellent ITEC in St. Helens, and I hope that the Minister can assure us that in future ITECs will get a fair share of whatever funds are available from the social fund.

I read a newspaper report about questions raised by a former colleague, Mrs. Barbara Castle, who for many years served in the House with such distinction. She asked at the European Assembly many questions about the social fund which require answers from the Government. Apparently, there was little response from the Commission. According to Mrs. Castle, the social fund is facing bankruptcy, and unless more money is allocated to it from member states, it cannot meet its commitments. There is considerable danger that the social fund will scrap assistance to such important groups as voluntary organisations that deal with the mentally and physically handicapped. Is there to be a supplementary budget? According to the report, a commissioner has said that that may be necessary. If there is a supplementary budget to ensure that the social fund has the correct amount of finance, what will the Government's attitude be? Even if that solves the crisis, will it not simply recur every year?

At present the common agricultural policy takes up 72 per cent. of the Community budget. Apparently, the CAP budget is growing remorselessly, and will grow even more because of the agricultural problems of Spain and Portugal. I have listened for 12 years to people saying that they would reform it, but it goes marching on. If we withdraw from the CAP, it will release hundreds of millions of pounds which we can spend on solving some of the problems in our regions relating to unemployment, training and retraining.

The vast majority of the British people can see no merit in spending so massively on crazy agricultural policies, while at the same time spending so little on employment and social policies which have merit and are worthwhile. The British people are right.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): We welcome the debate on the European social fund. It is an important subject, which addresses itself to the problems of managing a mixed economy. The Europeans have more faith in the running of a mixed economy than the Government, who have tended to follow monetarist lines and neglect the public sector. We must achieve a balance between the public and private sectors, and in the new fund there is bias towards public sector and small and medium-sized undertakings. That is a good mix for improving the economy not only of this but other European countries.

The objectives of equipping the work force and reducing regional imbalances in the labour market must be regarded as extremely important, and recruitment and wage subsidies are indicative of job creation. We know that geographical mobility is difficult to achieve, with many people not prepared to move from their communities. However, with services of advice and job creation, there are great opportunities within the European social fund to improve our economy.

As we have already heard, unemployment is a major problem that confronts us all, and particularly the hard-hit regions of Europe, not least those of Britain. In welcoming Spain and Portugal into the Community, we must not forget the problems in northern Europe. It is significant that the post of Commissioner for the social fund has been transferred from an Irishman to a Spaniard. This may have some influence on the policies operated in the social fund, which may concentrate more on the Mediterranean regions.

Mr. Forth: Is it not interesting to observe that Socialist Spain has an unemployment rate that has just gone up to 22 per cent.? One is left wondering what contribution a Spanish Commissioner, coming from a Socialist country with such a high level of unemployment, can make to improve the employment position in the community as a whole.

Mr. Livsey: Although Spain has such a high unemployment rate, it has suffered over many years from the ravages of dictatorship and Fascism. The accession of Spain will assist greatly in helping its stability and will create more co-operation in Europe and less likelihood of extremism in that country. I am not entirely convinced that Socialism will solve the problems—I agree with the hon. Gentleman there—but, none the less, it is a vast improvement that Spain is in the Community.

The authorities in the United Kingdom involved in the European social fund are the local authorities, the Welsh and Scottish Development Agencies, in my part of the world Mid-Wales Development and the MSC. It is interesting that, where the latter operates, there could be competition between the MSC and the local authorities where there is not enough agreement about the types of schemes that are adopted.

[Mr. Livsey]

However, it is worrying to note that some journalists who observe the scene believe—it can be seen from the figures—that there is an austerity drive in the European social fund and there may be a crisis in its funding, too.

It is believed that the new rules could hit Britain hardest. Concentration upon new technologies is very important, but in some of the poorer regions the new technologies have hardly blossomed. A very great effort is needed to introduce schemes of that type in those areas. The previous Commissioner, Commissioner Sutherland, said that the European social fund is ill-equipped and inadequate for achieving its objectives. More resources are required overall, yet the new guidelines are more restrictive.

About half of the United Kingdom is affected by European social fund aid. I ask the Government to give special priority status to regions other than Northern Ireland. Scotland, Wales and the north of England are areas of extreme deprivation. They should be included on the same basis as Northern Ireland. Since 1979 there has been an increase of 95,000 in the unemployment figures for Wales. In addition, together with Italy, Portugal and Spain, we are at the bottom of the incomes league.

Mr. Forth: And Greece.

Mr. Livsey: Yes, I take the hon. Gentleman's point. We are very poorly off, compared with the richer members of the European Community. Additional funding is needed. Efforts are being made to assist redundant workers through the urban aid programme. In-company training schemes are being provided in the textile industry. However, the old mining areas face a huge problem. Large numbers of miners have lost their jobs in the last 15 to 18 months. In south Wales alone during that period 6,000 miners have lost their jobs. I trust that the European social fund will be used to try to overcome some of the massive problems that have been created by these redundancies.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment referred to the fact that there are delays in receiving moneys that are due. This has caused some cash flow problems for firms that benefit from the European social fund. I make no excuse for mentioning my own area, Powys, which has been excluded from the European social fund. Reference has already been made to many of the areas that surround Powys. Powys is an island that does not receive aid from the European social fund. It is the only Level II region that has been excluded, even though it faces severe regional problems.

Phoney statistics have been used. Separate data were provided for the unemployment and gross domestic product figures. According to the Central Statistical Office, they were not officially available. In fact, they were not reliable. Powys and Dyfed were combined for GDP purposes. The result was that areas of south Powys were not included in the statistics, in particular those for unemployment. This has caused severe problems for Powys.

I hope that the Minister will look carefully at the problems faced by Powys. Since the last application in 1984, the Powys data show an increase in unemployment of 2·1 per cent. which means that unemployment in Powys is higher than the United Kingdom average. A study is being undertaken covering Dyfed, Gwynedd and Powys which might lead to integrated action under the European social fund for those areas. Wages in rural areas in Wales stand at 86·9 per cent. of the average wage for Wales as a whole. That is a very low figure in terms of British and European wage levels. That again underlines the need for special consideration to be given to Powys. It is a travesty that Powys and the poorer regions of Britain should not be included. They should undoubtedly have priority status.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): My hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) covered most of the points that I wished to raise, but I wish briefly to follow the comments of the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) about high priority areas.

It is disgraceful that the northern region is not a high priority area, as it has the highest unemployment in mainland Britain. I shall not give percentages because these are people who are unemployed. In Tyne and Wear 100,582 people are unemployed, of whom 46,000 have been unemployed for more than 12 months and 20,767 for more than three years. That is the extent of unemployment in my area under the Conservative Government, so goodness knows why it is not a high priority area for the European social fund. I hope that the Minister will put the northern region forward as a high priority area.

My hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North referred to the CAP. It is nonsense to compare the social fund with the CAP. Most male unemployment in Tyne and Wear is in heavy industry such as shipbuilding. Yet farmers are being paid to grow produce that no one wants. The Conservatives always complain about subsidies to the mining, steel and shipbuilding industries, but never about the huge subsidies to farmers under the CAP. It is like telling the Tyne's shipbuilders to build as many ships as they like because as soon as they get out of the Tyne we can scuttle them and build some more. That is how the CAP works for the farmers. That is the kind of nonsense that we get from the EEC. I hope that the Minister will deal with the points raised about that by my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North and that he will take forward my plea that the northern region be a high priority area.

In Jarrow, one in three of the male population is out of work. The last ship repair yard closed two years ago, the last pit was closed more than three years ago and the last steel plant is being phased out this year. That is the level of unemployment faced in Jarrow this year, the 50th anniversary of the Jarrow march when 200 men marched to London to bring the problems of the regions to the notice of central Government. I do not like to use percentages, but I have to take this figure from the history books. At that time, unemployment in Jarrow was 79 per cent. Those 200 men marched to London not to get a crust of bread and a bowl of soup but for the right to work—the basic right of people in this country to go out and fend for their families and to have the dignity of a pay packet. It is a pity that we cannot get it through the thick skulls of Conservative Ministers that people want to work—they do not want to dodge it or run away from it. They want to do a useful day's work to fend for their families. That is what it is all about.

The Minister talked about training, but the Government closed the skillcentre at Killingworth, so there is now no skill centre north of the Tyne until one gets to Edinburgh. The Government say that we get more training under the social fund, but a great deal of the social fund money that comes to this country is used to substitute for money that the Government are taking away from the regions.

I hope that the Minister will take on board the points that I have made in this brief contribution.

Mr. Lang: I have listened with interest to the points made by hon. Members during this short debate. Whatever problems there may be, the House is, if I do not put too high a gloss on the remarks of the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans), agreed on two things. The first is that the considerable support given by the European social fund to schemes of various kinds is valued and appreciated, and the second is that we must continue our efforts to secure support for those schemes in future.

We need to play our part in ensuring that the fund is an effective means of helping unemployed people throughout Europe. At the same time, no one can pretend that this type of support will solve all the problems that face us. It has a part to play but we will not help the unemployed by spending more than we can afford as a Community on such help. That is why it is vital to concentrate help where it is most needed. That is recognised within the Community but the problems arise when the hard choices have to be made.

The hon. Member for St. Helens, North agreed with the two priorities that I emphasised in my opening speech, that of youth unemployment—which is now falling in the United Kingdom—and that of the long-term unemployed. That, too, is an important priority which we have emphasised to the Commission. The hon. Gentleman will be aware of the many initiatives that we have recently introduced to try to help the long-term unemployed make their way back into work, particularly the Community programme and the introduction of the job start scheme.

The hon. Gentleman made the comparison between the money spent on the common agricultural policy and the social fund. We are working towards eliminating the costly surplus under the agricultural policy and we want to see a higher proportion of funds contributed to the social fund. However, if we had been in the Community earlier on in its formative years and had the support of the Labour party for membership at that time, we might have been in a better position to influence the development of the Community during those earlier crucial years.

It is churlish of the hon. Gentleman to underrate the importance of the European social fund which brings benefit to many hundred of thousands of people.

Mr. Evans: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that I did not underrate the importance of the European social fund? Will he accept that I have tried to get across that I would like to see the expenditure reversed and more being spent on the social fund than on the CAP?

Mr. Lang: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that clear.

The hon. Gentleman welcomed the entry of Spain and Portugal to the Community, but again I was sad that he did so in the hope of bringing the CAP crashing down. That is a somewhat negative approach to the matter. It might have been more appropriate to have welcomed the entry of those two countries, not just because they provide us with a larger market for our goods, but because we see the entry of two ancient European countries which are now two developing democracies and which deserve to be welcomed into the Community in their own right.

The hon. Gentleman asked about YTS funding following the entry of Spain and Portugal. The Commission has yet to make a decision on that or funding for other schemes for 1986. We expect that it will continue to get a good level of support in this, the first year of a two-year scheme. The support expected is taken into account in setting levels of funding for the scheme as a whole. At the same time, that does not mean that other small schemes such as information and technology centres cannot be funded. If a small scheme gets priority it will still be fully funded despite more of the budget as a whole going to Spain and Portugal.

The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point when he says that any increase in the proportion of spending going to the special priority areas will reduce the total proportion of the funds available to other areas but it is equally the case that within the special priority areas is the whole of Northern Ireland and we should acknowledge that the United Kingdom stands to benefit from both sectors of the fund.

I also took note of the special points made by the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) in pleading the case of the north-east.

We have discussed tonight the current priorities of the fund as set out in the management guidelines, its record as shown in the latest annual report and the new demands which will come with the accession of Spain and Portugal. The decision on how to allocate the limited resources will not become any easier. The Commission has a difficult job in trying to balance all the interests concerned. We may not always agree with all of its decisions but we recognise the pressures and difficulties which it faces.

If we look at the fund's priorities it is clearly right that a large proportion should go to the worst-off areas both in terms of under-development and unemployment and structural change. It is right that some of the available resources should go to projects in the less hard-hit areas for the purpose of helping especially disadvantaged groups.

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) suggested that more parts of the Community should be designated as special priority areas apart from Northern Ireland. I am sure he understands that that is a matter for the Commission. I would merely say that if there are too many special priorities, the benefit of being one and the advantages that ensue are diluted.

I am in complete agreement with the remarks of hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor about Powys. The 1983 gross domestic product and the unemployment figures at that time were the bases on which the Commission drew up its boundaries. I believe that they were wrong and that inadequate consideration was given to boundaries and some low-population areas. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government will continue to press the interests of Powys and those of the Western Isles. We believe that they deserve a better rating than that which the Commission has given them.

It is important that the fund should try to target support on measures that encourage change and growth rather than on the bolstering of inefficiency. We welcome the present emphasis on training for new technology and small firms. Tonight's debate has served to reinforce the view, which I expressed earlier, that there is scope for a higher degree of priority to be accorded within the fund to the long-term unemployed, who represent throughout the Community an increasing proportion of the unemployed. The fund could do much to encourage the provision of programmes for them as it has encouraged programmes for the young unemployed.

We are pleased to have support from the fund for programmes such as the enterprise allowance scheme for those who are setting up on their own. Almost every other member state is following Britain's lead in this direction. Support from the Community has been a major factor in enabling us to develop these programmes on their current scale. I am sure that the same is true for many projects at local level.

The European social fund represents one of the most tangible and visible benefits to the United Kingdom of our Community membership. We shall continue to press on behalf of all hon. Members and those whom they represent, for efficient and adequate support from the fund for schemes to encourage employment. The issues which have been raised in this debate will help us to ensure that we do so effectively. Meanwhile, I hope that the House will agree to take note of the documents.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 7711/85, a Commission Decision on guidelines for the management of the European Social Fund in the financial years 1986 to 1988; 9901/85, a Commission proposal to amend Council Decision 83/516/EEC and Regulation (EEC) No. 2850/83 on the tasks of the European Social Fund, in view of the accession of Spain and Portugal; and 9854/85, Thirteenth Report from the Commission on the activities of the European Social Fund (financial year 1984), and welcomes the contribution to employment and training schemes made by the European Social Fund.

Printing Dispute (Wapping)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Durant.]

11.2 pm

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): For 28 years before coming to the House I worked as a printer on the News of the World and later on The Sun in Bouverie street. I am sponsored by the largest printing union, SOGAT '82.

Rupert Murdoch's callous and malevolent sacking of his entire work force of 5,500 without a penny of compensation or redundancy pay is an act of savagery unparalleled in British industrial relations. It is an affront to justice and ordinary human decency.

I shall begin with what the dispute is not about. It is not about new technology. That is something that the unions accept, and already operate on other newspapers. The truth is that in the Wapping machine room there is no new technology. The machinery there is secondhand. It is 16 years old and it has been in store. It is the same as that which was running in Bouverie street and Gray's Inn road. It is old letterpress machinery, with no facility for printing colour. The new technology in Wapping is in origination, in computerised photocomposition. This already exists and it is being worked with union agreement at the Daily Mirror and The Mail on Sunday. Let no one say that the unions are Luddite. Technology cannot excuse the barbarism that has occurred.

One of the most offensive aspects of this squalid story has been Murdoch's lies, the conspiracy of deceit, over months and years. One example is his cynical pretence of negotiating the transfer of staff to Wapping while all the time working deliberately and cold-bloodedly to eliminate the staff completely. One myth is that the company tried to negotiate for six years and could get nowhere. That is the opposite of the truth, as I shall show.

The staff at Gray's Inn road were not involved in negotiations because it was told that it was not going to Wapping. All the members of the clerical staff on all the newspapers were told that they were to stay put when the printing moved and that as a consequence they were not to be involved in the negotiations. The chapel and the department where I worked was the News of the World machine section. I have documents which show that what were called preliminary discussions were proposed by Mr. O'Neill for the company on 3 May 1983, when he invited chapel officials to tour the new building and then to fly to Finland to visit a modern printing plant. The management at that time gave clear, firm, categoric guarantees that there would be no compulsory redundancies.

On 2 January 1985, discussions had reached the stage where Mr. Britton could write the chapel a lengthy letter setting out all the areas of agreement and the company's proposals. He again reiterated:

"The company has given assurances that no regular employee need make himself available for voluntary redundancy."

These management proposals were accepted by a chapel meeting in January 1985.

On 12 January 1985, Mr. Isaacs, the father of the chapel, wrote, as he put it, "with pleasure" telling the management that relations appeared good. At the last meeting with the management, Mr. Isaacs stated that the chapel would "accept all the constrictions laid down by management, and are prepared to move forthwith into Wapping to print the News of the World."

But all this was a blind; it was bogus; it was a cheat —for all along, behind the smokescreen of these phoney negotiations, Murdoch was advancing his secret strategy to provoke a dispute and sack the entire work force. All talks were broken off by the management in the spring of last year. The management said that Wapping would not be used for the News of the World or the Sun but for an entirely new title, The London Post. Despite the attempted secrecy and repeated denials, information leaked about people being bussed in from Southampton and about electricians doing production work. The talk of a new title was a further deception covering the final preparations for the production of the four Murdoch newspapers at Wapping and simultaneously throwing the entire work force into the street without a penny.

These 5,500 British workers, our fellow citizens, have been the victims of a disgraceful, cynical and carefully laid plot to deny them their basic entitlements under British law. The Government should explain whether they approve, whether this is the sort of industrial relations practice that they want to encourage. These thousands of people have in many cases given a lifetime of service to these publications, often predating Murdoch's ownership. They are not just statistics, but people, flesh and blood with lives, families, futures, hopes and feelings. Are they to be callously discarded and thrown without a moment's thought on to the dole queue?

By this brutal action, Murdoch saves more than £40 million, and possibly £60 million, in redundancy pay and gloats about it. But who picks up the tab? The answer is the taxpayer, in state benefits. So the Government are subsidising Murdoch's barbarism with millions of pounds. Are they happy about this? Do they approve? I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will tell us.

If Murdoch makes even bigger profits from his British operation by this shabby injustice — he told the New York Times that he expects a 75 per cent. increase in profits next year—what will he do with them? He will export them to America to finance his media empire there. Is this what the Government want to encourage and reward? Murdoch owns 95 newspapers worldwide, yet his four United Kingdom newspapers make more profits—some £50 million last year—than the rest put together. The thanks that the British staff got for producing those profits was the sack from an unscrupulous proprietor who has just sold out his citizenship to become Americanised so as to own more newspapers in America. A former British Conservative Prime Minister once described a business man as the "unacceptable face of capitalism". Is not Murdoch's the ugliest, most repellent, unacceptable face we have seen? Will the Government dissociate themselves from it, or endorse it?

Few would not now recognise that in Brenda Dean and Tony Dubbins the printing unions have two of the most reasonable, measured, temperate and realistic of leaders. They have leaned over backwards to reach an accommodation. The most far-reaching concessions were made to Murdoch to obtain union recognition: an unprecedented offer of no disputes without ballots; binding arbitration triggered by either party; a profitability, efficiency, productivity and job flexibility commitment; joint union comprehensive schemes; and fewer bargaining units—all this, plus direct input, both editorial and advertising. Let no one say that the unions were dinosaurs—not willing to change, to negotiate, to reach agreements taking on board new conditions and working practices. What more could the unions offer and still remain trade unions?

But Murdoch does not want, and is determined to destroy, free, independent unions. Instead he wants a single, tame, domesticated, client, yellow dog union, rather like the staff association at Government Communications Headquarters. He wants all industrial action, however minor, whatever the provocation, or circumstances, even at the end of disputes procedure and after a ballot, banned completely. He goes further than General Jaruzelski. He wants servitude. His lawyer's definition of industrial action includes refusing voluntary overtime and attending unauthorised meetings. For those offences, under the special form of legally binding agreement he wants, individual workers could be sued for damages and stripped of their homes and personal possessions. He deliberately and calculatedly laid down impossible conditions to engineer a strike.

A letter from the law firm of Farrar and Co. of 20 December 1985 to News International, advised on "the cheapest way" of "dispensing with the present work force".

It explained:

"The idea is to catch as many employees in the net as possible."

It even advised:

"there may be some merit in having piles of dismissal letters at exit doors".

That was in case the industrial action was of short duration. They wanted to ensure that they caught everyone in time. The lawyers reminded the company:

"We talked of this some months ago".

In other words, they had been conspiring and planning it for a long time. Has anyone heard of anything more despicable and shameful in industrial relations? It is a form of industrial terror.

New technology should be welcomed by all. It should be a boon to all. Its introduction should be by negotiation, handled sensitively, in a humane way, especially for people who have given years of service. All sorts of calumnies have been spread about printers, even by the present Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, previously the Secretary of State for Employment. He alleged on the BBC television programme "Question Time" that he had personal experience 10 years ago of SOGAT Saturday night jobs at the News of the World being ballotted around the country and that they were paid £300 for one night. As I worked at the News of the World 10 years ago, I told him that he had grossly misled millions of people. I sent him evidence in writing which showed that pay for a long 14-hour Saturday night in 1979, seven years ago, including all the overtime, was around £50. Ten years ago it would have been considerably less. In other words, the Secretary of State, in his gross and crude exaggeration, was about 1000 per cent. wrong. I gave him that information in writing on 15 February, but I am still waiting for him to correct the falsehood and put the record straight.

Many of those sacked were women — clerks, telephonists, librarians, cleaners, sales staff and circulation representatives—by no means excessively paid, but all victims of the same brutal treatment. Will the Government stand up for them? We should not forget the journalists, or "journos" as Murdoch disparagingly calls them, who were told, without consultation, to be bussed ignominiously behind the razor-wire fortifications at 24 hours notice, or be sacked. Those who honourably refused were dismissed with standard letters addressed "Dear Sir/ Madam". So much for press freedom and so much for the integrity and independence of the press. No wonder 108 journalists have left The Times since Murdoch took over.

We must all look at the grotesque operation of the law. If workers undertaking a strike after a ballot with an overwhelming majority can be dismissed, where is the right to strike? That could not happen in any other democratic country. Elsewhere, a contract of employment is suspended during a strike and reinstated afterwards. That must be rectified in this country.

What has been the effect of this Government's legislation? Within days of starting a lawful dispute following a ballot, SOGAT found itself snarled up and enmeshed in a dozen legal actions, its funds sequestrated, with a firm of chartered accountants controlling every penny the union owned. Was that the Government's intention? The union did not set out to break the law, ignore it, or be in contempt of it or to hide its funds. The union has been open and honest in its attitude. However, the law is geared to make it impossible for British workers to engage in a dispute and not be ensnared by it. Many hon. Members voted to restrict union activity, not to abolish it, but that is what has happened.

The legislation stopping secondary action was supposed to protect innocent third parties. Action was restricted to the workers' own employer and the employer's immediate first supplier or customer, but who is the employer if Murdoch sets up a maze of fictitious and allegedly independent companies? If former employees of Times Newspapers, or News Group newspapers knock on the door at Wapping where those newspapers are now printed, they find that the employer has disappeared and now calls himself something different. He calls himself London Post (Printers). It would be secondary action. Is that what was intended? The wholesaler would be the first customer, but not when Murdoch sets up a company between the papers and the wholesaler. Then any action becomes secondary.

To implement this chicanery, Murdoch set up six separate companies in the year before the dispute. Murdoch has exploited, twisted and manipulated the new laws to render trade union or collective action legally impossible. That cynical spectacle is causing a groundswell of public opinion against him. Even his own Wapping-produced Sunday Times of 16 February talked of "the legal ring-fence that now forbids or cripples many traditional forms of industrial action."

The paper quoted Eddie Shah as saying that the dispute is being "suffocated by the law." Murdoch's own paper actually goes on to say:

"There is little doubt that so far in this dispute the law has operated almost entirely to corral and circumscribe the unions, to a point where some are wondering whether the balance of worker-employer power may have shifted too far."

An editorial in The Guardian talked of the "shock on learning that 6,000 well-paid jobs can be junked overnight, without warning and without compensation or redundancy pay."

The trade paper, Printing World, talked in an editorial on 19 February of

"the unfairness of the position. Mr. Murdoch may well be congratulating his lawyers on the subtlety of their machinations, but others are aware that the employment laws are being twisted . . . For a company to divide itself into associated companies solely as a means of invoking the law against secondary picketing is a cynical manoeuvre. If that is the law then the law needs to be changed."

Do the Government agree with that? Will they now change those unjust laws? Does the right to withdraw labour still exist in Britain? Do workers have any rights at all?

The Labour party is clear about those anti-union laws. It will scrap the lot and start afresh, with workers' rights. But the existing laws are the Government's. Theirs is the responsibility. Are they prepared to restore some balance, fairness and justice? Will they give an assurance that they do not have yet another anti-union Bill coming along? The present laws not only permit, they positively incite, injustice, strife, division and bitterness and situations such as Wapping. Is that the Government's idea of "caring capitalism"?

What the House and the country will want to hear tonight is what the Government are going to do to promote a settlement. For the staff and the unions are not going to go away. The dispute and the picketing will continue until there is a settlement. A settlement can come about only by negotiation.

The electricians and the journalists at Wapping still have to live in the community. They will not want to work in those appalling conditions for ever. Already they are complaining to management. Engineers have refused to maintain the machines. The London press branch of the Electrical, Electronic, Telecommunications, and Plumbing Union who staff the Fleet street papers were not consulted or balloted. On 29 January this year they sent a resolution of protest to their union. The present situation with its unfairness, hardship and confrontation cannot endure for ever. There must be a resolution. I ask finally: will the Government use their influence to get the parties together, and encourage proper negotiations to end this evil situation?

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Does the right hon. Gentleman have the consent of both the Minister and the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) to speak?

Mr. Shore: Yes, Sir.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) for raising this scandalous matter in the House and giving me the opportunity to say a few words about it.

It is utterly deplorable that 5,500 print workers, men and women, should have been sacked by Mr. Murdoch. It is even worse that the circumstances should have been deliberately engineered so that they forfeited their redundancy pay and that their pension rights should have been put at risk.

It is a disgrace that the journalists employed on News International papers are compelled to work in an industrial complex surrounded by razor wire and security guards.

It is equally unacceptable, though so far little noticed, that the more than 3,000 people who live in Wapping—which I represent—should have their lives increasingly disrupted by a dispute in which they are not engaged and which they cannot influence. That disruption is happening in two principal ways.

First, convoys of heavy lorries leaving News International, escorted by police cars—sometimes with their sirens blaring—are being diverted away from the Highway, which is the natural route, and taken on a circuitous route through narrow streets in the heart of residential Wapping.

The noise of these heavy vehicles, the grinding of gears as they change down, and the speed with which they are driven, are a major disturbance and source of danger for the people who live in Wapping. That continues from mid-evening until well into the early hours of the morning. Minor accidents have already occured and more serious ones have been avoided by a whisker. The worst incident yet happened in Thomas More street on Saturday night, 1 March when a TNT lorry driver drove straight at a group of local people and demonstrating print workers. The road was very icy and slippery and the driver hit Mr. Tony Flint, a sacked switchboard worker, on the site and he was knocked unconcious and had to be taken to hospital.

My second point is that Wapping is being turned, for several days of the week, into a prison for the people who live there. It is now the most heavily policed area in the United Kingdom. People are constantly being stopped and questioned and asked for proof of identity when on foot. Residents driving home have had their cars turned back. That is a gross interference with the normal and lawful rights of free access to one's own home in one's own community. I have had many protests by letter and telephone from constituents and from such collective bodies as the Wapping tenants association, the Wapping parent action group and the trades council.

Clearly, no complete remedy will be found to these problems until the dispute is resolved. These are powerful and additional reasons why the Minister should abandon the "hands-off" and passive stance of his Department and lend his weight to securing an early and negotiated settlement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. David Trippier): I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) for giving me notice that he wished to intervene in the debate. I shall certainly consider the two specific points that he has drawn to my attention and if necessary I shall draw them to the attention of my colleagues in the Government.

I can tell the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) that we all want to see a swift and peaceful solution to this dispute. I am not here this evening to give advice either to News International or to the print unions about how they should conduct their business. I am certainly not here to talk about personalities. I must challenge the assertions made by the hon. Member for Newham, North-East about the fairness of the laws that the Government have introduced on industrial relations and I make no apologies for speaking about the law for which my Department is responsible.

Let me briefly remind the House what was left by the Labour Government when we came to power in 1979, as the changes that were subsequently made have a direct bearing on the dispute at Wapping. In 1979, trade union officials had immunity for the organisation of all sorts of excessive forms of industrial action, such as for example, indiscriminate secondary action, strikes—mainly about political matters—picketing at other people's places of work and secondary action to enforce the closed shop. In 1979, trade unions had almost complete immunity from legal action to recover the cost of the damage they had caused and at that time union balloting practices included balloting at inconvenient branch meetings and indirect block voting systems for union elections and strike votes by a show of hands at mass meetings.

The aim of the legislation that we have introduced step by step since 1979 has been to redress the balance of power in industrial relations, which had been shifted greatly in the unions' favour by the legislation of the Labour Government. Not even the hon. Member for Newham, North-East could deny that. We have given employers legal remedies against unreasonable action taken by trade unions in several situations. First, there must be a trade dispute between employees and their employer which is wholly or mainly about industrial matters. That means that unions can no longer organise political protests, which can greatly damage employers who have no control over the issues involved.

For all industrial action organised by a union, we have made immunity conditional on the holding of a properly conducted secret ballot in which the majority of those voting must say that they wish to take part in the action. It is important to stress that every person asked to go on strike must be given the chance to vote, and that is especially relevant to Wapping. They must be reminded that, by taking industrial action, they will be breaching their contract of employment that by taking strike or other industrial action, they are putting their jobs at risk. That is what our law requires, and that is again especially relevant to Wapping.

We have also limited the circumstances in which employees may take lawful secondary action. Where secondary action interferes with the performance of commercial contracts, or threatens to do so, its organisers must satisfy——

Mr. Leighton rose——

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman has already had a fair crack at the debate, and I agreed to allow the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney to intervene, so I have been left with only a short time in which to answer the debate.

If the secondary action is indiscriminate in its effects — for example, if its main effect is to disrupt the business of employers not involved in the dispute—its organisers have no immunity. The requirement, which is now most familiar, is that secondary action should take place at a customer or supplier who has a commercial contract with the employer in dispute, and be aimed at the supply of goods or services between them.

There are special provisions to cover the case where, because of a dispute, the employer in dispute transfers work normally done by his employees to an associated employer such as a subsidiary company. We did not, as some urged at the time, and some people seem to think now, outlaw all action in those circumstances. A reading of section 17 of the Employment Act 1980 will show that we gave unions the right to take action against any associated employer to whom work is transferred because of the dispute.

However, immunity for secondary action is subject to further conditions. Inducement to break a contract of employment has no immunity if it interferes with the supply of goods or services and the reason, or one of the reasons, for the industrial action is that the supplier does not recognise, negotiate with or consult trade unions or union officials, or because he employs members of a certain union or non-union members.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): Another management brief, just as in the Silentnight debate.

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman would be amazed. I wrote most of it myself.

The law on picketing is also important. Where pickets interfere with the ability of employers to fulfil their commercial contracts, they and their organisers normally have immunity from civil law proceedings only if the picketing is at or near the pickets' place of work and the purpose of the picketing is peacefully to obtain or communicate information or peacefully to persuade a person to work or not to work.

Mr. Prescott: What about Murdoch?

Mr. Trippier: I have to tell the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) that daubing cars with paint is not peaceful persuasion by anyone's standards.

It is important to remember that picketing which is not peaceful and which, for example, leads to violent or abusive behaviour, intimidation or obstruction of the highway, is likely to involve offences under the criminal law. There is no immunity for people who commit such offences while taking industrial action, and they may be arrested and prosecuted by the police.

All this means is that the industrial relations scene to which the hon. Gentleman refers is light years away from the one that we inherited. I am pleased to admit that the number of strikes is at a post-war low and that the number of days lost shows a substantial decline.

Mr. Leighton: What about Murdoch?

Mr. Trippier: I said at the beginning of the debate that I would not refer to personalities.

This decline has been made possible partly by our laws, but our laws alone cannot take all the credit. They would not have succeeded if they had not reflected and kept pace with the views of ordinary working people. Ordinary working people do not want to be called out on strike without first being asked for their views, and that means not just a car park show of hands but a properly conducted secret ballot. Ordinary working people do not want to be dragged into somebody else's dispute.

I do not want to go back over old ground, but I think that the Labour party suffers from a peculiarly short memory. They were, after all, swept from power in revulsion against the wholesale spread of secondary action and secondary picketing that gripped the country in the winter of 1978. Our aim has been to see that never again will there be such wholesale damage done to employers, trade unionists, non-union members and the community at large by the spread of someone else's quarrel.

We have done all that we can to open the doors of new technology. The hon. Member for Newham, North-East said that that was not relevant, but I think that it is extremely relevant. So often in the past secondary action and mass picketing with its bully-boy tactics have been used to stop the implementation of new production techniques.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): What about Murdoch's bully boys.

Mr. Trippier: Standing out against new technology does not preserve jobs, it destroys them. Of course, not all the jobs that disappear in this way in the United Kingdom are lost for ever. Many of them are alive and well and living in our competitor countries, where there has been a longer tradition of shared objectives between management and work force. I have said before that I do not work to advise either of the parties in this dispute——

Mr. Prescott: What about Murdoch?

Mr. Trippier: I do not wish to get involved with personalities, as the hon. Member for Newham, North-East has sought to do, by referring in emotive language to one individual.

I want to end simply by noting that a new realism is developing in other industries and indeed, thanks to Mr. Eddie Shah, elsewhere in the printing industry. I hope that that realism will one day take root in Fleet street.

11.32 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I think that the Minister has disgraced himself tonight. He was asked important questions about Murdoch by my hon. Friends and he has not had the guts to reply to them or to state where he stands on Murdoch's role in this affair.

The Question having been proposed after Ten o'clock on Monday evening and the debate having continued for half an hour, Mr. Deputy Speaker adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

YTS

1. Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the relationship of Her Majesty's Inspectorate to the YTS Inspectorate being established within the Manpower Services Commission.

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mr. Chris Patten): The two organisations will be entirely separate. Contacts between them will develop as the pattern of work of the training standards advisory service becomes established. I am confident that the present constructive relationship between Her Majesty's Inspectorate and the Manpower Services Commission will continue.

Mr. Michie: Is the Minister aware that there is growing concern in education and training circles that a separate and distinctive inspectorate is likely to encourage further division between the two rather than what we all wish, which is much more co-operation. It also compounds suspicion that there is likely to be a difference in standards between education and the YTS.

Mr. Patten: Those suspicions are not well founded. Obviously there is some overlap between the functions of the two bodies, and there is a considerable need for liaison. I do not think it should be impossible to achieve that greater liaison.

Mr. Sheerman: The Minister, in one of his illustrious speeches, called for education and training to be part of the same thing — learning. Why, then, are the Government to set up a new kind of inspectorate that is different and does not talk on an intimate basis to the other and is not part of the same body? Why can we not have one inspectorate for all kinds of educational training?

Mr. Patten: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman reads my speeches. I do not think that it should be impossible to secure greater liaison. I think that there is a slight difference between on-the-job and off-the-job training. It is appropriate that there should be different bodies.

2. Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received on the educational content of YTS.

Mr. Chris Patten: My right hon. Friend has received no recent representations on this aspect of YTS.

Mr. Hoyle: Does the Minister not realise that there is only 20 weeks off-the-job training on a two-year YTS course, as against the 26 weeks recommended by educationists and, indeed, the MSC model schemes? Does he agree that the lack of educational content makes a nonsense of the so-called quality training that he is seeking to achieve? It would be impossible to achieve.

Mr. Patten: No. The figure of 20 weeks off-the-job education and training agreed by the MSC for the two-year YTS is a minimum requirement. Longer periods will be encouraged when these are suggested by the trainee's needs when a vocational course is pursued.

Mr. Lawler: Unlike my hon. Friend, I do not have a brief to read from. Will he say whether the certificate of pre-vocational education will be widely available to YTS trainees during their two-year scheme?

Mr. Patten: We hope to develop CPVE in that way. I think I am right in saying that so far about 15,000 students in about 1,000 institutions are on the CPVE course. That is a good start and I hope to see better achievements next year.

Mr. Sheerman: The Minister's answer was rather complacent. Is it not a fact that the model scheme which the MSC pioneered had a 26-week off-the-job educational content? That was an important part. Is it not worrying that we read in the papers this morning that the only young member of the Youth Training Board is considering resigning because he is worried about the whole provision and the quality of YTS, and about whether there will be a guarantee that what a YTS trainee is promised is delivered by the employer?

Mr. Patten: I do not acccept what the hon. Gentleman has said. The intention of the two-year YTS is to enable young people to get the chance to work for a qualification, and I hope that we shall be able to achieve that.

National Union of Students

3. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will introduce legislation making membership of the National Union of Students optional for students.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. George Walden): The Government have not closed their mind to the possibility of legislating on this and other student union matters, but have no present plans for doing so.

Mr. Bruinvels: Will my hon. Friend accept that many students, including those belonging to Leicester university Conservatives, deeply regret being forced to become automatic members of the NUS? Will he reconsider his answer, so that students can be given the opportunity to opt into the NUS rather than being forced to become members of a union which is devoid of the political views that they espouse?

Mr. Walden: I sympathise with my hon. Friend's frustration, but I understand that it is open to individual student unions to decide, on a democratic basis, whether to disaffiliate from the NUS.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Minister aware that he has a little local difficulty with the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels), but that Labour Members agree that it sounds a sensible idea? If it goes ahead, will the Minister consider the possibility of a ballot, because the Government are always rabbiting on about ballots? The Government thought that it would be a good idea to have political fund ballots for all the trade unions. The result has been to leave the Government with egg all over their face, because some unions pay money to the Labour party now when they did not do so before.

Mr. Walden: I am slightly confused by this train of thought. The Government are not against ballots in any circumstances, but I repeat that we sympathise with the view of those who question automatic membership of the student union.

Mr. Stokes: Why is it necessary to have a National Union of Students at all? Why could it not be abolished? Does my hon. Friend recollect that many of us who were at university before the war got on very well without a union at all?

Mr. Walden: I suppose that theoretically the NUS could vote itself out of existence as well.

Mr. Janner: Does the Minister appreciate that while the NUS and, I am sure, all of us here deplore a violent response to expressions of view, however much we may despise them, it would be better for the Government to spend time discussing with the NUS the cuts that they are making in the standard of life for students, or they will disappear along with the union?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That supplementary was a little wide of the question.

Mr. Walden: The House has made known its views on the linkage of that supplementary question.

Physics and Chemistry Teachers

4. Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is satisfied with the numbers of physics and chemistry teachers entering secondary education.

Mr. Chris Patten: No. The Government are particularly concerned by the sharp reduction in recruitment to physics training courses in 1985, and the potential impact on the numbers entering teaching next autumn. The more modest decline in interest in chemistry teaching could also be of concern if the trend continues.

Mr. McNair-Wilson: Is my right hon. Friend aware that at least one major British pharmaceutical company has told me that it would be prepared to release members of its scientific staff to teach in local schools if that would assist in the shortage? Does he welcome that initiative, and, as this is Industry Year, will he give some encouragement to it?

Mr. Patten: I give great encouragement to such initiative. Now that the dispute is, we hope, behind us, we should be able to get on with talking to education authorities, industry and others about how we can crack this long-standing problem.

Mr. Dalyell: In the light of the reports by the Institute of Physics and Sir Alec Merrison, well might the Government be concerned. What is the figure for physics students going into teacher training? Is it in single figures for the whole of Britain, as has been rumoured? What action will the Government take to put this deploraole and dangerous situation right?

Mr. Patten: I am happy to be able to tell the hon. Gentleman that the number is not in single figures, but in three figures. For those taking PGCE in 1985, the figure was 255——

Mr. Dalyell: For next year?

Mr. Patten: For 1985. That figure is still a great deal too low. The figure is not in single figures for next year either. I do not have the figure, but I shall let the hon. Gentleman have it. I am aware that the problem is extremely serious, and it is one which we must tackle by radical and imaginative gestures. I hope that it will be easier to do that now that the dispute is behind us.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: I am pleased that my hon. Friend is aware of the seriousness of the problem, but does he agree that the shortage of physics teachers is leading to a serious imbalance in higher education and that many universities, including the University of East Anglia in Norwich, are reporting a surplus of highly qualified applicants in subjects like accountancy, while there is a shortage in vital subjects such a physics?

Mr. Patten: I am aware of that. The education service consumes its own smoke, and that produces precisely the kinds of problems to which my hon. Friend referred. We must look imaginatively at in-service training and retraining of people with other qualifications.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is it not true that one of the reasons why people are not entering schools to teach these subjects is that the pay is not good enough? These people recognise that they can earn more in industry. What will the Minister do about that?

Mr. Patten: We want to see a better paid and better motivated teaching profession. I hope that serious negotiations will now start to create a career structure for teachers which better rewards teachers with responsibilities and with skills that are in short supply.

Mr. Holt: My hon. Friend rightly expressed the Government's concern over the shortage of physics and chemistry teachers, but does he share my misgivings that there is not, according to information from his Department, one teacher in the public sector teaching Japanese in what is Industry Year? What does my hon. Friend's Department intend to do about that?

Mr. Patten: Since my hon. Friend last raised that point with me, I have looked into the matter with great concern. However, I have not yet produced the teachers that he would like to see, but I shall report back to my hon. Friend on this matter.

Student Grants

5. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the National Union of Students to discuss the level of student grants.

19. Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the National Union of Students to discuss the level of student support.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend has received some 940 letters about the level of student grants for 1986-87 and last met NUS representatives to discuss student financial support on 3 December 1984. I last met NUS representatives on 12 February 1986.

Mr. Dubs: Will the Minister confirm that student grants are now 14 per cent. below the level in 1979 and that that represents a significant drop in the living standards of students? Is that not damaging for the future of university education?

Mr. Walden: I would go further and confirm that student grants have been dropping on and off ever since 1962, under both Conservative and Labour Governments. The fact that the number of students is rising to unprecedented heights under this Government hardly suggests that the level of grant is a major disincentive to higher education.

Mr. Pawsey: Is my hon. Friend aware that there are hon. Members who believe that the shortfall in grants could be made up by loans? We could adopt a system that is in existence in western Europe and the United States.

Mr. Walden: I note my hon. Friend's views on that matter, and I have made the Government's views clear on numerous occasions recently.

Mr. Donald Stewart: Is the Minister aware that the Government's policy appears to be that students will be able to attend universities only if they have rich fathers or if they have made sufficient earnings in the vacation? Is he aware that very few students have these options available?—[HON. MEMBERS: "Rubbish".] I am stating the facts. Will the country reach the position where we have to reduce the level of university education and so become a barbarian dung-heap?

Mr. Walden: That is neither the Government's policy nor the effect of their policies.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Does my hon. Friend recall that when the levels of parental contribution were altered just over a year ago there was a great outcry against them? At that time many parents felt that they would face great cash-flow problems arising from the proposed changes, but that a system of student loans would have gone a long way towards reducing the genuine hardship which many students now face because their parents will not top up their grant to the level that the Government think is appropriate.

Mr. Walden: I note my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: What proportion of the correspondence that the Minister has had on the matter supports the Government's view on student grants? Is he aware that only yesterday I received a letter from a student in Fife who says that he must give up the last year of his course if the 2 per cent. rise is imposed? Does the Minister agree that that is a disaster and speaks volumes about the Government's priorities?

Mr. Walden: I imagine that under this Government, as under previous Governments, few students will have written to welcome a cut in grant. I would be glad if the hon. Gentleman would send me the details of the case to which he referred.

Mr. Forman: Is it not the case that it is not merely the level of student grants which has caused anxiety, but the overall problem of student finance, which comes from a variety of departments and quarters? Will my hon. Friend explain why the review of student finance which at one time was anticipated was abandoned?

Mr. Walden: I am sure that my hon. Friend recalls our position, which is that once the Government decided against the student loans proposal, it was decided that there was insufficient material for the review.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Does the Minister not believe that at present some students are suffering acute hardship because of the level of student grants? Does he believe that student grants can fall any further than their present level? Why cannot we have the public inquiry into student grants which was promised last year? It now appears that even some alliance Members are in favour of loans. Would it not be useful to have that inquiry to establish that loans are impractical and determine the genuine difficulty facing students today?

Mr. Walden: We are constantly alert for evidence of genuine difficulty of the type that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. Again, I extend an invitation to him to send me details. On the question of a review, I have nothing to add to what I said a moment ago.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Why do the Government assume that students can survive on up to 30 per cent. less grant than members of the Government had when they were at university? I am thinking, for example, of the Secretary of State for Social Services. Surely there should be parity between what members of the Government received and what students today receive?

Mr. Walden: We must take a broad view of these matters and look at the expansion, which, I insist, continues to take place and which is welcome. We must look at the burden of expansion which is placed on people with lower incomes than the majority of students will ever have, and think of a partnership beween students, their parents and taxpayers when financing that welcome expansion.

Politically Controversial Issues

6. Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what response he has received to his draft circular on the treatment of politically controversial issues in schools and colleges; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The drafts were issued on 4 February, and it is too early for there to have been any significant reponse.

Mr. Banks: I congratulate my hon. Friend on this initiative. Does he agree that it is a cardinal principle in the teaching profession to maintain impartiality in teaching political matters, and that heads and teachers who express a strong political allegiance drive a wedge between the vital relationships of teacher and pupil, and teacher and parent?

Mr. Patten: I agree with my hon. Friend. I am sure the House will accept that brainwashing in the classroom can have no place in a free society.

Mr. Maclennan: What steps is the Minister taking to assist the police to do their proper job of giving advice about crime prevention in schools, which is being stopped in some Left-wing-controlled, Labour-dominated boroughs in London?

Mr. Patten: A very useful document is being produced by the Society of Education Officers and the Association of Chief Police Officers. That will be endorsed by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and myself. It is an admirable document and I hope that it will receive wide circulation.

Mr. Greenway: Is my hon. Friend aware that in my professional career I had a colleague who insisted on plastering his walls with posters of Chairman Mao, the hammer and sickle and all sorts of exhibitions of his love of Communism, and his teaching certainly had to be watched? However, he was the exception rather than the rule. The teaching profession, on the whole, contains its own integrity and most people are not given to political bias in the classroom.

Mr. Patten: I completely accept my hon. Friend's view. I think that the antics of a few discredit the hard work and conscientiousness of the overwhelming majority of teachers. I should confess to my hon. Friend that my moral tutor at Oxford was a former member of the Communist party.

General Certificate of Secondary Education

9. Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether all schools will be in a position to commence courses for the general certificate of secondary education in September, as originally planned.

10. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the present position in regard to the state of preparation of the proposed general certificate of secondary education examination; and if he is satisfied that this examination course will be prepared by September.

Mr. Chris Patten: Preparations for the GCSE, under the national training programme, are substantial and thorough. Centrally produced materials, including videos and teachers' guides, have been made available to teachers and supplemented in many cases by further materials produced by the examining groups and the local education authorities. The training seminars for subject representatives from each school are being mounted and approved syllabuses distributed to schools. The onus is now on teachers to play their part.

Mr. Gregory: I welcome the amount of preparation that my hon. Friend has put into the timetable for the GCSE. Will he join me in deploring the fact that the militants of the National Union of Teachers have tried to prevent the introduction of these courses from September? Are they not at poles with the rest of their educational colleagues?

Mr. Patten: I agree with my hon. Friend. The NUT, along with other unions, pressed us to introduce this examination. It represents a major and important reform. I am sure that it will not want to scupper it at the same time as it is picking up the money which has been negotiated under the auspices of the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service.

Mr. Hardy: Are not the Minister and his right hon. Friend flying in the face of reality and disregarding the assessments of those closest to the situation? Is it not now clear that no valid new examination system will be ready by September this year?

Mr. Patten: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's view. I know that he has a considerable concern in this matter, not least because I think that he has a child, as I have, who will be affected by it. We have made it clear that we are prepared to consider sympathetically any realistic proposals for adding to the literally unprecedented preparations which have been made for this examination. That remains the position, and we shall consider further any realistic proposals.

Mr. Rowe: Does my hon. Friend accept that in Kent we are grappling nobly with school rolls falling by some 30,000 places? The GCSE may benefit from teachers' training courses, but it also requires a range of new books and other equipment. Will the Minister give some assurance that the education authorities will be helped in their provision of those things?

Mr. Patten: We are considering the matter of resources. It is a matter which has been raised with us by many people.

Mr. Jack Thompson: Is the Minister aware of the extreme concern expressed by the Secondary Heads Association in the north of England, area 17, in a letter that it has sent to me expressing concern about the introduction of the GCSE? It supports the examination itself, but is concerned about the introduction in September and thinks that it is wholly unrealistic. The association has suggested that instead of schools starting the summer holidays in July, they should start a week earlier to allow teachers to have an in-service course.

Mr. Patten: I am hoping to meet representatives of the Secondary Heads Association shortly to talk about allowing training days at the end of the summer term. That is one of the suggestions that we are considering sympathetically.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Is my hon. Friend aware that as recently as 25 September, as far as heads in Devon were aware only the history syllabus had been authorised by his Department? None of the other syllabuses had been authorised. Unless syllabuses are known, teacher training courses cannot be planned and children cannot be advised on the courses they should take. That is why it is impossible for this examination to go ahead in two years' time without sacrificing one year's input of school children.

Mr. Patten: On a point of detail, it is the Secondary Examinations Council rather than my Department which approves syllabuses, as I am sure my hon. Friend knows. At the latest count, the SEC had approved 100 syllabuses. It is still on course to approve all the syllabuses by the end of April, so that they can be in schools by May.

Teachers already have available to them both the national criteria and the draft syllabuses. It is possible to talk to parents or children about options on the basis of those draft syllabuses and the national criteria. I do not think that that point has been disputed by those to whom I have put it.

Mr. Freud: In view of the enormous logistical difficulties, quite apart from the dispute, does the hon. Gentleman accept that it would not be seen as a sign of weakness to postpone the examination for a year? Does the hon. Gentleman agree that if he does not want to do that it would make sense to close secondary schools for two days in the very near future, to give teachers a chance to catch up a bit?

Mr. Patten: The point about training days refers to phase 3 of the training, which is next summer rather than this term. We have looked at the position carefully, but I do not think that there is any option other than pressing ahead to make a success of this examination. Running O-levels and the CSE at the same time as we were trying to introduce the examination would not be possible.

Mr. Watson: Will my hon. Friend confirm that hardly any of the examination boards in England and Wales are in favour of any postponement of this examination? Will he confirm that work on preparing the syllabuses is virtually complete and that in most examination boards the training is well under way?

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend is right on all those points, but I still concede that the timetable is tight and that the job of introducing the new examination is tough. However, I think that it is perfectly within our resources to manage that job.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that there are four basic criteria by which the new examination has to be measured? It must be workable for the teachers, credible to the parents, fair to the pupils and must win a high level of public acceptance from employers. At present, the Government are on course to fail all those tests. Is it not essential that the Government take urgent action to get a grip on this new examination and to turn it into a success rather than the failure it is turning out to be?

Mr. Patten: That is what we are intent on doing. I am not sure from the tone of the hon. Gentleman's remarks that that is his objective.

Education Expenditure

11. Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what assessment he makes of the level of public pressure for greater spending on education.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Sir Keith Joseph): I have no doubt that there is considerable public pressure for higher standards in education, and for the best possible return on the resources invested in the education service. The Government will continue to work towards those aims.

Mr. Hughes: In view of the recent comment by the Minister of State that one of the reasons for lack of increased public expenditure on education is lack of public pressure, will the right hon. Gentleman now tell us who is telling the truth? If the money has been available, why has the right hon. Gentleman spent the past 12 months telling us that there are insufficient funds to pay teachers the extra money they want? If the funds have not been available, what is the point in the comments of the Minister of State?

Sir Keith Joseph: The Government take the view, which I think is shared by the majority of people, that teachers deserve more pay for effective teaching, but that teachers should also carry out the duties they have habitually carried out in the past, minus midday supervision, but plus appraisal. The Government are making substantial extra sums available over and above the annual pay awards to achieve that dual purpose. The money is still available to provide more pay for effective teaching, provided the teaching unions agree to duties being part of the contract.

Surely it is obvious to all hon. Members that there is public pressure for many aspects of public spending. There is immense pressure for many more services and it is the duty of the Government of the day to sort them out into some order of priority. The fact that the Government have found additional money for teachers' pay, subject to the conditions that I have already described, is a recognition of that duty.

Mr. Key: Will my right hon. Friend accept that his words are welcome, particularly to those who believe that more money should be made available for education? Will he also accept that higher priority should be given to education in the overall political arena and that the majority of teachers, as represented by their unions on the teachers' side of the panel, accept that more money means acceptance of conditions relating to assessment and so on? Will my right hon. Friend comment on the implications of the ACAS talks?

Sir Keith Joseph: I agree with all of my hon. Friend's comments. As for his question about ACAS, we must all hope that yesterday's agreement will lead to fruitful negotiations.

Mr. Flannery: When will the Secretary of State admit that school standards are now higher then they have ever been? — [Interruption.] It is typical that the voices raised against that reality are those of Conservative Members. When will the Secretary of State realise that he is not paying teachers what they are worth, that they recognise him as the real enemy and that they make that clear in all of their organisations? When will he also realise that teachers do a vast amount of work for which there is no overtime, that they are going back to work embittered and angry, and that it will all happen again within a very short period of time?

Sir Keith Joseph: The Government have set aside substantially more money for the pay of effective teachers, on the conditions that I have described. That is the reality. No amount of vituperation from the hon. Gentleman will change it. As for school standards, there are many good schools, but there is surely, by common agreement, scope for improvement.

Mr. Mark Carlisle: As regards yesterday's settlement of the teacher's pay dispute, does my right hon. Friend agree that the leadership of the National Union of Teachers has shown yet again that it is prepared to do damage to children's education and harm to teachers as a body? Has not the time come to remind individual teachers who are concerned about their individual professional standards and who are anxious to obtain higher salaries that they can join other unions instead?

Sir Keith Joseph: I agree with my right hon. and learned Friend that the behaviour of the National Union of Teachers seems to be appalling. It is willing for its members to take the money that has been negotiated by the other unions and the employers, but to continue the disruption. It is urging its members to stand in the way of the reform talks that we so patently need. I regard the NUT's position as utterly indefensible.

Mr. Benn: Has the Secretary of State turned his mind to the fact that in Japan only 1 per cent. of the national income is spent on defence and that one of the reasons why Japanese research and development and the manufacture and sale of high technology are more successful than ours is that we spend 6 per cent. of our national income on defence and thus divert money away from many things, including proper investment in education?

Sir Keith Joseph: But does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the Japanese Government and people do that only because they have accepted total protection from the United States? Would the right hon. Gentleman support a move by this country towards that kind of policy?

Mr. Latham: Regarding capital spending, which is very important to parents, would it not help my right hon. Friend to deal with this pressure if a rather higher proportion of capital receipts were made available to local education authorities to spend in their own areas?

Sir Keith Joseph: Yes, indeed, and if it were possible that would make the Government that little bit more popular. But the trouble is that when that policy was adopted two or three years ago the local education authorities together spent £1,000 million more than they had warned they would spend, which came near to wrecking the national economy.

Mr. Radice: Does the Secretary of State understand that parents are rightly asking for more books, more equipment and more effective teaching, so as to raise standards in schools? Why does the Prime Minisster seem concerned only with educational red herrings, such as vouchers and privatisation, which will do nothing to help the vast majority of pupils? When will the Government acknowledge that all our children should have the right to good quality education?

Sir Keith Joseph: The trouble is that the hon. Gentleman seems only to have read half of the annual report by HMI, which said that there was too little spending on books in many local education authorities, but went on to say that, with better management by many local authorities, money now wasted could be redeployed in favour of books, equipment and maintenance.

Inner Cities Education Project

12. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what sum from the inner cities programme will benefit inner cities education projects.

Mr. Chris Patten: The main focus of the new inner cities initiative is to be on improving employment opportunities, supporting local industry and improving the physical environment. However, the urban programme is already supporting education expenditure of about £33 million in urban areas in 1985-86 and over £81 million of education expenditure, mostly in urban areas, is being supported by section 11 grants.

Mr. Hughes: I am grateful to the Minister for his answer. In the light of the opinion poll released this week, commissioned by ILEA, which shows that more people —40 per cent.—think that the quality of state education in inner London is poor, very poor or terrible than think it is good, very good or excellent, will he direct the educational funds aimed at inner cities to dealing with the quality of education in inner London, which is at the core of the problem, rather than allowing it to be directed to peripheral activities, which will not give youngsters the employment opportunities at which the inner cities programme is aimed?

Mr. Patten: The hon. Gentleman has made an important point about quality. If there was a direct relationship between quality and the amount of resources spent, standards in ILEA would be second to none, but, alas, that is not the case.

Mr. Spencer: When my hon. Friend visits Highfields in Leicester, following the initiative announced by his right hon. Friend, will he consider the need for single sex education and how that might be met?

Mr. Patten: Before I go to Highfields I shall, of course, talk to my hon. and learned Friend. I am sure that he will mark my card.

Mr. Freeson: The Minister must accept that the figures he has quoted are no more than a tiny fraction of the massive thousands of millions of pounds that are spent each year on education nationally. Does he agree that what is much more important, and is receiving little or no attention, is the shift of the main line budget for education into the inner city areas? Does he accept that there is a direct relationship between the amount of money available for refurbishing rundown buildings and the environment in which children have to grow up?

Mr. Patten: I have tried to deal with the question of the relationship between input and output in education. I did not mention all the funds that are going to the inner cities. I did not mention, for example, the money that is being paid under the education support grants. I do not think that the situation is as easy as the hon. Gentleman said. If it were just a question of resources equalling quality, we should not have to deal with some of the horrors that are on the scene.

Sixth Forms

13. Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what advice he has given to local education authorities over the relative merits of school sixth forms as opposed to other forms of post-16 provision.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): My right hon. Friend's advice is set out in circular 4/82. That circular made clear his belief that no single pattern of secondary organisation has overriding advantages of principle; it went on to urge local education authorities to choose the system most suited to local circumstances and preferences.

Dr. Twinn: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. If, as he says, there is no single pattern of secondary organisation with an overriding advantage, does he agree that sixth forms of proven quality should be kept and that within any local authority area there should be a choice between staying on at school post-16 and going on to college?

Mr. Dunn: We are committed to retaining good sixth forms in schools of proven worth. The answer to the second part of my hon. Friend's supplementary question is yes.

Technical and Vocational Education Initiative

14. Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the progress of the technical and vocational education initiative.

Mr. Chris Patten: Seventy-three education authorities throughout Great Britain are now involved in the TVEI. All authorities have been given the opportunity to take part in this important initiative; most are already running projects, and proposals from a further 25 which wish to join in the final phase starting this September are under consideration. The Government are encouraged by the enthusiasm and commitment that the TVEI has generated among those involved. The pilot projects, which are exploring how the education of 14 to 18-year-olds can be made more relevant to adult and working life, are already providing important lessons. We are considering how these should be applied more widely.

Mr. Madel: As the effectiveness and popularity of the TVEI increases among parents and children, can my hon. Friend assure the House that the Government remain committed to the necessary increase in funding for the TVEI to meet increased demand?

Mr. Patten: The Government are committed to considering how the lessons that have been learnt from this extremely successful initiative, in which we are investing about £250 million of the taxpayers' money, can be more widely applied. That will, of course, have some financial implications.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Flannery asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 4 March.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Flannery: Is it not a matter of the deepest public concern that many old people have died and are dying of hypothermia in this bitter cold winter? How could the Prime Minister and the Government stand idly by and watch these poor people in cold, unheated rooms waiting for approaching death? What will happen now? Will the rich and wealthy members of the Government blame everyone but themselves, when everyone knows exactly who is to blame for the deaths of many poor old people?

The Prime Minister: May I make three points in reply to the hon. Gentleman. First, spending on help with heating has increased dramatically from 1978 until now. In 1978, £90 million was spent on providing help with heating, and we are now spending £400 million. There has been an increase in expenditure of £140 million in real terms. Secondly, the number of those eligible for heating additions has increased greatly. The House will be aware that 90 per cent. of supplementary pensioners are now receiving heating additions, compared with 70 per cent. in 1978-79. Thirdly, in addition to the £400 million that is already being spent, extra help in the form of severe weather payments is available in almost all of the 500 DHSS area officers throughout the country.

Mr. Ward: Will my right hon. Friend ensure that any member of the Civil Service who frustrates the efforts of the fraud squad to prevent the pilfering of public money by claimants is dismissed instantly?

The Prime Minister: I hope that no one will frustrate the efforts of the fraud squad, which is entirely independent. Its efforts must be allowed to bear fruit.

Mr. Kinnock: Will the Prime Minister join me and hon. Members on both sides of the House in applauding the initiative of Age Concern in providing 1,000 survival kits to old people, who it considers are most at risk from the cold weather? Does the right hon. Lady share Age Concern's view that, while it is doing what it can, the Government must act by issuing urgent heating allowances? Will she give the country an assurance that she will change the system of helping with heating costs so that we shall never again experience a winter in which poor people freeze to death for want of help with their heating bills?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman heard that help with heating bills has greatly exceeded anything that was made available in real terms during the lifetime of the previous Labour Government. He has heard also that of the 500 DHSS offices, almost all are making available the payment of extra severe weather payments. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services has arranged for massive advertising in the national press on the availability of extra help with fuel bills. This is being supplemented by considerable local effort.

Mr. Kinnock: Does the Prime Minister agree that the £140 million is somewhat misleading, in that it should be compared with the £1·5 billion which has been denied to old-age pensioners in Britain as a consequence of changing the formula for calculating old-age pensions? Does she further agree that pensioners and poor people are interested, not in swapping figures, but in how they pay their heating bills? May I ask her again whether, in view of the tragic experience of this year and last, she can assure us that she will change the system to provide a more generous, simpler and better advertised system of providing help with heating bills so that we never experience another winter of disconnection?

The Prime Minister: The amount available exceeds anything that was available before. The right hon. Gentleman is aware of that. I repeat that £400 million is available for help with heating. In addition, almost all of the 500 supplementary benefit offices are open for help with severe weather payments They are paid restrospectively, and there will be a massive advertising campaign to help with that. The right hon. Gentleman does not like the extent of the help that is available.

Mr. Kinnock: I acknowledge the extent. It is the effectiveness about which the right hon. Lady must answer. Why, if there is such help, has our death rate during the winter been three times that of the United States of America and four times that of Sweden? Will she now make changes that ensure that we stop the incidence of hypothermia? Will she recognise that the number of deaths last year was higher than the year before, and that the number of deaths this year will be higher again? Will she stop this awful mounting crisis by changing her policies?

The Prime Minister: Will the right hon. Gentleman recognise that £400 million is available now, as compared with £90 million during the winter of discontent, when not one Labour Member raised the matter in the House? Moreover, nearly 500 DHSS offices are open now for severe weather payments. What the right hon. Gentleman has been asking for is happening. He does not like the fact that it is being done.

Q2. Mrs. Currie asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 4 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Currie: Has my right hon. Friend had time today to read Today and to reflect on the fact that modern technology also creates jobs? It does not just destroy them. Has she had time to reflect on the fact that none of that would have been possible without the Government's magnificent trade union legislation and their fostering of an atmosphere of free enterprise?

The Prime Minister: I agree that technology creates jobs. It enables industries to stay competitive. The record of our manufacturing and extractive industries in increasing productivity is excellent. All involved in them deserve congratulation.

Mr. Hume: Now that we are getting a substantial radioactive leak a week from Sellafield, does the Prime Minister agree that public concern has become public alarm and that there is no alternative to closing the plant down?

The Prime Minister: No, Sir. The nuclear power industry has the best safety record of any energy industry. It would be as well if that were fully recognised by some of those who criticise Sellafield. The Health and Safety Executive is carrying out an audit. I welcome the audit and believe that the facts should reassure people.

Q3. Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 4 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Forsyth: Is my right hon. Friend aware that Central regional council, which last year gave £216,000 to the striking miners, is proposing school closures in rural areas this year to save less than £50,000? Will my right hon. Friend consider changing the system of funding education to reflect, per capita, the number of pupils attending schools, so that parental preference rather than political expediency rules the roost?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend knows from the Bill now before the House, the Government are concerned to get greater parental influence in the choice of schools. All parents pay for education out of their pockets as taxpayers and ratepayers and are entitled to greater choice than they have, and all options are being considered.

Mr. Eastham: May I draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that there is a mass lobby of engineers from British Leyland bitterly protesting against the possible sale of their industry to foreign interests? May I remind the Prime Minister that, when the sale of Westland Helicopters was going through, it was claimed by the Government that the work force had been consulted? Will the Prime Minister give an assurance that the work force of British Leyland will be consulted before there is a sale?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman will recall that the Government were not interfering with financial help in a rescue package with Westland. That was the basis of the decision. He will also recall that there has been, and continues to be, enormous help given to British Leyland. He is well aware of what the position is at the moment. The intention to make bids, or the indication that bids are to be made, should be in today, and we are not in a position to make any statement until all those bids are in and have been considered.

Mr. Beith: What contribution towards reconciliation in the coal industry can be made by a colliery review procedure which the National Coal Board ignores whenever it finds against it? What is sacrosanct now?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is well aware that the colliery review procedure is advisory and that the final word is in the hands of the National Coal Board. That was always so.

Mr. Dickens: Will my right hon. Friend concede that the last Labour Government did very little for old-age pensioners? Will she also concede that it was the Labour party which snatched away the Christmas bonus which the Tory party introduced? Will she also concede that it was Tories who reintroduced the Christmas bonus for pensioners? How does my right hon. Friend think that Members of the Labour party can accuse us, in the way they have done earlier today, when they have been such a disgrace in the past?

The Prime Minister: I could not improve on the excellent way in which my hon. Friend puts the case. I hope that hon. Members will also remember that only last year the Opposition were supporting a strike that was designed to rob pensioners of heating and light.

Q4. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 4 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Most people in need of extra heating have no real choice of the kind of dwelling they inhabit, and heating costs vary widely. Why do the Government base their heating costs on the individual, rather than on the cost of heating?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the rule has been changed since last year. Last year's rule was not found to be satisfactory and it is therefore now a matter of discretion, and that should enable us to give just the kind of latitude the hon. Gentleman wishes to have.

Sir Edward du Cann: Will my right hon. Friend look again at the figures for the appalling decline in Britain's merchant fleet? Is she aware that hon. Members in all parts of the House are now desperately concerned about this matter and its implications, both for our defence policy and economically? We could not mount another Falklands operation if we wished, because we do not have the ships. More than 80 per cent. of British trade is now carried in ships with foreign flags. Is she aware that there are things that could be done to change the situation? Will she instruct her senior colleagues to see that they are done, and done without delay?

The Prime Minister: I know my right hon. Friend's interest in this subject, but I must disagree with him when he says that we could not mount another Falklands operation. We could. I would like to make that clear. The Government fully recognise the role that the merchant fleet plays in times of emergency and war, and the requirements are subject to continuous review. The merchant fleet remains capable of meeting all the needs of the armed forces. We have long-standing NATO arrangements to pool Alliance merchant shipping should there be war. The important thing for the future of our merchant marine is to ensure that British shipping can compete with the fleets of other nations on costs. That is one of the problems.

Mr. Terry Davis: In view of the widespread impression that the Cabinet is biased in favour of a takeover of parts of the British motor industry by General Motors and the rumours that are now spreading in Birmingham, will the Prime Minister tell us whether any member of the Cabinet has a relative working for General Motors or one of its subsidiaries?

The Prime Minister: I resent the implication of the hon. Gentleman's question. He is aware that bids are in today and that they will be considered, and they will be considered with one thing in mind — what will give British industry the best chance of jobs.

Northern Ireland

3.33 pm

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Tom King): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement about the events in Northern Ireland yesterday.

As the House will be aware, the leaders of the two main Unionist parties had called for a day of action and protest. They invited everybody to stay away from work and stated that it was to be a passive and voluntary demonstration and that there should be no road blocks or intimidation of those going to work.

In the event, there was widespread obstruction, intimidation and some violence during the day culminating in serious disorder in east and north Belfast last night. The first incidents occurred before midnight on Sunday and disturbances continued until the early hours of this morning.

In spite of these difficulties, a very considerable number of people succeeded in getting to work, particularly in the commercial offices and public services, but many factories were seriously affected.

I pay tribute to the determination of all those who refused to be intimidated and exercised their right to go to work. I also pay tribute to the men of the security forces and particularly the Royal Ulster Constabulary for all the work that they did to seek to keep roads open for people to be able to get to work. However, there have also been a number of complaints when it is alleged that the police did not take action when it was required. The Chief Constable is preparing a full report on all the policing aspects of the past 24 hours.

To give the House some indication of the scale of the workload that the RUC faced, on the latest information available to me there were some 655 road blocks in the Province during the period, of which 441 were cleared. There were in addition some 80 cavalcades and demonstrations, which caused considerable disruption in a number of towns mainly around midday and in the afternoon. There were 57 arrests and the names of 184 people noted to proceed by way of summons. Sixty-five plastic baton rounds were fired and 47 policemen were injured. Last night there were a number of petrol bombs thrown, and there were over 20 shots fired in three firearms attacks on the police during the disturbances in the Loyalist areas.

The figures listed above give the details of a tragic day for Northern Ireland. Many Members will have seen some of the disgraceful incidents on television last night. These pictures have been shown all over the world and will do great damage to the reputation of the Province. The House will also have seen elected Members of this House making common cause with people in paramilitary dress.

The Government are well aware of the strength of feeling among many Unionists about aspects of the Anglo-Irish agreement. The House will be aware that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I met the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) and the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) last Tuesday. During a long meeting, my right hon. Friend put forward a number of proposals to help meet their main concerns and agreed to consider positively their suggestions that the Government should call a round table conference to discuss devolution in Northern Ireland. It was agreed that we would all reflect on the various suggestions that had been made and would meet again shortly. The prospects of constructive discussions instead of confrontation were greeted with widespread relief in the Province, only for that to be destroyed by their abrupt repudiation of this course following a meeting in Belfast late that night. They then decided to proceed with the day of protest.

The whole country can now see how tragic and totally counter-productive yesterday's action has been. It is now urgent that the Unionist leaders recognise again that the only way in which the concerns of those they seek to represent can be addressed is by constructive discussion and not by threats and violence. The degree of intimidation evident yesterday showed how little confidence many of the organisers had in being able peacefully to persuade their fellow citizens to join their day of protest. I make it quite clear that this Government, this Parliament, will not be intimidated either by the sort of violent actions that took place yesterday. I believe that an increasing number of Unionists, while disliking many aspects of the Anglo-Irish agreement, wish to look for a constructive way forward. The Government have made quite clear our willingness to sit down and discuss seriously the Unionists' concerns. In our parliamentary democracy, in this United Kingdom, that can be the only way.

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): Does the Secretary of State accept that we on this side of the House share his abhorrence of the violence and intimidation which took place yesterday and which further alienated the sympathies of many people in Great Britain from the cause which it was apparently designed to promote?

Does the Secretary of State agree that if the protest was intended to demonstrate the strength of feeling in Northern Ireland against the Anglo-Irish agreement it failed as an indicator since we do not know how many people participated voluntarily and how many simply responded to intimidation? Bearing in mind the number of road blocks and the obvious evidence of preparations in advance, can the Secretary of State say whether investigations are taking place to ascertain whether the violence was planned and, if so, by whom? If it transpires that it was planned, will proceedings be initiated against those responsible?

While we join in the right hon. Gentleman's tribute to those police officers who strove hard, in difficult circumstances, to preserve order and to prevent intimidation, and while we offer our tribute to those who declined to be intimidated, he has referred to allegations of some incidents in which people were prevented from going about their business in the presence of police officers who failed to intervene. When the Chief Constable's report on these allegations is complete, will the Secretary of State report again to the House?

Will inquiries take place into reports that some off-duty members of the Ulster Defence Regiment were at the barricades? The Secretary of State has referred to suggestions from responsible leaders among all sections of opinion in Northern Ireland that they are prepared to meet those with whom they disagree to discuss how to make progress. Will he again invite them to meet together under his chairmanship and seek consensus, which will isolate the men of violence on both sides of the divide and offer a less dismaying future for the people of Northern Ireland?

Mr. King: I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Member for the way is which he has responded to the statement and to his right hon. and hon. Friends for their support in this matter. He may have seen in the comments of the Chief Constable before the strike the clearest signs that this was to be a peaceful, dignified and voluntary protest. It manifestly was not so—and that was made manifest in ways that showed considerable planning in advance. I know that the Chief Constable will want to investigate all the policing aspects of what occurred yesterday. He has already put on the record that any evidence of incidents of indifferent policing should be brought to his attention and will be investigated.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman asked specifically about an invitation to the parties in Northern Ireland to talk sensibly about these problems. I hope that we can get discussions going. As the House knows, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister put some specific proposals to the leaders of the Unionist parties. This could have provided the way forward, but was repudiated, although in Northern Ireland only — we have not received any official communication to that effect. I shall do all that I can to seek ways in which discussions can start. That is the only way. Violence will not succeed, and will be only counter-productive.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Is it not a tragic absurdity that, as a result of the Anglo-Irish agreement, a Unionist Government's only political friends in the Province should be Republicans? How do the Government propose to govern the Province—by force —or will they seek a constructive way out, and get in touch with the Taoiseach and adjust this damnable agreement?

Mr. King: My hon. Friend knows very well that what he said about the support for the agreement in the Province is not true, and that many people with no nationalist sympathies see benefits in this agreement and have supported it. Clearly the problem—and I hope that my hon. Friend will assist in this — is to get a true understanding of what the agreement is. The literature that was being passed out yesterday, in which the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor) played his part, talking about the establishment of partial Dublin rule and allowing the agreement to bring about the all-Ireland that it seeks, makes one realise how great are the distortions still being perpetrated on the Unionist majority in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that we share his sentiments about yesterday's appalling events in the Province? We are reassured by the last paragraph of his statement. That is the right way to proceed and we support him all the way. We acknowledge the genuine feelings of Unionists who have suffered grievously at the hands of the IRA, the Provisional IRA and INLA, but is it not time that the Unionist leaders in the Province and Unionists themselves recognise that there is not an inexhaustable supply of finance from the rest of the United Kingdom, and that people from the rest of the United Kingdom also have the right to say "Enough is enough"? What about the workers at Harland and Wolff and Short Bros, which have been financed by large sums of money from here? Why did they stay away from work yesterday?

Mr. King: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support on behalf of his right hon. and hon. colleagues. Both my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I have made clear our strong hope and desire that Northern Ireland should remain part of the United Kingdom. Perhaps one of the most offensive things about some of the aspects of the protests is the implication that we are seeking to undermine the position of Northern Ireland. The purpose of the agreement is to reassure the Unionists about the validity of the position of the majority, and to get the agreement of the Republic confirmed in an international agreement to say that there can be no change in that majority position without the consent of the majority. The House will see that, even in the face of that, there are those who will refuse to accept it, no matter that it is article 1 of the agreement and should be a great reassurance to Unionists in Northern Ireland.

Sir Peter Mills (Torridge and Devon West): Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that the protest was not so much a demonstration but, in certain parts, a rebellion? Speaking from experience, I can say that nothing like that has happened before. Will my right hon. Friend also bear in mind that the £2,000 million poured into the Province at least demands some responsibility from the other side?

Mr. King: It has always been accepted in the United Kingdom that the areas in greatest need receive a greater subvention than other areas. In that respect, Northern Ireland is no different from other parts of the country in relation to the assessment of need.

However, in response to the first point raised by my hon. Friend, may I say that it is particularly tragic that at a time of considerable terrorist activity such an additional strain should have been placed on the security forces as was placed on them yesterday. That involved a massive redeployment of the RUC to maintain law and order and the rights of the citizen against the so-called Loyalist mobs in certain areas. People were definitely put at risk from terrorist attack in other parts of the Province.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): In view of the concluding words of the Secretary of State's statement, will the Government take steps to proceed towards giving all the people of Northern Ireland a full share in what the right hon. Gentleman calls this parliamentary democracy?

Mr. King: I understand the right hon. Gentleman's views on this matter. I am not sure that his views are shared by the right hon. Member for Strangford.

The Government are anxious to achieve a system for administration in Northern Ireland on a basis that is widely acceptable to both communities. We have made that aim absolutely clear and the agreement is designed to encourage that.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): Does my right hon. Friend recognise that it is wrong for him to come to the House and make splendid statements about not yielding to intimidation—which I agree with—when at the end of the day carrying out that policy depends on the courage and resolution of our security forces and, in particular, on the men and women of the RUC? Will he therefore show just a little more understanding of the human position of those police officers who are shot in the back by the violent minority and who now no longer have the consent of the majority and yet are gagged by their chief constable and do not receive, from his office, the support to which they are entitled in the grave circumstances which our country now faces?

Mr. King: I deeply resent the last sentence of my hon. Friend's remarks. I have made it absolutely clear that the RUC is aware that it as my full commitment and support. I have the greatest admiration for the RUC as a professional police force. I am well aware of my hon. Friend's concern about consultation and the rights of the Police Federation in Northern Ireland. My hon. Friend knows that that is under discussion at present.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): Does the Secretary of State agree that yesterday's day of protest, which in some cases was near insurrection, and the plans projected for the weeks and months ahead to culminate in July can only seriously weaken the link between Northern Ireland and this country? In the light of that, it is no good the Government ignoring the situation. A number of us in the House faced such a situation in 1974. The situation exists today. The Government must talk with the Government in Dublin about what will happen if the link is stretched to breaking point.

Mr. King: It was precisely because of our recognition of the concern about the situation and about aspects of the Anglo-Irish agreement that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I met Unionist leaders last Tuesday. The Unionist leaders went to that meeting, as they said, expecting the door to be slammed in their faces. As the whole House will know, when they left the meeting they held a press conference and the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley said that the deadlock had been broken. It is clear that a door has been opened. The tragedy is that when they returned to Belfast somebody else decided to slam a door in their face. We thought that we had succeeded in opening the way to sensible discussions. The best way to proceed is for the Prime Minister to talk to the leaders of the Unionist parties, who proclaim their loyalty to the United Kingdom. That is how I would like to proceed. After the futile, destructive events of yesterday, I hope that wise counsels will prevail and that people will return to honour that agreement.

Mr. W. Benyon (Milton Keynes): Does my right hon. Friend recall the great tragedy which occurred when the Labour Government gave in to the Ulster workers' strike? Is it not now time for strong nerves? Does he accept that most Tory Members are right behind him in upholding the laws of the United Kingdom?

Mr. King: It is a time for strong nerves, but I hope also for wise counsels. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support. I hope that we can get the hon. Members involved to play their part in the House. Indeed, today one sees an increase in their attendance. I hope that we can debate these issues sensibly, and discuss the genuine anxieties of the people whom they seek to represent in this proper forum of the House of Commons.

Mr. John Hume (Foyle): Does the Secretary of State agree that, although the Anglo-Irish agreement has now been in place since 15 November, more than three months ago, it has not done any harm to any citizen in Northern Ireland? Does he agree that the only damage done has been self-inflicted, such as the serious damage to wide sections of the community yesterday? Does he agree that the agreement is about recognising the validity of both traditions in Northern Ireland, and that Unionists cannot stomach equality of treatment for the people of Northern Ireland? Does he further agree that equality is the true basis of dialogue which is essential, if the community is to move forward? Will he name the date for the talks that he wishes to hold, and my party will attend?

Mr. King: On the question of damage or harm being suffered, there are already signs of the benefits that come from the agreement. Any intelligent Unionist must take comfort from the switch in votes from the party supporting violence to the hon. Gentleman's constitutional nationalist party which occurred in each of the by-elections in which there was a contest between those two parties. Any Unionist who is willing to look fairly at the agreement will begin to notice the encouraging signs of better co-operation on cross-border security. That is overwhelmingly to the benefit of every person in Northern Ireland. I hope that the people will see through the lies that they are being told, such as that this is joint authority and this is Dublin rule. Those slogans, on which the by-election campaigns were fought, are wholly untrue, and people will increasingly realise that. I hope that then we shall get men of good will, who do not act merely from bigotry and prejudice, but are prepared to look fairly at the position of the minority as well as the majority. Then we can start sensible discussions to the benefit of all concerned.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): If we go on like this, with the majority in Northern Ireland feeling threatened and some of them taking desperate measures, and with my right hon. Friend condemning them in the strongest terms, as he has today, will not even the minority feel threatened? Will not the position become far worse than it already is? Does that not point to the fact that the Anglo-Irish agreement was a blunder of the first magnitude?

Mr. King: In my statement I paid tribute to the number of people who, often at considerable inconvenience and with considerable courage, ensured that people were not intimidated yesterday. The vast majority of people in many areas got to work, despite all the difficulties. My hon. Friend also chooses to overlook the fact that only a week ago today my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I met the leaders of the two Unionist parties and achieved an outcome which could have led to sensible, constructive talks. That is the way we must go, and the sooner the better.

Mr. A. E. P. Duffy (Sheffield, Attercliffe): Has the Secretary of State read the report on the front page of The Irish Times today entitled "Bottles, bricks and bigotry in Portadown" by Willy Clingan, a Northern Irish Protestant? He said that he saw none of the acivity, on the part of either the RUC or the security forces, which the Secretary of State claimed. I dare say that that was just a black spot, although I would be surprised if it was the only one. Will the Secretary of State assure the House that, should there be a recurrence of yesterday's events in Northern Ireland, there will not be a repetiton in Portadown, otherwise how will he and most hon. Members, who welcome the tone of the statement today, do their bit to help the RUC and the security forces to be accepted across the communities in the spirit of the agreement?

Mr. King: In the atmosphere of claim and counterclaim about what the RUC did and did not do yesterday, I thought that the most helpful thing for the House would be for me to give the best statistics available at this time. The House will realise from the figures I gave of the number of road blocks and the number which were removed that there were some gaps. I think that anybody would honestly say that it was quite a remarkable achevement to remove 441 road blocks over about 12 hours. I certainly am concerned, and I know that the Chief Constable is concerned, to learn any lessons that we can from the scale of the problems that were faced.

There is no doubt that the assertion, accepted in good faith and given by what the Chief Constable believed to be responsible leaders, about what was meant to be an orderly and dignified protest led, in some cases, to the police being too thinly spread in certain areas. That raised problems for them. I can certainly assure the hon. Gentleman that we wish to learn every lesson that we can.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, however deep and justified is the hostility of the people of Northern Ireland—the Unionist majority—to the Anglo-Irish agreement, the scenes of violence we saw yesterday are not only deeply repugnant to everybody on this side of the House but also injure the Unionist cause? If my right hon. Friend should receive a request from the Government of the Irish Republic that the intergovernmental conference should not meet for, say, three months, would he consider it carefully?

Mr. King: I listened this morning to the entirely constructive remarks that my hon. Friend made in his broadcast when I was in Stormont. I respect the view that he has taken about the lack of wisdom of yesterday's action. I think that they were wise words and I wish that they had been heeded by more unionists.

On my hon. Friend's request and our attitude to it, may I say that we have entered into an agreement in good faith which we believe will bring benefit to all the people of Northern Ireland. If he is saying, for example, that we should suspend the discussion on improving cross-border security and the many steps that are being taken to make a more effective counter attack against terrorism, I think that that is a difficult proposition to make, but I note his comments.

Mr. John David Taylor (Strangford): Has the Secretary of State read the excellent analysis in The Irish Times today of the serious position developing in Northern Ireland by the former Cabinet colleague of the Taoiseach, Dr. Conor Cruise O'Brien? Does he agree with Dr. O'Brien's analysis that the Government rule in Northern Ireland without consent? Does he also agree that the Anglo-Irish agreement can be maintained only "by massive and sustained use of force"?

Since the Secretary of State has rightly said that the RUC was extended yesterday, and since it is improper to use 8,000 RUC men to impose the Anglo-Irish agreement on 1 million free citizens in Northern Ireland, what additional forces does the Secretary of State intend to use?

Mr. King: May I say before answering the right hon. Gentleman how pleased I am to see him here. I hope that he will persuade some of his colleagues that, rather than on the streets of Belfast and around barricades in the Province, the House of Commons is the right place to discuss these maters.

I failed fully to answer the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Duffy). I have not read The Irish Times today, but I shall look at it later. It sounds like a similar version of the malign scenario that I think Dr. Conor Cruise O'Brien has painted for a considerable time about this matter. I do not accept that view. I believe that there is a more optimistic and hopeful approach to the affairs of Northern Ireland. I regard Dr. O'Brien's approach as the gospel of despair.

There will not be a strain on the RUC if responsible politicians tell the truth about the agreement and if they do not incite their supporters to acts of violence. Some hon. Members, not necessarily in the Official Unionist party but in other parties in Northern Ireland, have not been noticeable for their reticence recently. In that situation there will certainly be an extra strain on the police. I very much hope that we shall see people respect the rule of law and be prepared to talk sensibly about the right way forward.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the prospects for the Anglo-Irish agreement depend in part on the tenor of his responses to yesterday's events? However misguided, disruptive and violent the expressions of the people of Northern Ireland yesterday, the underlying implication was that those people wished to remain part of the United Kingdom. Will my right hon. Friend recognise this sensitivity in statements? Does he agree that what is really needed is sensitive, quiet persistence in carrying through the agreement?

Mr. King: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. As I have made clear again today, and as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has made clear on a number of occasions, we understand the sensitivity of the Unionists about their position in the United Kingdom. We have sought to give not only the clearest assurances about it but our own personal commitment to it. We feel that that should be better recognised than perhaps it is by some.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Is it not clear that what the Unionist leaders mean by democracy is having their own way—when they have a communalist vote which gives them the right to do as they please? Is there not another serious political lesson to be learnt? When the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) and the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) went to No. 10 Downing street, they were the nominal leaders of the Unionists but, by the time they returned to Northern Ireland, they found that they had been replaced and that other people, including the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson), were the real leaders of the Unionist party. Is it not a fact that the speeches made in the past few years by the nominal leaders of the Unionist party have aroused something that was always latent and threatening? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it was not a day of protest, as many have said, but, at the very least, a semi-revolt of the most serious proportions? It is no good us pretending that it was not something like that.

Mr. King: It is true that some of the activities of the leaders and other leading members of the parties in the months since the signing of the agreement have raised, quite unjustifiably, the antagonism of people towards the agreement and increased the expectation of what could be achieved by their opposition. I think that some slightly wiser counsels have already broken through. People have recognised, as they have said, that it is not realistic to expect my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to agree to scrap the agreement. The agreement provides within its text for regular and frequent meetings—moreover, for meetings at the request of either party. The request for a suspension is therefore a breach of the agreement as well. Now people understand that the agreement is there. Sensible and constructive discussion must be the way forward.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I recognise the importance of this statement, but I must take into account also the other business before us today. I shall allow questions to continue for a further 10 minutes.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that I spent all yesterday with true Loyalists in my constituency? Is he aware that, during that time, many of them expressed their profound dismay and disgust at the way in which other so-called Loyalists were behaving?

Mr. King: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. It is undoubtedly true that those sorts of things do great damage to the reputation of Unionism. I am certainly most anxious to see the way forward by discussion and not by violence and intimidation, which will only damage the Loyalists' own cause.

Mr. Roy Mason (Barnsley, Central): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the vast majority of hon. Members wish him and his ministerial colleagues to remain firm and resolute against the re-emergence of paramilitary Protestant terrorism which we witnessed yesterday afternoon? Is the right hon. Gentleman also aware that, whether Members of Parliament are in favour of the accord or not, they would not wish him to be diverted from his course or to bow the knee to terrorism in Northern Ireland?

Mr. King: I very much appreciate those remarks, especially coming from the right hon. Gentleman. With his reputation in Northern Ireland for firmness of purpose in these respects, I think that they will be widely noted.

Mrs. Anna McCurley (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Unionist leaders would elicit far more sympathy from the rest of the United Kingdom if they participated more in aspects of the United Kingdom Parliament other than in just Northern Ireland affairs? What would happen if the Scots did this? We would feel isolated and different. I think that is why the Unionist leaders feel isolated and different.

Mr. King: This is one of the matters which we hoped we would be able to discuss and which we put forward in the proposals by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. It is true that one of the criticisms being made of the Unionists against the Government is that they are excluded from consultation and involvement in community affairs. The truth is that the Unionists are excluding themselves. They are absenting themselves from councils. They are not carrying out their proper duties in the Assembly of scrutinising the work of Northern Ireland departments. They complain about being excluded and, to cap it all, they absent themselves from this sovereign House of Commons of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the British and Irish Governments, as the Governments of two sovereign states, have a joint interest in protecting the civil rights of the people of Northern Ireland and in enabling the two cultures to co-exist in Northern Ireland? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that, if only for that reason, it is vital that no minority group exercises a veto over the democratically agreed policies of those two elected Governments?

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman talks about joint interest. I should like to make it clear in case there is any misunderstanding that we have a clear responsibility, but we recognise the interest of the Irish Republic in matters affecting the nationalist community in the North. It must be clearly understood that there has never been in this agreement any question of joint authority. That is one of the lies told in some of the propaganda.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): Does my right hon. Friend recognise that all Unionists either should or do condemn the violence and intimidation yesterday? Was that violence and intimidation not entirely predictable and, indeed, predicted? Is that violence likely to recur when the marching season starts? Will my right hon. Friend state in clear terms the offer to the Unionist leaders in terms of talks? Are those talks to be open-ended, without strings and with no options closed? If not, my right hon. Friend is wasting his time.

Mr. King: On the first point, if my hon. Friend is right and such violence was predictable, a heavy responsibility rests on the shoulders of those who called the day of protest. On talks, it was made clear by the two Unionist leaders that, if they entered into any discussion, it would not imply in any way acceptance of or agreement with the Anglo-Irish agreement and that they would wish to conduct the talks outside the ambit of any Anglo-Irish agreement. We understood that position. We made it absolutely clear that the talks on the matters discussed or on any other matters that they wished to raise could go ahead.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): Does the Secretary of State still believe that the so-called Anglo-Irish agreement will help to bring about peace in Northern Ireland?

Mr. King: Yes, I do.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): Will my right hon. Friend elucidate on his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter)? How are these talks to take place in the context in which there could be a constructive dialogue outside the Anglo-Irish agreement if that agreement is to stay in place?

Mr. King: I hope that my hon. Friend has seen a copy of the statement that was issued after the meeting that the Prime Minister and I had with the Unionist leaders. If he studies the statement he will see that various proposals were made. There is obviously a wide gulf and there is obviously total disagreement. Instead of harping continually on that, the intelligent way forward is to see whether there are areas upon which there can be agreement — not to concentrate upon the areas where there is disagreement.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Is the Secretary of State aware that the Unionists of Northern Ireland have always threatened violence in this way? That is how Ireland came to be partitioned. That is why there was such injustice and discrimination under Stormont. That is why Sunningdale failed. That is why Northern Ireland is the mess that it is. Always until now they have succeeded in that threat. Only if the British Government stand up to them and start to move forward can we begin to get peace in Northern Ireland.

Mr. King: One of the saddest aspects of yesterday is that many people will get the impression that the majority community in Northern Ireland are like that, when in fact the vast majority of Unionists are looking for a peaceful, prosperous and happy Province in which to live. They deserve a leadership that could look objectively at new proposals to see whether we can find a better way to go forward rather than the stalemate and the sadness of the last 12 or 14 years.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): What kind of Loyalist puts on a hood and stands at a barricade? What are they loyal to? Is not the fact that they behave in that way doing tremendous harm to the instinctive support of the British people for the maintenance of the Union?

Mr. King: I find myself unable to answer my hon. Friend's question, because they were not even loyal to the protests in which they were supposed to be involved. As many hon. Members have said, nothing more destroyed the impact that that protest might have had than the visible intimidation, with the clear inference that if people were not going to work there were many other factors, except voluntary reasons, for not being there.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Were not yesterday's events, or something like them, foreseeable and foreseen with foreboding, and predictable and predicted by some of us who, with sorrow, went into the Lobby against the Anglo-Irish agreement? May I repeat the question that I put to the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) and my own Prime Minister, Harold Wilson, in 1969? Charles I, Sir Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford, Cromwell, Peel, Gladstone, Lloyd George and, in our own time, other well-meaning politicians from this side of the water—who of them have had any success in Ireland? Is not the real problem us?

I make no criticism of the men of the British Army, but if there is what is seen as an English Army in Ireland, what else can we expect? Without being frivolous about it, because it is a very unfrivolous subject, if they can get behind Barry McGuigan, and if they can get behind the Northern Ireland football team, by some alchemy, will not the residents of Ireland solve this problem? We ought to recognise that there is nothing we can do from this side of the water.

Mr. King: It would take more than a supplementary answer to respond to the hon. Member and to the many points that he has raised. I simply believe that the inferences behind his question are quite unacceptable.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Will my right hon. Friend agree that, much as the Parliament of the United Kingdom remains committed to the Union so long as the majority in Northern Ireland so wish, it has to be said that those who wrap themselves in the flag of the Union to frustrate the Parliament of the Union and who destroy the consent upon which the Union is based put the Union at risk and no one else?

Mr. King: I have made absolutely clear, and I do so again, my belief in and my commitment to the Union of Northern Ireland as part of the United Kingdom. All I would say is that some of the events of yesterday, and other events as well — as when other people try occasionally to hit me over the head with a Union Jack wrapped in an iron bar—put some strain on that loyalty.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): The Secretary of State has called attention to the fact that a number of hon. Members were making common cause yesterday with men at the barricades. If he is alleging that those hon. Members were in some way responsible directly for the violence in which they were participating, will he say who they were — because that role is not conformable with membership of this House — and ensure that they do not participate in the wider discussions that he must have with the Unionist community to ensure that their continuing anxieties are met?

Mr. King: The hon. Member may or may not have seen some of the television coverage of yesterday's events. He will have seen a number of people in paramilitary dress. I referred to the fact that Members of this House were making common cause. I noted the distinction that was made by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) in his by-election when a group of people in paramilitary dress arrived. My understanding is that the right hon. Gentleman very properly said that he would have nothing to do with them and they were invited immediately to leave that by-election rally. I wish that I had seen some of that same approach yesterday.

Mr. K. Harvey Proctor (Billericay): Is it not most unfair to blame my right hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) for the current position in Ulster when in August of last year he warned that the denial of equal British rights to Ulster would seriously destabilise the Province, especially in the light of the comments yesterday of Mr. T. E. Utley in the Daily Telegraph, who described the Hillsborough agreement as not being about equality and said that "it is a frigid lie to pretend that it is."?

Mr. King: I totally reject the fact that any citizen of Northern Ireland does not have equal rights with others in the United Kingdom. One of the rights that people enjoy in the United Kingdom is representation in this House. I just happen to notice that that right is being denied to them at the present time by no will of the Government.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): Will the Secretary of State confirm that if there is such a phrase as "no surrender" it relates to the attitude of this House and that the Anglo-Irish agreement still stands and will be acted upon? If there is a phrase in common parlance—"not an inch"—it is a phrase to be adopted by this House: that the gains of the Anglo-Irish agreement both to the Unionist and to the nationalist community will not be surrendered, not by an inch and not by an iota. Will the Secretary of State confirm that last week's offer of round table talks is still on the table?

Mr. King: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I confirm that intimidation or threats are no way to approach this House of Commons or this Government. That is a very counter-productive approach. Nor would there be any case to use it if it were suggested that there is no other approach, because the offer of talks and the agreement that we should meet again to review the suggestions that we made stands. Even more after yesterday, I very much hope that people will realise that that is the sensible way to proceed. For elected Members in the United Kingdom, wherever they come from, faced with serious issues in their constituencies, to refuse to meet and talk with Ministers and with the Prime Minister and discuss these issues is a deplorable lack of responsibility at a very important time.

Later—

Mr. Gow: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, in answer to a question which followed his statement, unwittingly misled the House. Can you give him an opportunity to correct the wrong impression which he gave? My right hon. Friend said that the rights of the Queen's subjects who live in Northern Ireland are the same as the rights of the Queen's subjects who live in Great Britain. My right hon. Friend will acknowledge that the passing of legislation for Northern Ireland is done by Order in Council, whereas for the rest of the kingdom it is done by ordinary Bills. Secondly, there is no——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That seems to be a continuation of the statement. I have already said that we have a very heavy day in front of us. We cannot continue the debate in that way.

Immigration Rules

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to raise with you a point of order concerning the behaviour of the hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold), of which I have given you notice. Indeed, I have given notice of it to the hon. Member.

I ask you whether it is in order for an hon. Member to write a letter on a matter relating to the immigration rules that libels another hon. Member. I refer to a letter which was sent in February by the hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden to a firm of solicitors, in which she enclosed a copy of a letter which the Minister of State, Home Office, the hon. and learned Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Waddington) sent to me. In that letter she appears to say that new regulations are being prepared, of which the House has no knowledge, by the Minister of State, Home Office.

The hon. Lady said in her letter:

"I wonder if you are aware that"

the Minister of State

"is working towards the introduction of new regulations which will prevent MPs such as"

myself

"exercising an open market in allowing people, such as"

Mr. X

"from coming into this country with illegal passports."

The hon. Lady claimed that

"about 20 Labour MPs . . . operated a system over the Christmas holiday period of inviting people to come to them on the completely wrong information that their own Member of Parliament is not available."

The hon. Lady explained how she spent two days during the Christmas period not answering the phone—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman is putting a point of order to me, he must not recite from letters.

Mr. Corbyn: I am sure you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that it is important that I explain why I am putting the point. I shall be brief.

The final point in the hon. Lady's letter is:

"I am sure you will appreciate that this does not endear the system to people, like myself, who work exceedingly hard on behalf of genuine cases, many of whom are resident and very supportive of the Conservative Party."

First, Mr. Speaker, is it in order for an hon. Member to write libellous comments about another hon. Member and, indeed, about a group of hon. Members? Secondly, as the Member concerned is a Minister in the Government, she appears to have information, which is not available to the House, about the true purpose of the draft regulations which the Minister of State, Home Office has raised. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether it would be in order for both the hon. Lady and the Minister of State to come to the House and make statements about the true nature of the regulations which the Home Office is trying to introduce.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot be asked to adjudicate on letters which pass between hon. Members and their constituents. This is a matter between the hon. Lady and her constituent. If the hon. Gentleman is alleging that it is a breach of privilege, that is a different matter and he should write to me about it.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. My hon. Friend has given me a copy of the letter. It goes a good deal wider than the hon. Lady's disgraceful personal allegations against my hon. Friend. There are two points. First, there are allegations against a group of hon. Members. The hon. Lady said in her letter:

"It may well be that you"—

that is, her correspondent—

"are not aware that there are about 20 Labour MPs who operated a system over the Christmas holiday period of inviting people to come to them on the completely wrong information that their own Member of Parliament is not available."

That is a serious allegation against a group of hon. Members.

Secondly, the hon. Lady is a member of the Government and she refers in the letter to what she calls the Minister of State

"working towards the introduction of new regulations which will prevent MPs . . . allowing people . . . into this country with illegal passports."

The House knows of draft guidance, which the Government have communicated to a number of hon. Members, but the House knows nothing of new regulations. If the Government are contemplating new regulations — the hon. Lady is a member of the Government — it is essential that, apart from the hon. Lady coming and explaining herself to the House, the Minister of State or the Home Secretary comes here and says whether, behind the back of Parliament, they are working on new restrictive regulations.

Mr. Speaker: What the right hon. Member has said may be true, but it is not a matter of order. He must pursue it by other means. If he is alleging that contempt has taken place, he knows the action he should take. He should write to me about it.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think you should consider the matter, for the very good reason that several weeks ago, when it was first raised, the discussion was on whether the responsible Minister should at that time have made a personal statement about the attack on 23 Labour Members of Parliament. Because of his failure to do that, other Ministers are using those references in letters. The least that should take place now is that the hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold) should come to the Dispatch Box and explain her conduct regarding not only the proposed new regulations but why the Government and their Ministers are carrying on the argument about those 20-odd Labour Members in the absence of an apology at the beginning from the responsible Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Again that may be so, but it is not a matter of order. There are many parliamentary ways in which the matter can be raised.

Royal Ulster Constabulary

4.26 pm

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): I apologise, Mr. Speaker, for not having given you written notice of my intention to seek your leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10, but the matter has arisen out of the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. With your leave, beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House to discuss a matter of specific, urgent importance, namely,

"the allegation made by hon. Members of the House, and inferentially supported by the Secretary of State, that members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary have failed in their duty to maintain the law as Parliament makes it and to maintain their oath of office to the Queen and to the House."

It is a specific matter because, if the allegation is correct, members of the RUC are guilty of the most serious crime. It is important because, if the police service cannot be relied upon to maintain the law of the land, no Government and no law are possible. It is urgent because we can see with our own eyes the chaos which is in prospect in Northern Ireland.

As one who supports the agreement and who supports the Secretary of State, I wish, by moving the Adjournment of the House, to give my right hon. Friend an opportunity to take back the suggestion to which he lent his authority today, that the police service of Northern Ireland did less than its duty yesterday in the face of the rebellion against the law.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has asked leave to move the Adjournment——

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Tom King): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot deal with a point of order in the middle of a Standing Order No. 10 application.

The hon. Gentleman has asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"allegations made by hon. Members of the House, and supported by the Secretary of State, that members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary have failed to maintain the law and to follow their oath of allegiance."

I have listened to the hon. Gentleman, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10. I cannot therefore submit his application to the House.

Mr. Tom King: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. I was aware that I could not interrupt my hon. Friend in his Standing Order No. 10 application. I very much regret that he chose to raise the matter in that way. In no sense did I inferentially imply a lack of confidence in the RUC. What I said clearly—[HON. MEMBERS: "That is not a point of order."]—is that there have been a number of complaints alleging that the police did not take action. It is——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I fully understand the strong feeling of the Secretary of State on the matter, but I must apply the same rules to the Front Bench as I apply to the Back Benches.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Ordered,

That the draft Parliamentary Constituencies (England) (Miscellaneous Changes) Order 1986 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c. — [Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Scotland

4.29 pm

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to establish an elected Scottish Legislative Assembly for the purpose of improving, modernising and amending Scottish legislation and for the purpose of controlling and scrutinising the administration of Scottish affairs within the United Kingdom; and for connected purposes.

The people of Scotland voted almost exactly seven years ago, on 1 March 1979, by a majority of 77,435, which included, I believe, the Secretary of State for Scotland, to establish a Scottish Assembly. That decision has been treated with contempt by the Government. Instead of having an Assembly to deal with Scottish affairs within the United Kingdom, we have had the exact opposite. We have had a minority Government who have gone to great lengths to centralise more and more power in Whitehall.

The consequences of the refusal to carry out the wishes of the Scottish electorate have been serious. The machinery of government in Scotland is falling into disrepute. The catalogue of failure of the present administration in the Scottish Office is almost endless. The most recent and dramatic example yet of the incompetence of the Scottish Office is the betrayal of the work force at Gartcosh. We have also had the long-drawn-out tragedy of the teachers' dispute.

I am anxious to achieve the widest possible support for the principle of Scottish devolution. Accordingly, I have selected the wording of the long title extremely carefully. In fact, I did not choose the words. I borrowed them from an excellent speech which was delivered by the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) on 16 December 1976. The right hon. and learned Gentleman is now, of course, the Secretary of State for Scotland. He said:

"'Nothing is so powerful as an idea whose time has come.' The time has come for devolution for Scotland, and this House must take account of it."

The House took account of that and the right hon. and learned Gentleman went on to perform some amazing political acrobatics in the ensuing years. In column 1832 he said:

"Scotland is the only territory on the face of the earth which has a legal system without a legislature to improve, modernise and amend it. This is a crazy anomaly."

The right hon. and learned Gentleman was no Johnny-come-lately to the cause of a Scottish Assembly. He declared in column 1837 that he had

"for 10 years argued the need for a directly elected Assembly".

What a splendid fellow. He conceded in column 1833 that there should be no substantial industrial or taxation powers devolved. However, he clearly did not rule out some devolved industrial and taxation powers. He summed up his position as follows:

"There has been a qualitive change in the call for devolution. In the early twentieth century the demand for a separate Scottish Legislature was the result of national sentiment. That national sentiment still exists, but added to it is the need for good government, good administration and a better deal for the Scottish people within the United Kingdom."

Amen to that.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman's comments on the Scottish Office are especially relevant in view of his present position. In column 1833 he said:

"Clearly I welcome the establishment of a directly-elected Assembly, and I welcome the fact that its functions are broadly those of the Scottish Office. The very fact that these functions are with the Scottish Office already is a recognition by previous Governments that distinctive Scottish treatment of these problems is necessary."

In column 1832 he said:

"We have now a Secretary of State for Scotland who is for all practical purposes a Scottish Prime Minister. He covers a Department the equivalent of which in England and Wales is served by eight or nine Ministries. He has one Department, and Scottish Members are expected to scrutinise his actions. The Scottish Office has more civil servants than the European Commission."

If that was the position in 1976, it must surely be as strong now, when the right hon. and learned Gentleman is Secretary of State for Scotland. I have drafted the long title in accordance with his clearly stated objectives and I repeat the invitation which I offered to him during Scottish Question Time last week. I ask him to sponsor my Bill in the interests of consistency if not in the interests of expediency.

In column 1836, the right hon. and learned Gentleman said of the concept of Scottish devolution:

"It would not satisfy the extreme nationalists, nor would it meet the fears of the diehard Unionists, but those two do not represent more than a minority of the Scottish population."—[Official Report, 16 December 1976; Vol. 922, cc. 1831-37.]

Since then the right hon. and learned Gentleman has seen fit to join that diehard unionist minority, a minority which consists now of only about 15 per cent. of the Scottish electorate according to recent polls. Indeed, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had the neck actively to support the repeal of the Scotland Act on 20 June 1979 on the ground that the clear referendum majority for devolution was not large enough, despite the fact that he had campaigned actively for a yes vote.

An absolute majority of those who voted in the referendum voted yes. Indeed, 32·9 per cent. of the electorate voted yes, which was a stronger mandate than the 30·83 per cent. of the British electorate who voted for a Tory Government in the 1983 general election. As for the Secretary of State himself, he had the support of only 20·61 per cent. of his constituency's electorate in the 1983 election. However, he seems still to think that he has a strong enough mandate to carry out the actions that he is now taking. We understand from recent local by-elections that the Scottish Tories are now running in fifth place in Scotland, behind the Labour party, the Nationalists, the Liberals and even the Communists.

I welcome this opportunity to draw attention to the ludicrous and spectacularly inconsistent position of the Secretary of State for Scotland on this crucial issue. After having taken the courageous decision to resign from his Opposition Front Bench position in 1976 so that he could fight for devolution, he has now become Scotland's answer to Jim Hacker. Yes, Secretary of State, seems to be the order of the day.

It is important to reassert the firm commitment of the Labour party and the majority of the people of Scotland to establish an elected Scottish Assembly to assume control of the powers which have been devolved to the Scottish Office over the years. Obviously that commitment is consistent entirely with our recognition of the position of our friends and neighbours in other parts of the United Kingdom, especially in the aftermath of the destruction of the democratic institutions of England's metropolitan areas. Scottish Labour Members can promise wholehearted support to our friends in the north of England in their just demand for the decentralisation of power and the provision of an effective agency for economic development.

The overriding objective must be the defeat of this pernicious Tory Government. However, we should all recognise that the establishment of a better Britain and a better Scotland must be consolidated as soon as possible by constitutional reform, including, as an urgent priority, the establishment of an Assembly. It is in that spirit that I introduce my Bill.

4.38 pm

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) seeking to oppose the Bill?

Mr. Dixon: It gives me no joy to speak against a ten-minute Bill that has been introduced by one of my hon. Friends. I feel rather like Daniel today. My hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) has made my task far easier by explaining that the wording of the Bill is based on the words of the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind), who is now the Secretary of State for Scotland.

I have a strong affinity with my friend the hon. Member for East Lothian. I have a holiday in Scotland every year with my family and I believe that the coastline on the west of Scotland is second only to the Northumberland and Durham coastline. The scenery in the west of Scotland is second only to that of Durham, Northumberland and Cumbria.

As one who represents a constituency in northern England with the highest unemployment in mainland Britain and with as many, if not more, social problems as are to be found in the part of the United Kingdom that is represented by my hon. Friend, I oppose the Bill for two reasons. We have already lost a tier of local government. The Tyne and Wear county council provided quite a strong agency for creating employment in the area I represent.

The motion does not ask that leave be given to introduce a Bill to establish an elected Assembly in Scotland in two years' time, or after we have a northern development agency or after a regional system of government which benefits the region has been established. It speaks of establishing an elected Assembly now.

My first reason for opposing the motion springs from naked envy. I envy my Scottish colleagues, who have a Secretary of State with Cabinet rank. I envy their being able to come here every month and ask questions of their Secretary of State. I am envious of their Select Committee. I am envious of their Grand Committee. I am envious of Scotland's development agency.

My second reason for opposing the motion involves a warning to a future Labour leadership. When we get a Labour Government in 12 months' or two years' time, we shall inherit an unemployment level of more than 4 million. We shall inherit a National Health Service which will be a shambles. We shall inherit a welfare state which the Government have disassembled. We shall inherit an industrial base which is in tatters. My warning as an individual Member of Parliament who will in all probability be re-elected at the next election is that I shall not spend time, as did the Labour Government between

[Mr. Dixon]

1974 and 1979, dealing with constitutional issues in the House when there is so much in the country to be put right. That is why I oppose the motion.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. John Home Robertson, Mr. John Maxton, Mr. Dick Douglas, Mr. Dennis Canavan, Mr. George Foulkes, Dr. Norman A. Godman, Mr. Tom Clarke, Mr. Allen Adams, Mr. William McKelvey, Mr. David Lambie, Mr. David Marshall and Mr. Bob McTaggart.

Mr. Home Robertson: And there is room for the Secretary of State for Scotland if he wants.

SCOTLAND

Mr. John Home Robertson accordingly presented a Bill to establish an elected Scottish Legislative Assembly for the purpose of improving, modernising and amending Scottish legislation and for the purpose of controlling and scrutinising the administration of Scottish affairs within the United Kingdom; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 7 March and to be printed. [Bill 100.]

Orders of the Day

Housing (Scotland) Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), further considered.

New Clause 2

DUTY TO ENSURE AVAILABILITY OF SHELTERED HOUSING

It shall be the responsibility of each district council in Scotland to ensure that there is sheltered Housing available for 5% of its resident population over the age of 65 years."—[Mr. Maxton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

4.45 pm

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

In the midst of the general housing crisis in Scotland, much of which the Government have caused, is a housing problem for the aged. An increasing proportion of the population are aged over 65, and an increasing proportion of them require housing that enables them to remain in society although they cannot entirely look after themselves.

In an excellent document, Age Concern recognises that the need is simply not being met. Very few local authorities in Scotland have anything like enough sheltered housing for people aged over 65. I represent an area in which 41 per cent. of the population live in council houses. Week in, week out, constituents come to my surgeries seeking special needs housing or sheltered housing supplied by the local authorities. Many of them are nearly housebound, or have partners who are nearly housebound. Many have to negotiate stairs, which makes mobility even more difficult. They require homes on the ground floor with some form of alarm system linked to a warden who can provide immediate help. Too many elderly people live without such support.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) wants to speak about this subject. Due to his past connections with Age Concern, he will no doubt be able to give more details.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): One is taken by surprise in this place from time to time and this afternoon has been no exception. It gives me great pleasure to speak in support of new clause 2.

Although I hope for a sympathetic response, I know that we shall get a response from a Minister who understands what I shall talk about, as the Minister and I have had some discussions on the matter before. As my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) said, I was involved with the needs of the elderly as a director of Age Concern Scotland. I shall quote from an excellent document which it produced and which, I believe, was sent to all Members of Parliament—it was certainly sent to the Minister—entitled "Housing Facts and Figures". The introduction says:

"Age Concern Scotland believes that every pensioner has the right to a decent home. A decent home should be warm, adapted to the pensioner's real needs and at a price the pensioner can afford."

We have all been worried about warmth during the past few weeks. We know that old people often live in houses that are difficult to heat. Those who are lucky enough to live in sheltered housing are relatively well off. During the past few weeks, we have been worried about pensioners freezing to death in inadequate housing. Those of us who campaign for extreme weather payments should not sit back and think that we have achieved anything very substantial, because the payments are limited to relatively very few pensioners. Many others who need help will not benefit. If the Government have their way with the Social Security Bill, matters will deteriorate rather than improve.

One of the best ways in which to ensure that pensioners are kept relatively warm in winter is to ensure that they have a decent house which is well insulated and easy to heat rather than draughty, large and prone to substantial heat loss. During the past couple of decades, sheltered housing has therefore been advanced as one of the best means of housing old people.

It was my predecessor at Age Concern, which was then called the Scottish Old People's Welfare Council, the late Marjorie Salmon, who launched the idea of sheltered housing in Scotland at a conference in Aberdeen. The principle of sheltered housing was not then fully accepted, and people had not thought through the possibilities. A lot of tribute is due to those pioneers of some decades ago.

As to the need for sheltered housing for the elderly, the recommended rate — at least, it used to be the recommended rate—is 50 per 1,000 of the population, although I think that the Government are shying away from the fact that it is a recommended rate because increasingly they are unable to get anywhere near that rate, as I shall demonstrate.

The need for sheltered housing is increasing, not just because of the present severe winter but because the population is living to a greater age. Demographic changes are brought about by improvements in medical services so that people are living longer, for which one is thankful, and the percentage of old people in the community is increasing. It can be seen from the report to which I have referred that the figure is moving up to 17 per cent., and will be up to 20 per cent. by next century.

If one considers the type of housing in which old people live it is regrettably the case they are much more likely to lack a bath than is the case in the population generally. Old people are more likely to share a bathroom than the rest of the population, yet when one is old and retired, with the possibility of coping with incontinence and other difficulties, baths and facilities such as hot and cold running water are even more necessary than they are for the population generally.

Old people spend a much larger percentage of their income on the provision of housing. It is therefore very important that they get good value for the money they spend on housing. As I [illegible] in the debate that was truncated last Thursday, unfortunately public expenditure on housing has been halved in the lifetime of the present Government. The Minister tried all manner of twists and turns to deny this, but the facts speak for themselves. When the Government took office, over £1 billion a year was being spent on housing; the amount now is only £556 million, which, by anybody's arithmetic, is about half; and this at a time when needs are greater, the number of old people is increasing, and they are living in substandard accommodation. As a result, fewer new houses are being built.

Since 1979, 45,000 jobs in the Scottish construction industry have been lost. There is, on the one hand, this increasing number of old people in substandard accommodation desperately anxious to get into sheltered housing and on the other hand many construction workers who are unemployed. This is a ridiculous situation. It is time that the Government recognised the need and took the opportunity to put men—and, may I add, some women, as I note the presence of my right hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Dame J. Hart) — in the construction industry back to work.

If one examines the need, the recommended level of 50 per 1,000 of the retired population is not over-generous. There is a need for 36,000 sheltered housing units, identified in the Age Concern document, and confirmed by Government, yet fewer than 16,000 sheltered housing units currently exist. The shortfall is still well over 20,000 units. That is needed to provide the right facilities for old people.

Amenity housing, as the Minister knows, although one stage down in some ways, remains an important provision for old people. Again, on Government figures, the need is estimated to be over 72,000, yet in Scotland only about 4,500 amenity houses exist. The shortfall is over 67,000. One has to bear in mind the huge shortfall identified in the Age Concern document and the opportunities for unemployed workers to provide this housing.

I discussed this matter earlier today with my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Rutherglen (Mr. MacKenzie) and, although the need is as important as the quick revision of sheltered housing to meet that need, there are a couple of other things which ought to be borne in mind. I am sure that the Minister will agree, as my right hon. Friend reminded me, that when discussions are taking place between the local authority and the housing association which may be providing the accommodation for the local authority, careful consideration must be given to the appropriate location of sheltered housing units. It is important not to build units on outlying sites at a distance from the centre of the town. Housing for old people should be provided in the community so that they can participate in, and see what is happening in, the community, and be within easy reach of shops, post offices and other facilities. Full account should be also taken of the fact that old people can be annoyed by excessive interruptions from young people or by traffic.

There is a tendency, not too prevalent, for some authorities and organisations, in their enthusiasm to provide more sheltered housing units, to skimp on the provision, so that instead of providing two-apartment houses they provide studio apartments. That is not the sort of accommodation we should offer old people in retirement. It would be intolerable to see a return to the single-end type of accommodation which some elderly people had to live in at the start of their lives.

I have indicated the substantial need for sheltered housing that exists. We accept that the amendment is fairly rigid in its targets. The aim is to give the Government an opportunity to respond and to recognise how far short of what is required the present provision is.

The elderly feel under attack from the Government. Indeed, they have been concerned about the lack of provision for heating, given that pension increases recently announced amount to pennies instead of pounds—40p for a single pensioner which, as my hon. Friend the member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) said, is enough to buy four eggs. The last Labour Government devised the formula that pensions should go up with increases in earnings or prices, whichever was the larger. If that formula were applied, a single pensioner would be better off by £4 a week and a married couple by £6·50. We know that in all those areas the pensioner is under attack.

I hope that we shall not see a negative attitude to this new clause from the Government. I hope that they will give some sign, even if the new clause is not acceptable, that pensioners have some hope of living in a decent house which is easy to keep warm and clean and in which they can continue to live during their retirement, in comfort and happiness. I hope that we shall get such a commitment from the Government but, if I am honest, having seen the Government's record, I have my doubts.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): In 1980, a report sponsored by the Scottish Home and Health Department and the Scottish Education Department, entitled "Changing Patterns of Care. Report on Services for the Elderly in Scotland", was published. It was the report of a programme planning group set up by the Advisory Council on Social Work and the Scottish Health Service Planning Council.

Chapter 4 of the report dealt fully with housing for the elderly and what was required to deal with probably the biggest housing challenge facing Scotland today, which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) said, is the need to provide good, comfortable housing for a steadily increasing elderly population.

The report worked on the proposition that probably 50 sheltered housing places per thousand people over 65 would be about right. That is not a scientific figure, but it is the kind of figure on which the report was working. On that basis, it was estimated that in 1977, 34,900 such places would be required. The report went on to deal with amenity housing.

The report compared the requirement with what was happening. In 1978 the total number of places completed, under construction, or approved, awaiting a start, was 12,597 for sheltered housing and 6,209 for amenity housing. The report went on to say that adequate resources should be allocated to the sheltered housing programme.

The position has worsened since that time. The report estimated that the capital costs for the sheltered housing programme that was put forward would be £317 million. I have no doubt that the Minister will say that the Government cannot afford that expenditure. Let me remind him, as I have reminded the House on many occasions, that that £317 million is just about the amount — my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) will be able to correct me if I am wrong—that we are spending on 1,200 folk 8,000 miles away in the Falkland Islands. If we can afford that in the Falkland Islands, we can afford it for the old folk of Scotland.

It is now five or six years since that report was produced, and the number of elderly people is increasing. The problem is becoming more acute month by month. The number of people aged 65 and over in mid-1984 in Scotland, was 724,800. On the basis of 100 beds per thousand of the over-65s, that would give us a figure of 72,460. The Age Concern document to which my hon. Friend referred was much more conservative. It gave a figure of 36,230. If one looks at the sheltered housing provision then existing, one sees that the total was 15,948 —considerably less than half what the total provision should have been. There was a shortfall of more than 20,000.

It is a well known fact, with which the Minister would not argue, that every responsible body in Scotland, of all political persuasions and of none—housing associations, local authorities, the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, trade unions, architects, builders, churches, the National Economic Development Council, the Labour, Liberal and Social Democratic parties, and even members of the royal family — is coming to realise the great dangers of inadequate housing, whether for the young or the old, but particularly for the old. All those organisations, and I suspect many Conservative Members — although only two Back-Bench Tory Scottish Members are here, because they do not care very much about the problem — would assert the need for far greater investment in public housing, not least for our old folk.

Britain's construction record, by international standards, is appalling. As a percentage of gross domestic product spent on construction, our figures are disgraceful. The United Nations figures for 1982 show that Switzerland was spending 16·2 per cent. of its gross domestic product on construction, Canada 14·6 per cent., Finland 13·6 per cent., Ireland 13·2 per cent. — one of the poorest countries in Europe — West Germany 12·7 per cent., France 11·6 per cent., Italy 11·3 per cent., and Sweden 10·7 per cent. The United Kingdom was bottom of the league, at 7·5 per cent., and it is getting worse all the time. That is a disgraceful record. It is an evil record. Like my hon. Friend I despair of the Government doing anything about it, because they just do not care.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): First, what is the Scottish Office's best assessment of the global need in the next two decades for sheltered housing? There must be some figures. If the Minister does not have them, perhaps his Parliamentary Private Secretary will be able to provide them before the Minister replies.

Secondly, there is a problem that I do not think is special pleading for the Linlithgow constituency because other places are in a similar position. Take, for example, Blackburn. Blackburn blossomed forth quickly a quarter of a century ago. It was expanded for the purposes of the then British Motor Corporation and British Leyland. When I first became the Member of Parliament for Linlithgow —West Lothian as it was then—many families in their late twenties and early and middle thirties moved in to expanded Blackburn, expanded Whitburn and expanded Armadale. But it does not need any genius to now that they are mostly aging at the same time. They are communities with special needs because people are suddenly reaching ages between 60 and 70 at the same time, yet there is inadequate sheltered accommodation and accommodation suitable for elderly couples.

That problem could be repeated in many parts of Scotland, although in few areas in such an extreme form as in Blackburn. What is the Scottish Office thinking on areas of special need because of the history of the late 1950s and early 1960s.

Thirdly, I am appalled by the figures given to me by the excellent director of housing in West Lothian, Mr.

John Spraggon, concerning the present demands from one-parent families compared to three or four years ago. What is Scottish Office thinking on one-parent family accommodation? The break-up of marriage involves a single person and sheltered housing—or at least single housing, may be the best answer to the problem.

Fourthly, what thought has been give to the provision of simple, even mundane, medical treatment within sheltered housing — for example, chiropody? The Minister will be aware that there is a shortage of chiropodists and that the queues for treatment are getting longer and longer. Something could be done about that and, in terms of the old proverb "A stitch in time saves nine", it could save endless trouble. Will simple medical facilities—it need not be more than a room—be made available in new sheltered accommodation or in areas of clustered sheltered housing?

The legacy of Coal Board housing is a problem facing the mining areas, if not West Lothian in particular. The condition of such housing varies considerably. My hon. Friend the Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) can confirm that some are in such appalling condition that they must be demolished. In other areas the Coal Board housing is of an extremely high quality and well built—often at the turn of the century. The same can be said of the old Scottish Oils Ltd. housing.

Will the Government have discussions with the Coal Board on the future of this housing in areas where there are no longer, rightly or wrongly, any pits? I am talking specifically about the position in Stoneyburn and the area of Wilson terrace. These areas used to serve the Polkemmet pit, which has been closed, and other pits. The Coal Board has said that housing management is not its forte. The West Lothian council has said that although it could purchase the houses at market price there is no question of improving them out of existing financial resources. I discussed this matter with the chairman of the West Lothian housing committee, Mr. Robert Lee, a serious councillor who told me that the council cannot afford to do the improvements which the long-term tenants understandably ask for.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I am finding it difficult to relate what the hon. Gentleman is saying to sheltered housing for the over-65s. I am sure that he can relate his remarks to the new clause.

Mr. Dalyell: I do not want to go on and I shall cut my remarks short.

I echo the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on the needs of the construction industry. The industry could play an important part in the matter of sheltered housing and with regard to unemployed building workers and under-employed resources. It may not cost anything like what the Government anticipate, especially when one takes into account the extra taxes that firms would pay, the reduction in uneployment benefit paid out, adjustments to housing benefit, national insurance and the whole social calculus.

Last month I was asked to address the Institution of Civil Engineers and at its request I am preparing to speak to the Forth Valley building employers. When I do this I see how necessary it is for the construction industry to get something of a fillip. Have the costs of creating sheltered housing been taken into account in terms of the social calculus?

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): I support the amendment. I am sure that most hon. Members would welcome more sheltered housing for their constituents. I know that some local authorities, especially my own—Falkirk district council—are doing their best to meet the housing need. Recently my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) opened a new sheltered housing complex at Tygetshaugh at Denny in my constituency. My hon. Friend and I spoke to virtually all the residents immediately after the official opening and most were undoubtedly delighted with the new accommodation. However, I am sure that there must have been many more old people who were disappointed because, although the council is doing its best, the Government are not doing enough. The Government are not giving local authorities sufficient funds to meet the housing needs.

The new clause proposes that we should lay down national targets so that each district council would try to ensure that there is sheltered housing for at least 5 per cent. of those people over the age of 65. That would certainly go some way towards meeting the need, provided that the Government have the political will to give sufficient resources to the local authorities.

5.15 pm

A few weeks ago we had a debate on housing support grant and housing capital allocation. The truth of the matter is that many councils are getting nothing by way of housing support grant—that includes Falkirk district council—and councils receive little in terms of housing capital allocation compared with their needs. The Government are not playing the game. I do not wish to see another statutory obligation placed on local authorities unless sufficient support is given by the Government to meet such obligations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) spoke about the Age Concern document which stated that in the case of old people the proportion of their income which goes towards heating their homes is higher than in the population in general. Similarly, the proportion of their income which goes towards housing is higher than the average for the population. When discussing housing and the needs of the elderly it is no use giving them a roof over their heads — they need adequate heating, especially in this weather; otherwise, there may be a health risk, and certainly at this time of the year it could be a matter of life or death. When the transition was made from the old system of rent rebates to the new housing benefit, many old people, including those in sheltered housing, lost out. The Prime Minister did not mention that this afternoon when she was quizzed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) about heating assistance for old people and indeed others on low incomes.

I hope the Minister will adopt a more generous attitude tonight. It is important not just to help the local authorities to meet housing needs, but it is also important to help people to meet their heating requirements. I support the new clause and I hope that if the Government accept the new clause it will be strengthened by more commitment on their part. I am sure such a commitment would be welcomed by old people in sheltered housing and those old people who are literally queueing up for a place in sheltered housing.

Mr. Michael Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): On Saturday, a constituent came to see me at my surgery. He is an elderly gentleman of nearly 80, and he told me that his wife was a stroke victim in the district hospital, which is quite a distance from the constituency. If he misses the bus to get there, he has to get a taxi because there is no other means of transport. The doctor at the hospital had written to say that if my constituent's wife could go into sheltered housing, which would mean that she would be near her daughter in the Bridgeton district of Glasgow, she could be released into the community and a precious place could be made available at the hospital.

My constituent was ashamed at having to ask for help and at having to give details of himself and his family to people like me. He felt as though in some way he was asking for favours. I tried to tell him that the fault did not lie with him. He should not have had to come to us. He should have such accommodation as of right. He was doing the community a service, because at his age he and his daughter were prepared to look after his wife. It was shameful that his wife had to be in hospital because we could not provide sheltered accommodation.

The new clause lets the Government off the hook. More than 5 per cent. of sheltered housing should be available in the council stock. It is a scandal that, in this day and age, elderly people are either confined to hospital or sometimes to their homes without proper back-up, when all that the Government need to do is to give a little more and provide sheltered accommodation. It should not be difficult for the Government to build new sheltered accommodation, or instruct a Government agency such as the Scottish Special Housing Association, and the community-based housing associations, to do so. They could even adapt some of the council housing stock for sheltered housing.

It is time that the Government stopped telling people that everything is all right in sheltered housing, when they know very well that we are in a desperate situation. The Minister knows that a great deal of our housing stock is allocated to people who are under-occupying four or five-bedroomed houses. They were young people when they went into the house and were bringing up young children in the 1950s, or in some cases in the 1940s. Those houses are not being released for families, because we do not have the proper housing stock. It is shameful that some of our elderly tenants get only the support of a home help, sometimes for an hour a day, and in some cases every second day. It is time that the Government did something to alleviate the problems. We are being modest in asking for this small amount of sheltered accommodation.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): I support the new clause. I echo the comments made by other hon. Members in urging the Government to try to achieve a percentage target for sheltered housing in each local authority in Scotland. That must be underpinned by the requisite finance from the Scottish Office, so that the authorities can meet the target. It would be ludicrous for us to put forward such a proposal without some clear sign from the Scottish Office that it is willing to loosen the purse strings for new build and new start.

I know that the Minister will have heard in Committee from my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) about the highlands and islands. The Minister will be aware of the correspondence from and exchanges with my hon. Friend and myself over some of the tremendous problems in housing generally being experienced in those areas.

Encouraging a percentage target for sheltered housing in the highlands and islands will accentuate the difficulties experienced elsewhere, because of the increased cost of new build. On the west coast, places such as Fort William and Mallaig, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber, and some in my constituency, have persistent housing problems. In places such as Ullapool, Kyle of Lochalsh, Gairloch and Aultbea, the local council, even if it had a percentage target at which to aim, would be hampered more than most local authorities in introducing a programme for increased sheltered housing, because the number of houses that it would be able to complete, with the finance available, would be smaller than the number in areas that are nearer the markets and do not have the problems of haulage and so on. I hope that the Minister will bear that in mind.

We all want more sheltered housing. It is important to set in context the problems that may be emerging in the Highlands regional council at the moment. In the sheltered housing scheme in Achiltibuie, which is about the most remote corner of the north-west of my constituency, because of cuts in other aspects of Government provision to the regional authority, there is a question mark over the provision of a warden for the sheltered housing. This is part of the broader picture. The new clause, which is commendable and has the support of my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber and myself, must evoke a response from the Minister that is considerably more sympathetic than other responses. It must recognise the realities of providing sheltered housing, particularly for the elderly, in the highlands and islands.

In the north of Scotland we have a higher average proportion of elderly people, and that is a persistent historical fact. Although not so much in the past few weeks, strangely enough, we also have fairly severe weather conditions in comparison to the rest of Scotland. The weather in other parts of Scotland has been exceptional recently. These factors contribute to the costs that old people must sustain and to the difficulties that have to be met. I hope that the new clause will evoke a positive and supportive response from the Minister.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Ancram): I understand the concern and interest of Opposition Members and the reasons why the new clause has been tabled. Although the amendment was tabled by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton), the name of the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) also appears on the Amendment Paper. We appreciate the previous incarnation of the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley and the interest that he has in the subject. However, I am surprised the the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends who have supported the new clause wish to impose a new duty on local authorities which removes discretion—although I am sure that that was not the intention—and sets a rigid target. That may well not have been the intention of Opposition Members.

Mr. Maxton: The Minister is nit-picking.

5.30 pm

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Member for Cathcart accuses me of nit-picking, but I can make more of my point. I am trying to help the hon. Gentleman to see the error of his drafting ways. I am sure that the hon. Member for Cathcart understands, even if his hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley does not.

Mr. Maxton rose——

Mr. Ancram: I would like to finish my point and then I will certainly give way.

As the hon. Member for Cathcart will remember, I suggested in Committee that the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities may not always be aware of what Opposition Members wish it to do. In terms of the new clause, I have a shrewd suspicion that that is the case and that, were COSLA consulted as to whether it wanted a rigid new clause of this type, it might not be quite so supportive of Opposition Members as it frequently is.

Mr. Maxton: I am delighted to know that COSLA supports me in most of my actions. If the Minister is prepared to give a commitment now that he will move a new clause in another place which states as he is so concerned about us laying down such a rigid target, I would be perfectly happy, as would my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley, to withdraw the new clause.

"not less than 5 per cent.",

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman is trying to fish his way out of trouble. He has not answered the real criticism of the new clause—that it imposes a rigid target on authorities. The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley appreciates that.

I would like to put the matter into perspective. It is important because all hon. Members are concerned about the elderly and the housing available for them. I have referred to the need to provide more support housing for the elderly. It is important that hon. Members realise that that housing need not necessarily be sheltered. We should not talk about sheltered housing to the exclusion of other forms of housing, which may be as important and as valuable to elderly people.

The new clause relates to sheltered housing. I am always apprehensive when I see Opposition Members getting up, especially the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) who seems to look at life through glasses that are tinted with something that I cannot understand.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: They are red-tinted.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman says that his glasses are red-tinted but whatever colour they are they tend to distort what he actually sees.

The hon. Member for Fife, Central said that the situation is getting worse in relation to sheltered housing. I would like to give the House one or two figures to help hon. Members appreciate the true position.

In Scotland in 1979, there were 6,877 sheltered houses. By 1985, the last year for which I have figures, there were 17,854. That is very nearly a threefold increase. The total housing for the elderly and disabled in Scotland in 1979 was 12,570. In 1985 it was 34,438. Again, that is nearly a threefold increase.

It is important that, if hon. Members wish to make speeches, they do so with a full knowledge of the facts. Local authorities are already under a duty to consider the housing conditions in their districts and the needs of the district with respect to the provision of further housing accommodation. That gives the authorities both discretion and duty in provision. The new clause takes away that discretion and replaces it with a requirement to provide bed spaces for 5 per cent. of the population over 65 years of age.

Dame Judith Hart (Clydesdale): Will the Minister relate the figures for sheltered housing to the increasing ratio of the elderly in the population? Without that comparison the figures are meaningless.

Mr. Ancram: I intend to do that. I shall give the detailed figures that will answer the right hon. Member's question.

The recommended rate, as the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley said, is of 50 bed spaces per thousand people aged over 65. I believe that the hon. Gentleman was slightly confused about the figures that he gave, as he mixed bed spaces and units. The recommendation endorsed by COSLA and subsequently endorsed by the Government, is 50 bed spaces per thousand of the elderly over 65.

Mr. Foulkes: Old couples do share beds.

Mr. Ancram: Couples sometimes share units as well, and the hon. Gentleman must be aware of that.

The average provision in the whole of Scotland at present is 47 bed spaces per thousand population over 65. That is 4·7 per cent. and is not far off the 5 per cent. that the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley requires.

I have already referred to some of the increases since 1979. Those increases have allowed us to reach a position which, while it is not quite at the target of the recommended level, is close to it. There have been percentage increases in the various forms of housing for the elderly as follows. In sheltered housing there has been a 65 per cent. increase between 1979 and 1985. In sheltered wheelchair housing there has been an increase of 295 per cent. over the same period. In amenity housing there has been an increase of 115 per cent. over that period and there has been a total increase of 154 per cent. over that period. The growth in population aged 65 and over was 1 per cent. to the mid-point of 1984. There has been a considerable advance in that time in terms of actual provision.

Areas such as West Lothian, referred to by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and Midlothian, in which Opposition Members have an interest, provide only six and four bed spaces respectively per thousand of population over 65. That reveals that elsewhere in Scotland provision is well in excess of the guide figures that have been proposed.

In view of the accusations and allegations, particularly from the hon. Member for Fife, Central, I would like to give more figures. The number of persons in Scotland over the age of 65 is 724,624. At present there are 32,810 sheltered bed spaces in Scotland and 1,348 wheelchair sheltered bed spaces. These figures amount to 47 bed spaces per thousand persons over the age of 65. There are, however, variations within those figures. The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) spoke about the islands and the remoter areas. Authorities such as Shetland have 173 bed spaces per thousand of the population over 65. Badenoch and Strathspey, which are rather closer to the hon. Gentleman, have 123 bed spaces per thousand of the population. Ross and Cromarty have 51 bed spaces and are therefore up to target.

Mr. Foulkes rose——

Mr. Ancram: I will give way in a moment.

Skye and Lochalsh have 50. They are up to target.

Mr. Foulkes rose——

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Member must allow me to finish this point. He deployed some figures the other day and I want to deploy my figures now.

There are authorities, including city authorities such as Dundee, which provide 184 bed spaces per thousand of the population over 65.

It is important to recognise that while there are areas where bed space provision in terms of sheltered housing is much lower than it should be—these areas must be working to meet the targets—there are other areas that have provision well above the recommended level. The overall figures in Scotland are nearly up to the recommended level endorsed by the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley.

Mr. Foulkes: This is the most central point in comparing figures. My understanding of the recommendation included in the circular—I admit that that was a Labour Government circular which may have been abandoned or changed by the present Government—was that the recommended level was 50 units per thousand. The Minister seems to have transposed that to bed spaces. I would be grateful if the Minister could tell us when that change took place. It is clear from the document issued by Age Concern, which analyses the statistics, that the understanding is that it should be units per thousand. I have been working on that basis and my hon. and right hon. Friends understand that the base is 50 units per thousand. When did this sleight of hand by the Government take place? When did they change the sheltered housing units to bed spaces?

Mr. Ancram: It is my understanding that the measure has always been bed spaces. The figure of 50 per thousand arises from a survey carried out for the whole of Britain in 1962, and was incorporated in the Scottish housing handbook as helpful guidance to local authorities when the Labour Government were in office. I am being handed a piece of paper which confirms that. The number of people requiring this sort of accommodation is best assessed on the basis of bed spaces which they will take up. I know from having opened some sheltered accommodation units that some are for single people and others for married couples. Therefore, that is the correct way to deal with the matter.

It is important that hon. Members recognise that the ratio is on a national basis. Local authorities should have the discretion, which the new clause would remove from them, to decide how far they meet or exceed the ratio, depending on the circumstances in their localities. Equally, it must be right that local authorities judge their overall housing needs and priorities. In that way the needs for sheltered housing can be assessed against the requirement for other accommodation within the bounds of what the authority, and ultimately the country, can afford.

At present sheltered housing is provided in many ways, not just by local authorities. The housing associations with public resources provide some of the accommodation contained in the figures that I mentioned. There is private investment in sheltered housing. A local housing authority would take account of all those matters in considering the needs of its area, especially its need to provide sheltered housing.

Mr. Kennedy: The Minister probably made the point clear when he quoted the ratio figures earlier, but am I correct in thinking that those figures referred only to local authority provision, and did not take other forms of sheltered housing provision into account?

Mr. Ancram: Even the new clause is not clear on that. It states that the responsibility of each district council in Scotland will be "to ensure that there is sheltered Housing available for 5 per cent. of its resident population over the age of 65 years."

As nothing was said to the contrary, I assumed that that included sheltered housing provided by housing associations. They continue to contribute to the level of sheltered housing and bed spaces within sheltered houses for the community. It is important to realise that both local authorities and other agencies have an important role to play, and have been playing it.

Mr. Kennedy: Our emphasis has been on local authorities. There is a hint in the Minister's reply that the figures that he gave did not refer only to local authority provision, but included all the other forms of provision. Will the Minister clarify that?

Mr. Ancram: It is generaly accepted that local authorities are not expected to provide for all housing needs. They must form a strategic overview for their areas, and marshall resources to meet local needs, working in co-operation with other agencies, such as housing associations, the Scottish Special Housing Association, new town development corporations and the private sector. That is part of a housing authority's general strategy, and does not apply only to sheltered housing. Private developers are now making a significant contribution to the special needs housing sector which until now has been provided by the public sector. The fact that provision is coming from the private sector does not diminish the value of the accommodation.

Mr. Kennedy: What about the figures?

Mr. Ancram: My figures cover all the ways in which sheltered housing has been provided. Much of the total is made up by housing association provision.

Mr. Maxton: Will the Minister confirm that all his figures have been for bed spaces, not sheltered housing? There is a difference.

Mr. Ancram: If the hon. Gentleman had listened to me, he would know that I gave the original figures separately from the bed space figures. The original figures for the increase in shelterd houses were 6,877 in 1979 rising to 17,854 in 1985. Within those houses there are varying numbers of bed spaces. I said that the hon. Member for Cathcart appeared to be confused about bed spaces and houses. We are talking about providing accommodation for a recommended number of elderly people, that is 50 per thousand of the population. The number of sheltered houses that have been built has increased threefold since 1979. None of us is complacent, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that the figure in the new clause is almost met at present.

5.45 pm

I would be the first to admit that more work needs to be done for the elderly. I have recognised the needs of local authorities by increasing their capital allocations over two years by 43 per cent. The hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) continues to consider that increase a reduction, but authorities which have seen substantial increases in their capital allocations realise that they have more resources available to do what they want, and that is right.

The new clause, as it stands, would make poor law and would not be welcomed by local authorities. On further consideration I am sure that the hon. Member for Cathcart will consider that it should be withdrawn. If he does not, I must invite the House to reject it.

Mr. Maxton: Once again we have an example of how the Government and the Minister cannot make up their minds whether they are in favour of extra public expenditure on housing, or whether their economic philosophy leads them to reject that. The Minister keeps trying to prove that he is a generous, liberal man when it comes to housing matters, but all of us, including our constituents and his, know that that is not the case. We know that overall the Government have cut housing expenditure by 50 per cent. since they came to office, and that sheltered housing——

Mr. Ancram: What did the Labour Government do?

Mr. Maxton: We are talking about the Tory Government. They have been in power for nearly seven years, yet their only answer to any case that is made is, "What did you do about it?" They know that the Scottish people reject them and have no interest in their policies, so they can only drag in what is becoming increasingly ancient history.

Mr. Ancram: The hon Gentleman has got back on his old high horse about cuts in capital expenditure on housing in Scotland. He knows that that is incorrect, so I shall not refer to it. He also knows that last week his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) announced that a Labour Government would increase expenditure on housing by between £4 billion and £5 billion. The hon. Member for Garscadden shakes his head, but if he reads The Scotsman of Friday 28 February he will find himself quoted there in connection with a major policy document. Perhaps he would like to explain to the House from where the extra money will come, and why, having seen a cut of 37 per cent. in housing under the Labour Government, anyone should believe that a future Labour Government would increase spending.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): That was a waste of time.

Mr. Maxton: I agree with my right hon. Friend that, as usual, the Minister is trying every last possible way to divert attention from the effects of his housing policy. He is trying to curry favour with his Back Benchers, who have a great deal of interest in the condition of housing in Scotland.

When the Minister tried to say how well the Government had done in Scotland in providing sheltered housing, he made no effort to set the increase in sheltered housing against the increase in the numbers of elderly. He than switched the attack from sheltered housing to bed spaces for the elderly, and he used every diversionary tactic to get away from the basic argument that the Government are failing the elderly in our society. He does not even have any of his hon. Friends present on the Government Benches to say, "Hear, hear," when he does make a few comments. The Minister even went back to 1962 to dig up that argument.

All the organisations which are concerned with this issue are worried, not about bed space, but about sheltered housing for those who are in need in our society. There has been a change in thinking and in the way in which society approaches the elderly, particularly those who are not as capable of looking after themselves as they once were. In the past we provided homes for the elderly to go into. Increasingly, and rightly, the aim is to allow the elderly to stay in society and live among their friends for as long as is humanly possible. Therefore, since 1962 there has been a shift in the way in which we look at the problem.

The problem is not just the lack of sheltered housing, but the way in which the Government have slashed the services for the elderly in a variety of other ways. In my constituency we talk about amenity housing. In my constituency houses are provided for the elderly in Dougrie place. An alarm system has been in place from those houses to an old folks home, Glenwood Lodge, for the past six years, but the system came into operation only last month because the Strathclyde region did not have the resources to be able to afford the extra staff in the old folks home to allow it to become operative. It is not just a matter of sheltered housing. There has been an overall decline in the way in which the Government treat the elderly.

I do not accept the answers that the Minister has given, but I accept tht there may be defects in the way in which the new clause is drafted. That is always possible when the Opposition draft amendments without the help of the advisers that the Ministers have, and without the help of the parliamentary draftsmen. The Minister claims that the clause is an inflexible and rigid imposition upon local authorities and that they ought to be allowed to decide their future in such matters. The Government insist on the right to buy, they insist that every local authority should sell its council houses, and they insist that the money local authorities may borrow for building must be limited by the Government, but whenever it suits the Government's purpose they use the shoddy argument that local authorities must have the right to decide. That is a shoddy argument coming from the Minister, who has made every effort to tighten and centralise control over local authorities. It is a spurious argument coming from his lips.

I accept that the wording of the new clause may be defective. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 5

HOUSING FOR THE MENTALLY HANDICAPPED

"In subsection 11 of section 1 of the Tenants' Rights, Etc. (Scotland) Act 1980 after paragraph (c) there shall be inserted the following paragraph—

"(d) where a dwelling house is one of a group all or a significant proportion of which have been provided for letting to mentally-handicapped persons ".—[Mr Millan.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Millan: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following: amendment No. 3, in clause 1, page 1, line 9 at end insert,

'except that section 1(1) of the 1980 Act shall not apply to property owned by the housing associations in paragraph (e) which have been provided to meet special needs.'.

Government amendments No. 13, 15 and 16.

Mr. Millan: The effect of the new clause would be to exclude from the right-to-buy provisions of the Tenants' Rights, Etc. (Scotland) Act 1980 housing specifically provided for the mentally handicapped. I tabled the new clause before the Government had tabled their amendments Nos. 13, 15 and 16. On the matter of the mentally handicapped my new clause goes wider than the Government amendments.

The problem of housing for the mentally handicapped has been drawn to my attention and, I am sure, to the attention of other hon. Members, by the Key housing association which happens to have an extremely fine development, partly hostel and partly ordinary dwelling-house accommodation, in my constituency. Therefore, I know its work and I admire the work that it has done and continues to do. It has been concerned, as are other housing associations, at the effects of the Bill which, as originally drafted, would have imposed the right-to-buy provisions on housing associations as a whole, without qualification. I need not go into the argument for that, except to say that the Opposition are opposed to the extension to the housing associations of the right-to-buy provisions. There was a perfectly adequate voluntary code operating before the Bill was introduced.

I do not want to go into the more general arguments, I want to deal specifically with housing for the mentally handicapped, which, without special provision in the Bill, would not be excluded under the normal provisions of the Tenants' Rights, Etc. (Scotland) Act 1980. As I understand it, the provision in section 1(11)(c) deals with housing which has special facilities designed or adapted for the needs of elderly or disabled persons.

The Key housing association, in relation to its provision for the mentally handicapped, says that its objective is to provide such people with care and support appropriate to their needs to enable them to live in the community in a home which is as normal as possible without any specially designed features such as warden call systems or other adaptations. In a sense, it is quite different from providing normal sheltered accommodation for, for example, very elderly where there are usually adaptations, or at least the provision of warden accommodation. Such adaptations are not necessary in some cases when one is providing housing for the mentally handicapped. It is part of the policy of the Key housing association not to provide special facilities but to try to make the accommodation as normal as possible, although it might be part of a complex which also includes hostel accommodation. As the Bill was originally drafted such accommodation would not have been excluded from the right to buy.

I am aware that since I tabled my new clause the Government have tabled their own amendments, Nos. 13, 15 and 16. Although we naturally welcome any concessions by the Government in respect of housing associations, the amendments do not fully reach the point which is dealt with in my new clause. The substantive Government amendment is No. 16 and, as far as I can see —I hope that the Minister will explain it clearly— the amendment deals with two separate issues. I am not fortunate enough to have been a member of the Committee and I must confess that I have not read the appropriate pieces on the matter, but I know that Government amendment No. 16 is in response to criticism made by the housing associations and by my hon. Friends and others in Committee.

As far as I can see, the first part of amendment No. 16, which adds a paragraph (f) to section 1(11) of the Tenants' Rights, Etc. (Scotland) Act 1980, deals with the definition of charities and charitable housing associations. Although I would welcome an additional provision covering housing associations, I think that this measure is expressed in unnecessarily restrictive terms. Paragraph (f)(i) of Government amendment No. 16 refers to claims for exemption from tax

"in respect of all periods from 3 October 1980".

I believe that this means that no new charitable association will be able to operate under these terms. That is ludicrous, grossly unfair and unjust. The Government have conceded a point with respect to charity-based housing associations. I see no earthly reason why the provision should be restricted in that way. I hope that that restriction will be removed before the Bill reaches the statute book.

Paragraph (g) of Government amendment No. 16 deals specifically with those suffering mental handicap. Will the Under-Secretary of State confirm that the reference to "mental disorder" includes mental handicap as well as mental illness? I assume that it does. Paragraph (g) completely unnecessarily links the concession, which deals not only with mental disorder but ex-prisoners and certain other categories, to housing association landlords. I understand that the words

"a common landlord, being a landlord so mentioned"— in the previous paragraphs — link paragraph (g) to charity-based housing associations. That is ludicrous.

If there is a case, as the Government have acknowledged there is, for saying that certain categories —in which at least half the houses are let to persons suffering mental disorder, mental handicap or mental illness, to persons released from prison or to young persons who have left the care of a local authority— should be excluded from the right-to-buy provisions of the Tenants' Rights, Etc. (Scotland) Act 1980, it matters not one bit whether the houses concerned are provided by a charity-based housing association, another housing association or a local authority. It is the nature of the housing provision that is important. It is therefore unnecessary and wrong for paragraph (g) as I read it—I should be delighted to be told that I am misreading it— to be linked with paragraph (f), which deals with a small category of charity-based housing associations.

We have agreed on the principle that housing for the mentally handicapped should be excluded from the right-to-buy provisions. That exclusion should apply across the board to local authorities that decide to build houses of this type. To be fair, I am not aware that local authorities have provided such housing, but that is a deficiency. It is not an argument for not providing proper provisions in the Bill.

The same principle must apply to the other categories covered in paragraph (g), which includes "persons who have been released from prison"

and

"young persons who have left the care of a local authority".

Why should not a local authority provide for those categories? If it does, the argument for excluding those dwelling houses from the right-to-buy provisions is as valid as it is with respect to housing associations.

Paragraph (g) imposes another restriction. It states that the group of dwelling houses is not to exceed 14. I am not sure where the figure of 14 originated, unless it was to provide for existing developments known to the Government. I see no reason why that restriction should be included in the amendment.

The Government have acknowledged that the Bill is defective as originally drafted. They have acknowledged that there is a strong case for making further exemptions in the right-to-buy provisions. New clause 5 provides that in the case of mental handicap the exemption should be wider than that provided by the Government in Government amendment No. 16. Although new clause 5 does not mention the other categories, I believe that the argument is as valid for the other categories of discharged prisoners and young persons leaving the care of a local authority. I believe that, if the Under-Secretary of State will accept the principle of new clause 5, the Bill will have to be further amended to take account of these other categories.

Mr. Ancram: It might be helpful if I speak at this stage because most of the amendments linked with new clause 5 are Government amendments. I think it is clear from the speech of the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) that it would be helpful if I were to explain the meaning of the rather legal terminology in the amendments.

New clause 5 seeks to exempt from the right-to-buy provisions certain houses provided to meet special needs. As the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) will recall, we discussed this matter at some length in Committee. We have brought forward our own proposals in Government amendment No. 16. New clause 5 is more limited—I think that the right hon. Member for Govan appreciated this point—in scope than the amendments we have tabled because it relates only to people suffering from mental handicap. Other categories are included in the Government amendments.

I can confirm that the term "mental disorder" covers mental handicap. Section 1(2) of the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984 defines mental disorder as meaning "mental illness or mental handicap however caused or manifested."

It is clear from our consultation with housing associations that there are other types of special needs which are provided for in integrated schemes. They include persons suffering from addiction to alcohol or other drugs, persons who have been recently released from prison and young persons who are leaving care.

In another sense—this touches on something that the right hon. Member for Govan said—new clause 5 goes wider than the Government believe necessary or appropriate. It would, as the right hon. Gentleman said, apply to all landlords, not just housing associations.

Mr. Maxton: Why?

Mr. Ancram: I shall explain that. The right hon. Member for Govan implied that the landlord referred to in the amendment was just a charitable housing association under the new definition. I am informed that the provision covers housing associations in general.

Mr. Millan: It is not clear in paragraph (g) what "a landlord so mentioned" is. There are references to a landlord in paragraph (f), but I am not clear whether it is always the same landlord. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would clarify that point.

Mr. Ancram: It was my understanding on my reading of the amendments when they were drafted and according to my instructions that the amendments covered housing associations generally.

Dame Judith Hart: And local authorities?

Mr. Ancram: Not local authorities. That is the point I have just made. The amendments cover housing associations. I shall check that, because it is important that the drafting should be technically correct. That is certainly my understanding. I realise that other landlords are involved in the original legislation but I am not aware that other landlords have integrated schemes of the type which we are trying to preserve. It is true that social work authorities let houses to the mentally handicapped. I understand that in general such houses tend to be leased from the relevant district council. Because the regional council is not the proprietor, the tenants do not have a right to buy. A further objection is that new clause 5 seeks to exempt all houses let to the mentally handicapped, irrespective of whether any social work service is provided in connection with them.

Amendment No. 3 seeks to provide that the right to buy shall not apply to property owned by housing associations which has been provided to meet special needs. Again I have to say that this amendment is much wider than is necessary or acceptable. A practical drawback is that the phrase "special need" is not defined. We have to ask who is to decide that a house has been provided to meet special needs. Is it to be the landlord? If that were the case, would not this give housing associations a very wide scope to deny to tenants the right to buy their homes?

As I explained in Committee, I believe that the existing provisions of the Tenants' Rights, Etc. (Scotland) Act 1980 do all that is necessary and justified to safeguard special needs houses for the elderly and the disabled. In my view, these provisions have worked well for local authorities where they have been applied since 1980, and they will be extended to housing associations when, by this legislation, their tenants are given the right to buy.

I did accept, however, that there was one type of scheme which was not covered by the present provisions and which merited further consideration. These are integrated schemes, where mainstream housing is linked with appropriate support services, with the aim of providing care and support in the community for groups such as ex-offenders and the mentally handicapped. The idea is that selected tenants, who act as what are called

"caring neighbours", should be allocated ordinary general needs houses, but in close proximity to tenants who require special support.

In these circumstances, the houses clearly are not physically different from ordinary houses and the tenants would ordinarily have the right to buy. We are therefore bringing forward an amendment — it is the first sub-paragraph (g) of amendment No. 16—for such schemes to be exempted from the right to buy. The amendment has been drafted following consultation with a number of housing associations which have schemes of this type. In order to prevent abuse by going too wide, we are placing a ceiling of 14 houses as the maximum number which may be included in any one scheme, and we are providing that at least half must be let to people who fall into the special needs categories that we have listed.

These criteria are common to the vast majority of schemes which we have discussed. We are limiting the exemption to the categories of special need that we know are presently catered for in such schemes. However, we are taking a power—the new subsection (11A) that is provided for later in the same amendment — to add further categories to the list by order. This recognises that such schemes may develop into new areas of provision which we cannot foresee at present, and it will permit us to take account of such developments, as seems necessary and appropriate.

I hope that the House will accept that this is a significant concession designed to meet the concerns felt in Committee and the views expressed to us by housing associations and other interested bodies. The amendment recognises a type of development which is unique to housing associations and which is also, I understand, peculiarly Scottish.

Charitable housing associations are also dealt with in the amendments. The Bill as currently drafted provides exemption from the right to buy for those housing associations which are registered with the Charity Commissioners under the Charities Act 1960. There are perhaps three or four English associations that are registered under that Act which also operate in Scotland. These associations already enjoy exemption from the right to buy in England and it was clearly necessary to afford them the same exemption in Scotland.

The question of charitable status for housing associations registered in Scotland is a rather different issue, since the Charities Act does not extend to Scotland. In appropriate circumstances, Scottish associations are able to adopt charitable rules and to apply to the Inland Revenue for charitable status for tax purposes under section 360 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970.

The question of exemption from the right to buy for Scottish associations with charitable status for tax purposes was raised at Second Reading and was debated at length in Committee. Representations were made to me that if these associations sold houses at a discount they would lose their charitable status, with potentially serious consequences for their viability. I agreed in Committee to take the question away and look at it again. In particular, I recognised that there were a number of associations which had enjoyed such status from an early date and which had developed their everyday functions in ways that properly utilised the tax benefits to support particular types of activity. On the other hand, an overall exemption for Scottish associations with charitable tax status would effectively have denied to a substantial number of tenants of general needs housing the right to buy the houses in which they live.

I was not persuaded that the preservation of an association's tax status should automatically take precedence over the rights of its tenants to buy their homes. This gave rise to the problem of identifying a definition which struck the correct balance between the rights of the individual tenant and those of the association as a whole. I believe that the proposals that I am now placing before the House strike an appropriate balance between these two competing objectives.

Under amendment No. 16, the new sub-paragraph (f), to be inserted in section 1(11) of the Tenants' Rights, Etc. (Scotland) Act 1980, would provide exemption from the right to buy for those Scottish housing associations which were registered with the housing corporation, under charitable rules, from the outset and which have had charitable status for tax purposes continuously since October 1980. It therefore affords exemption from the right to buy and thus protection for their charitable tax status to those associations which were set up initially on a charitable basis prior to the introduction of the right to buy for public sector tenants in Scotland and for housing association tenants in England and Wales and, indeed, the introduction of the voluntary code.

The tax status of an individual housing association based in Scotland is not at present a matter of public record, unlike charitable status in England. I cannot therefore be precise about the position of individual associations in relation to the new definition. It seems likely, however, that the extended definition will lead to about 30 to 35 individual associations with a total stock in the region of 12,000 houses being excluded entirely from the right to buy. In terms of housing stock, this represents a not insignificant proportion of the Scottish total of about 39,000 units.

Because of the uncertainty concerning tax status I do not wish to quote individual associations, but we believe that the definition now proposed will cover the major special needs associations and many of those with a mixture of special needs and general needs stock. These, we believe, include the major recipients—this point was raised in Committee — of the pre-1974 Shelter funds which was a matter of importance not only to Opposition Members but also to me, given my interest in Shelter at that time.

Mr. Maxton: I should be grateful if the Minister would say why pre-October 1980 is so important.

Mr. Ancram: I thought that I had made it clear that the Tenants' Rights, Etc. (Scotland) Act 1980 became operative on 3 October 1980. That was the date when the statutory right to buy was created. I understand, although I would not be categoric about it, that it was about that time also that the voluntary code was agreed with the housing associations. I am dating it back to the time when the right to buy became available not only for public sector tenants in Scotland but also for housing association tenants south of the border.

There are a number of other parts of the amendment which will insert three new provisions into section 1 of the Tenants' Rights, Etc., (Scotland) Act, two of which are directly concerned with the operation of a new exemption for Scottish associations with charitable tax status. The new subsection (11B) will permit the Inland Revenue to disclose necessary taxation information to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and to the housing corporation in order to determine the status of an individual association in relation to the exemption from the right to buy. The new subsection (11C) requires the housing corporation to record on the register of housing associations the identity of those associations which are exempt from the right to buy under these provisions and, to amend the entries subsequently if the position of an association changes. These two powers are required to ensure that the position of any individual association is properly determined and that, where appropriate, a record of its exemption from the right to buy is publicly available.

The other amendments relating to charitable status are more straightforward and I do not need to deal with them, unless hon. Members wish me to do so. With this group of amendments I have gone a significant way towards meeting the concern of the traditionally charitable Scottish housing associations while maintaining a proper balance between the rights of individual tenants and those of the associations. We have also honoured our commitment to look again at the position of certain special needs schemes.

In the light of this explanation I hope that the right hon. Member for Govan will withdraw his new clause and amendment No. 3.

I commend amendments Nos. 12, 15 and 16 to the House when they are called.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): I support the amendment moved by the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan). He spoke clearly and concisely, so it is not necessary for me to say much about it. No doubt he accepts that the wording is not as legally precise as the parliamentary draftsmen would demand, and would be happy if the intent of his amendment were accepted by the Government. I go along with that.

The Government have been extraordinarily slapdash and cavalier from the outset about the general problem of charities and about the difficulty of the difference between England and Scotland. The Minister looks dumbfounded, but I should have thought it reasonable to expect the Government to be better prepared before introducing legislation.

I have here a letter from the Minister dated 20 December 1985, in response to a letter from me complaining that on Second Reading he could not answer questions about charitable status put to him by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), myself and others. I shall leave out the "injured innocence" start to the letter and quote simply one paragraph:

"Although the powers of the Charity Commissioners do not extend to Scotland, I am aware that a few English registered Charities Act housing associations are operating here on a limited scale".

The Minister this evening was not sure whether there are three or four; I point out for his benefit that there are four. They are not all that limited. I do not think the British Legion could be regarded as operating on a limited scale. The letter continued:

"Because compulsory sales at a discount would be in conflict with Charities Act registration, tenants of these associations have been excluded from the Right to Buy. Tenants of such associations are already excluded in England and Wales, although otherwise eligible tenants have been given a right to equivalent assistance with the purchase of a different house on the open market. The Bill provides for the power to introduce a similar scheme in Scotland should it be required. In framing the legislation, I considered carefully the question of whether tenants of Scottish housing associations which are accepted by the Inland Revenue as being 'charitable for tax purposes' should also be exluded from the 'Right to buy'. On balance I decided they should not."

The original intention of the Government was to exclude Scottish-based charities. The Government amendment changes that drastically. I accept what the Minister said. It represents a significant retreat because of the justifiable pressure that was put on him. However, the amendment includes only Scottish-based charities registered by the income tax authorities before 1980. What does that mean? It means that no new Scottish-based charity will be possible in housing, even in the very narrow area of the mentally handicapped that was quoted by the right hon. Member for Govan. Such charities cannot get charitable status, as I read the amendment. That is inconsistent and unfair. I do not think that that is a good basis on which the Government should proceed.

What happened to the proposal for equivalent assistance? The letter said:

"The Bill provides for the power to introduce a similar scheme in Scotland".

Perhaps we will get that in another place.

Mr. Ancram: That power is already in the Bill. I did not go into detail on all the elements of the amendments but the hon. Gentleman will find that some of the amendments in the group being discussed relate to it.

Sir Russell Johnston: Is the Minister saying that that power will be exercised?

Mr. Ancram: I remind the hon. Gentleman of what I said in Committee. Obviously we shall wish to set up a scheme. At this stage it is our intention to consider the English scheme as a basis but we will want to consider what scheme would be best. The power to do so is in the Bill and the intention to provide something along those lines has been stated.

Sir Russell Johnston: I am grateful for that. The Minister has made a significant retreat. I think he said that approximately 12,000 houses will be covered. That is welcome, lest the Minister says that I am being ungenerous.

I do not understand how the Minister could have the gall to declare at the Dispatch Box that a fair balance—I think that was the expression he used—is equivalent to an inconsistent proposal. The proposal is inconsistent. Legislation should be consistent as far as possible and should not create new instances of unfairness at the same time as it removes others.

Dame Judith Hart: I echo what has just been said. I was not on the Committee but because of representations from Age Concern and Shelter and because of my interest in one housing association I have read the considerable proceedings in Committee. If I were in the Minister's position, as I once was, I would be ashamed if I had introduced a Bill simply on the proposition of the right to buy without understanding the problems that would arise when the principle was examined in relation to housing associations. I would be ashamed if I had to make such a retreat, although it is very welcome.

The Minister should have foreseen what would happen. Any Minister responsible for such a Bill should have asked the officials who helped to draft it, "What is the snag about this clause?", and, "What is the problem about that clause?" He should not have had to concede now, although I welcome the concession.

I welcome subsection (11A) in amendment No. 16, which will give the Minister power to amend by order and to add to the list of classes of special need. That is wise and sensible. The Bill is limited to people who are mentally handicapped, people released from prison or other institutions and young persons who have been in the care of a local authority. Those three limited groups have been brought to the Minister's attention during the consideration of the Bill. In the course of time he may want to extend the provision to other groups which may come to his attention.

On the first part of amendment No. 16 about charities, as the Minister knows, I had tabled an amendment about the New Lanark association. I understand that that amendment could not be called. The Minister has visited New Lanark and is aware of the background to the problem, but for the benefit of those who have not visited it recently, may I explain that New Lanark is a special case in a category of its own? It was founded in the early sixties to conserve and restore the old Robert Owen village which is the best example of industrial architecture of its period anywhere in Britain. A remarkable job has been done so far. Therefore, one is worried. The New Lanark association has been in correspondence with the Minister, as have I. I hope that amendment No. 16 covers the case but I cannot be sure. Perhaps the Minister can help me.

6.30 pm

Tax relief is not the only consideration. New Lanark has houses that are owner-occupied and others that are rented and if it is to be able to undertake a conservation and modernisation exercise it must be able to retain planning control that takes into account a balance between owner-occupation and renting. That is essential for planning purposes as well as for finance.

The Minister will appreciate that it would be absurd if any problems were put in the way of New Lanark's redevelopment. He will be aware that money has been provided to New Lanark through the Historic Buildings Council for Scotland, the Ancient Monuments Society, the Scottish Tourist Board, the Countryside Commission, the Scottish Development Agency and the Manpower Services Commission. Many forms of help have come from central Government as well as from local government. It would be extremely unwise to place any barriers in the way of the remaining development of New Lanark and I am sure that the Minister would not wish to do so.

Paragraph (f)(ii) reads:

"registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act 1985".

The new New Lanark association was set up on 6 December 1963—I understand that the documents bear my own signature—under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act 1893. Model H7 1962 provides charitable status. I must confess that since the Government's amendments were tabled — we have had a weekend between their appearance and this debate—I have not had time to read the 1965 Act to ascertain the extent to which it consolidates the 1893 Act and whether there is any relevant difference between the two measures. I need to know — this is crucial, and if the Minister finds himself in any difficulty I hope that he will table a small amendment in another place—that the reference to the Industrial and Provident Societies Act 1965 will include provision under the 1893 Act. That is something which the New Lanark association needs to know as well.

Everything may be all right and the 1965 Act may have wrapped up everything in the 1893 Act, but we need to know whether that is the position. The Minister will appreciate that it is a considerable exercise to read through consolidation Acts, and even if one does it is not always possible to be sure that one's understanding of their effect is correct. I feel that the Minister has better facilities at his disposal to undertake that exercise than I do, or even the Library.

If all is well, I shall be happy, and so will the New Lanark association. The association was set up as a charitable institution and it is a registered friendly society. We need to know whether the amendment would cover the way in which it was registered under the industrial and provident societies legislation and the moment when that took place. That having been said, I would welcome the Minister's reassurance. If he is in any doubt, I should welcome also an assurance that an amendment will be introduced in another place — for example, if it is necessary to amend the wording to cover the issue which I have raised.

Mr. Maxton: I agree very much with what my right hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Dame J. Hart) has said. I have visited New Lanark recently with my right hon. Friend and I have great admiration for the work that has been done there. I used to take students to New Lanark in a previous incarnation for them to see the industrial village as part of a historical exercise. I am sure that the Minister, as a historian, would welcome the work that has been done in New Lanark. The Minister should at least respond to my right hon. Friend in writing after he has investigated the matter which she has brought to his attention. I think that the New Lanark association will be exempt from the right to buy.

Dame Judith Hart: We must be sure.

Mr. Maxton: I cannot give a guarantee to my right hon. Friend. I am not the Minister and it is for him to give guarantees.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) will excuse me if I deal first with Government amendment No. 16. I am a generous-hearted man, and I, like Christ, will welcome one sinner who is converted, even though in this instance he had to be pushed extremely hard before conversion. However, I welcome the concessions that the Minister has made for charities and special-need housing in relation to housing associations. Perhaps the amendment goes further than the Minister conceded when he replied to a debate on these issues in Committee.

Government concessions are always to be welcomed, but, as the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) and others have said, it should not have been necessary for the Government to introduce a major amendment at this stage to the most contentious part of the Bill that deals with the right to buy and housing associations. It has been proved beyond doubt that the Minister's argument that he consulted the housing associations was wrong and that the associations' contention that they were never consulted about the Government's proposals was entirely right. If the Government had consulted the associations before introducing the Bill, they would not have found themselves in a mess and they would not have found it necessary to table such a major amendment.

The Scottish Federation of Housing Associations wrote to several hon. Members, including myself, to the effect, "At long last the Government have been prepared to consult us." It claimed that that was the first occasion that they had done so since the provisions in the Bill were proposed. We welcome that consultation and we welcome the Government's amendments.

The Opposition's view is that the Minister could have gone the whole way on charity status. Unfortunately, he has not removed all the anomalies. There are anomalies between charitable status and registration of housing associations in England and Wales and the equivalent status and registration in Scotland. Total exemption would not have solved the problems.

In England and Wales there are 480,000 houses owned by housing associations, of which 380,000 are exempt. The associations which own them are exempt from the right to buy because they are registered charities. Even if there were total exemption of housing associations in Scotland that have charitable status and work under the charity rules, the same proportion of houses in Scotland would not be exempt.

If a new housing association were established in England or Wales tomorrow and it registered as a charity and was accepted as such by the commission under its rules, all the tenants of the houses which it purchased, repaired, renovated or built would be excluded from the right to buy. That would not be the position in Scotland. If a new housing association were established tomorrow in Scotland and it applied to the Inland Revenue for charitable status and undertook exactly the same work as housing associations set up prior to 1980, it would not be exempt from the right-to-buy provisions. Exemption will not extend to several housing associations which have been set up since 1980 and now operate under the charity rules.

The Tenants' Rights, Etc. Act (Scotland) 1980, which came into force on 3 October of that year, specifically excluded housing associations from the right to buy, but that has no relevance to the argument for exemption. The generous and logical thing to do is to say that housing associations in Scotland that can prove to the Inland Revenue that they act as charities should enjoy the same privileges as charitable associations in England and Wales. Perhaps I am being ungenerous, but I believe that the reason for the Government amendments, as for the Bill, is the desire to preserve the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West Society. The Link housing association has only recently been given charitable recognition. If the Minister did the logical thing, tenants of the association would no longer have the right to buy. I see no other reason for the cut-off date.

Why has the Minister not incorporated the ability to amend in paragraph (f) of amendment No. 16, as he has in the rest of the Bill? He might like to say that the enactment of the Bill would be a more suitable date from which to recognise housing associations as charities. The 1980 date cannot be changed except by primary legislation. I hope that the Minister in another place will reconsider.

As for new clause 5, my right hon. Friend the Member for Govan is quite right. He always is. I had my arguments with him when he was Secretary of State and I had a different job. I see no reason why the Government's generosity to housing associations cannot be extended to local authorities, as they provide special needs housing which goes much further than homes for the physically handicapped and the elderly.

I am sure that my right hon. Friend would be prepared to withdraw his new clause if paragraph (g) could be operated by local authorities, the Housing Corporation and the Scottish Special Housing Association. That would demonstrate the Government's willingness to admit that there is a problem with special needs housing. If the Minister is not prepared to do that, I shall happily support my right hon. Friend's new clause.

Mr. Ancram: I am quite surprised by the attitude of some hon. Members, especially of the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston). He seems to consider it better for the Government to go through Committee stage without making any concessions than to listen to the arguments, assess their value and, if necessary, make concessions. I appreciate that Labour Members consider the former to be the correct behaviour, but I always thought that the Liberal party described itself as a thinking party, which likes to chew things over. I should have thought that the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber would at least have welcomed the process as a result of which the amendments have been presented. I suspect that his problem is that he is getting close to having to vote for a practical example of the right to buy, and possibly even in its favour. He has scrupulously avoided doing that so far.

Sir Russell Johnston: I was merely saying that I admire the fact that the Minister has redeemed himself but that he had not shown adequate repentance.

6.45 pm

Mr. Ancram: I have listened to the arguments and I believe that my response is sustainable and justifiable.

I explained earlier why we cannot extend the integrated scheme in principle to local authorities. I do not believe that it is required.

Mr. Maxton: If local authorities say that the right should be applied to them and can illustrate a need, will the Minister consider the matter?

Mr. Ancram: I have made my stance clear. I identified something that is peculiar to housing associations and peculiar to Scotland. The concession that has been made is useful and valuable.

The right hon. Member for Clydesdale (Dame J. Hart) referred to New Lanark. She will recall that I said that I did not want to deal with any individual association. To the best of our knowledge, New Lanark will benefit from the exemption, but uncertainty remains, for the reason that I gave earlier. Information on the tax status of housing associations is simply not available to the Government. Exemption depends on that to a large extent. I shall look into the right hon. Lady's other question.

Dame Judith Hart: I appreciate that the Minister did not want to refer to any specific housing association. I am not asking for an undertaking about New Lanark's tax status, but if the 1965 Act does not consolidate the 1893 Act, will the Minister undertake to remedy that in another place?

Mr. Ancram: Contrary to what the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) said, I did not consider the issue in respect of individual associations. I have come to what I believe is a balanced view and I stand by the criteria that I have presented to the House.

Dame Judith Hart: I am sorry to press the Minister, but it would be no use if when he examines individual housing associations and wants to take account of the arguments concerning New Lanark, he found that he had precluded himself from covering New Lanark because the Bill was ill drafted. I am merely asking him to ensure that that does not happen.

Mr. Ancram: I appreciate the right hon. Lady's concern, but I have said what I have to say about the amendment. I shall look into the matter that she raised, and if I find anything that contradicts what I have led her to believe, I shall write to her.

The amendments are a sound basis because they meet the major problems which were raised in Committee and by the housing associations. I hope that the right hon. Member for Govan will feel on consideration, and in the light of the amendments which the Government have tabled, that his new clause is in one respect too narrow and in another too broad and that he can withdraw it. If he cannot, I shall have to ask my hon. Friends to reject it.

Mr. Millan I do not feel disposed to withdraw my new clause. I shall vote for the Government's amendments even though they are defective.

We seem to have got into a tangle on charities, first because the Government decided for purely dogmatic reasons to set aside the voluntary code for sales which they have negotiated with housing associations in an attempt to steamroller them into sales in which they do not which to engage. Secondly, we would not have got into this tangle, as the hon. Member for Inverness (Sir R. Johnson) said, if the Government had decided to make the same provisions in Scotland as apply in England and Wales. We have got ourselves into unnecessary tangles largely because of the way the Government have behaved and against the background of not having charities legislation in Scotland similar to that which applies in England and Wales.

That having been said, we have had no convincing argument from the Minister as to why there should be any restriction from 3 October 1980 or any other date. I very much hope that the other place will take this completely unnecessary and unfair restriction out of the Bill.

With regard to the drafting point, from my understanding of paragraph (g) and after what the Minister says it is intended to mean, I hope that he will look again at the drafting. Indeed, the drafting of the whole of section 1(11) of the Tenants' Rights, etc. (Scotland) Act 1980, after the amendments made to it and further amendments which will be made, is not clear. The landlords so mentioned are not just the landlords mentioned in paragraph (d), which is housing associations. If the Minister will examine section 1(11) of the 1980 Act, he will note that it mentions all sorts of other landlords—the local authorities, the new towns, the housing co-operatives and the Scottish Special Housing Association—so the drafting is not adequate. Paragraph (g) could be very restrictive in applying only to charity-based housing associations or, taking the widest interpretation, it could include local authorities in any case because they are already mentioned in section 1(11) of the 1980 Act. If the Government want to include all housing associations, I hope that the Minister will make sure that that is what is done.

On the substantive point, the Minister gave no argument for excluding local authorities and, for that matter, new towns and the SSHA from the concession contained in paragraph (g). I acknowledged in moving the new clause that I had tabled it before the Government amendments were tabled. It was specifically directed to the needs of the mentally handicapped, but the principle would apply to ex-prisoners, youngsters who have come out of care of local authorities and any other category which may subsequently be included in the Bill by the order-making powers provided for in amendment No. 16. There is no reason in principle why the concessions made for housing associations should not also apply to all these other bodies.

Therefore, I wish to press the new clause to a Division.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sorry to have to raise this point of order, but a delegation of trade union members and workers from Leyland car plants throughout Britain has been to the House today and for the second time this week a green card which was filled in in the Lobby has taken an hour and 10 minutes to reach me while I have been in Committee. As a result, my constituents have not been able to see me and have returned to my constituency.

This is the second time this week that this has happened. I am also informed by hon. Friends that the same has happened to them on previous occasions. I wish to make it clear that I am in no way criticising any attendant but I have been informed by an attendant that a shortage of manpower is now leading to a delay in green cards being communicated to hon. Members.

Will you look into this, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as a matter of urgency because it is an embarrassment to Members and it makes it difficult for us to fulfil our public functions? Thank you.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I shall see to it that the matter is looked into right away.

New Clause 6

RESTRICTIONS ON SALE OF SPECIAL NEED HOUSES

'Regional authorities, or where appropriate joint boards, may appeal to the Secretary of State against the sale of a particular house on the grounds that it has to be retained in order to allow them to effectively fulfil their statutory functions.'. — [Sir Russell Johnston.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Sir Russell Johnston: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 25, in page 28, line 20, Schedule 1, leave out sub-paragraph 9.

Sir Russell Johnston: This is a limited but important proposal. Hon. Members, particularly those who served on the Committee, will recall that, from the moment of the publication of the Bill, education authorities with areas of sparse population and joint fire authorities with similar difficulties have expressed great concern that the legislation could deprive them of the limited housing stock that they retain for the performance of their statutory functions.

In Committee on 16 January amendments were moved by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) who sought to make provision for regions and joint boards similar to that which was made for the island councils in 1984. The Minister rejected them but gave only three arguments for doing so. First, he said:

"I cannot accept . . . that the problems of finding alternative accommodation which can occur in the remote islands arise to the same degree on the mainland, even in the rural areas. Moreover, the present amendments go well beyond the rural areas. They would give regional councils a wide power to refuse applications to buy any education authority house."

The fact was that the Minister's mind was on Strathclyde which he felt, rightly or wrongly, had not implemented the voluntary code.

At this stage is is worth noting, even in retrospect, the four criteria of which, according to section 3B of the Tenants' Rights, Etc. (Scotland) Act 1980, island councils have to take note. They are, first, that it is an education authority house required for the performance of that function; secondly, that it is required immediately, or, thirdly, that it will be required within a perceptible time; fourthly, and most important or most confining of all, that there is no way in which the authorities can obtain a similar house.

It would be interesting if the Minister could tell us whether, as a consequence of that change, there have been any Government refusals of the islands' requests of this nature. My new clause seeks to apply the fourth criterion in such a way that the onus clearly rests on the regional authority or joint board to demonstrate a requirement. Therefore, I should think that the clause would be acceptable to the Government because they retain the final say.

The second ministerial argument about such a system being unnecessary is that an authority could make occupancy of a house a condition of employment. In Committee the Minister said:

"Schedule 1 of the 1980 Act provides that where a teacher, or any other employee, is required to occupy a particular house as a condition of his employment, he shall not have security of tenure or the right to buy."

That was nice and simple, but unfortunately the hon. Member for Cathcart rebutted this simply and comprehensively when he said:

"I do not believe that they could get it"— that is, agreement of this type—

"included in a teacher's contract of employment. I doubt that many individual teachers would accept that as a contract nor would the negotiating body, when it meets, agree to such a change in teachers' contracts on a general basis."

An amusing point—perhaps it says something of the nature of these debates—is that the Minister's statement came after the hon. Gentleman's rebuttal. The Minister never tried to deal with what the hon. Member said. The best he could say, rather sadly, was, "I am disappointed."

It is not possible for regional authorities to get such an agreement from teachers, and in the case of fire officers the position is worse still. In January 1985 the joint negotiating body specifically forbade a firemaster to require that an officer occupy a particular house. I and the hon. Member for Cathcart do not believe that, in the case of teachers, the negotiating body would accede to such a proposal and, in the case of firemasters, they had discussions and rejected it. Thus, in making this argument, the Minister is suggesting that regional authorities can protect their statutory interests by securing safeguards which it is beyond their ability to obtain. That applies to education and fire authorities alike.

The third ministerial argument is the curtilage argument. In Committee the Minister said:

"we are introducing a new provision to meet the special position of regional councils by introducing a new category which provides that a tenant shall not have security or right to buy if his house comes within the curtilage of another building. This recognises, for example, the situation where a teacher's house might form part of or be attached to a school building, or a janitor's house coming within the school grounds. Both these instances were mentioned by the hon. Member for Cathcart and the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber may recognise them in areas such as his constituency." —[Official Report, First Scottish Standing Committee, 16 January 1986; c. 193-94.]

I recognise that there are many such examples in rural areas where housing is in short supply. However, in many rural areas neither education authority houses nor fire houses are within the curtilage of the school or the fire station.

There are many examples which are different. I think, for example, of education in Caithness and Sutherland and, in the case of fire, there are the examples of Kirkwall, Invergordon and Fort William.

I hold the view that the amendments accepted by the Government in 1984 in respect of the island councils and the amendments proposed by the hon. Member for Cathcart for regions and joint boards would have been the sensible way ahead. Indeed, one could argue that, since the island authorities are also housing authorities, they could meet education and fire requirements more easily from general needs than regional authorities which are not housing authorities.

I accept that the Government will not yield on this point. However, my new clause — it could be reintroduced in appropriate form in another place — would give authorities such as Grampian, Highlands and the Borders which have operated, as the Minister would agree, the voluntary code fairly an opportunity to make their case genuinely to the Government. The onus would be on the authorities to do so and the Government in the end would decide. Equally, if the Minister's contention is that Strathclyde was resisting a proper application of the voluntary code, the new clause would put that authority in the same position of having to make a case as the other local authorities would have to do.

This is a reasonable proposal on a matter which has caused, and which continues to cause, great concern among the rural education and fire authorities. I hope that the Minister will respond positively. If he is not able to give an absolute nay or yea tonight, I shall be perfectly happy if he says that the issue will be studied in another place. I hope that, in listening to the debate, he will recognise that the argument I have advanced is sound and sensible and is supported by reasonable parties.

Mr. Kennedy: I shall speak briefly in support of the new clause which my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) has moved. I underline the sentiment that he expressed at the end of his speech, that even if this formulation of the clause is not acceptable to the Government, they should look seriously at the issue and the principles which it raises, and the difficulties which this legislation, if not altered from its present form, will cause in areas such as the Highland region. Perhaps the Government could use the opportunity in another place to deal with some of the difficulties which are expected to arise.

We have all received representations, especially from teachers in the Highland region. Teachers want the right to buy their own homes—that is understandable—and any sensible person would support that. The Minister acknowledged the difficulty in a letter to me dated 31 January 1986. He said—arguing, first, for the general policy of the right to buy, which he knows I support:

"I accept however that there may need to be restrictions on the sale of houses in rural areas."

The Minister is correct in that.

The new clause is not about every designated local authority house; it is about those occasions in remote rural communities, particularly on the west coast, but also elsewhere in the highlands, where the loss of the teacher's house would militate against the replacement of a teacher where necessary. I am sure the Minister will appreciate that that is a genuine concern in smaller communities. It is something about which we have received many representations.

The chairman of Gairloch high school council in my constituency wrote to me a month ago expressing great concern on behalf of the council at the proposal. He made the following telling points:

"1. Housing both private and public are very scarce and in great demand.

2. The few houses that become available for sale are therefore expensive and often well beyond the means of many young teachers."

The Scottish Office has never sought to deny, and we would never deny, that teachers are not well paid, and there is no doubt that they cannot afford large mortgages, particularly where housing is scarce, prices are high and accordingly the market is inflated.

Another difficulty faced in the highlands all too often, as the chairman of the Gairloch high school council points out, is that land is not as available as we would like it to be. There are many complicated reasons for that, but I shall not go into them now. That backdrop shows the legitimate problem. The chairman goes on to make the case, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber, that in many cases in rural communities the school house is an integral part of the school building. The Government appear to be aware of this problem, as there have been specific, and welcome, references to it.

This is not a widespread issue. It does not have to be applied as an absolute principle that the teachers who happen to live in the Highland region, for example, should not have the right to buy their own home. That is not what we are asking. The way in which my hon. Friend both phrased the new clause and argued for it shows how sensible it would be if the local authority—in this case the Highland regional council—when it felt that the proper exercise of its statutory function was being called into doubt by the provisions of the legislation, had the right to make a direct appeal to the Scottish Office. The counter-arguments could then be heard, and the Scottish Office and the Government would not be surrendering the final right of decision, because explicit in the new clause is an acceptance that they would have to make that judgment.

Mr. Maxton: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that island authorities have exactly that right on teachers' houses. The Government have introduced an amendment to the 1980 Act which established that right, because they saw the anomalies that they were creating. In Committee I moved an amendment that would have allowed the system to operate in all regional authorities, and I do not understand even now why the Minister would not accept it.

Mr. Kennedy: The hon. Gentleman puts his point fairly and with great force. It is a common-sense solution to a problem which we can all see coming, and which those in the area identified as soon as the Bill was published. Therefore, I hope that, if not tonight, in the other place, the Government will take steps to act positively to clear up what will soon be a genuine problem.

[Mr. Kennedy]

As my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber said, there are also the problems of the Highlands and Islands fire board. I shall not repeat all of his points, with which I concur. The fire board owns five houses, in Kirkwall, Lerwick, Stornoway and Fort William and, my particular concern, in Invergordon.

A letter from the clerk to the board said:

"If the Board are required to sell these houses they would no longer be available for incoming Officers in the event that new appointments were necessary. It is anticipated that it would be extremely difficult to purchase suitable replacement housing, particularly in the Islands areas and in Fort William. Further, in the absence of available accommodation it would be difficult to attract applicants for the positions in question. The threat posed by the terms of the Bill as presently drafted to the operational needs of the Brigade is therefore regarded as a serious one which, I would suggest, merits consideration of possible amendment of the relevant terms of the Bill."

That puts the position fairly and sensibly, and underlines the purpose of the new clause.

We support the right of teachers, and all those in other categories, to own their homes. However, as the Minister would no doubt agree, any right in society has always to be tempered by a sense of responsibility to the wider public interest. There may be occasions when, in my two examples of teachers and fire brigade officers, the local authorities involved should have the right of appeal to the Scottish Office, so that ultimately the Secretary of state and his Ministers will decide. Our approach is wholly sensible, and I hope that the Minister can respond in the constructive fashion in which the new clause has been moved.

Mr. Ancram: The new clause provides that regional councils may appeal to the Secretary of State, presumably for permission to refuse to sell a particular house, where they feel that the house has to be retained so that they can effectively fulfil their statutory functions. The amendment appears to be defective, although I shall not labour that point. As the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) said, we discussed this matter in Committee. Therefore I am sure that the hon. Member will not be surprised to hear me say that I find the amendment misguided and unnecessary.

The Government fully accept that, in extending security of tenure and the right to buy to tenants of houses owned by regional councils, it is necessary to ensure that regional councils are able to retain those houses that they genuinely need to fulfil their statutory functions. However, it is better for the tenants and for the regional council landlords to provide for such houses to be excluded on the face of the legislation. This means that the tenants and their landlords will know clearly where they stand. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman appreciates the importance of that.

I say this in the belief that is possible to specify in the legislation those categories of houses that regional councils and other public authorities need to retain such properties. These are listed in schedule 1 to the Tenants' Rights, Etc. (Scotland) Act 1980. They include houses let to an employee of the landlord as a condition of his contract of employment and houses let temporarily pending development — for example, a region might need to acquire land to build a road.

The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber used the example of the teacher, already used by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) in Committee. I am sorry if I did not respond then, but I had many points to which I had to respond. However, schedule 1(2)(2) to the 1980 Act says that a contract of employment means a contract "whether express or implied". Therefore, the provision does not have to be written into the employee's contract for a house so to be exempt. The problem raised by the hon. Member for Cathcart is therefore resolved.

7.30 pm

Sir Russell Johnston: That is a new argument. Is the Minister saying that, even if a teacher does not consent to stay in a particular house as part of his contract of employment, such an undertaking may be imposed on him by the regional authority?

Mr. Ancram: That depends whether it is implicit in the work that the teacher does. The advice that I have is that the condition of residence in the house would not have to be written into an employee's contract for a house to be exempt under the Tenants' Rights, Etc. (Scotland) Act 1980.

Mr. Maxton: What would happen when a teacher from one school takes a school house attached to another school because at that point the teacher from the other school —say, a single-teacher school in a rural area—has no wish to have that house but the authority wishes to keep the house available to employ another teacher when the present teacher retires? I know that that is complicated but I know that such situations apply in rural areas.

Mr. Ancram: I am not quite sure that I followed all the parts of the hon. Gentleman's hypothesis and I would not therefore wish to give a categorical answer. However, I think that what I have said about the implicit nature which is allowed for under the 1980 Act—the problem which the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber raised—would not arise.

As a consequence of extending security of tenure and the right to buy to tenants in dwellings owned by regional councils, we felt that it was necessary to add two further categories to the list of excluded houses in schedule 1. These appear in the new paragraphs added to that schedule by paragraph 18 of schedule 1 to the Bill.

The lists include houses let to serving members of a police or fire authority. That is why I was a little surprised by the comments made by the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber, and the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy). I have not previously received representations about the difficulties that the hon. Gentlemen alleged over the position of rural fire service houses. We are proposing under the provision to exclude service houses. I stress that I have not received representations that this provision was deficient but I shall look into the point and write to the hon. Members for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber, and for Ross, Cromarty and Skye.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): I must tell the Minister that I have received representations from the Highlands and Islands fire brigade. The clerk of the brigade said, in terms, that the Bill does not contain adequate protection for the fire board and it does not appear that there are any grounds on which the board may resist the demands by an officer to purchase his house in locations where it is not possible to make available suitable replacement housing when the need arises. Is the Minister saying that that is wrong and that the schedule specifically deals with the problem?

Mr. Ancram: I understand from the way that the Bill has been drafted that houses let to serving members of the police or a fire authority would be exempt from the right to buy. Again, these representations have been made to hon. Members and unfortunately as far as I am aware, such representations have not been made to me. I will look into the matter and if the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland so wishes, I will add him to my correspondence list.

The provisions do all that is necessary to exclude from the right to buy those houses that regional authorities need to retain to fulfil their statutory functions. I know that the hon. Member for Cathcart, has not discussed amendment No. 25. The hon. Gentleman's amendment removes a provision which is a good one and one which, as far as I know, has been welcomed by COSLA. That is a useful provision and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not take me by surprise by pressing his amendment.

Sir Russell Johnston: Before we approach the question whether we vote, I should like to say a few words. The Minister appears to be saying that the new clause is unnecessary. However, it is a fact that education authorities — not just in the Highlands but throughout Scotland—are mindful that the new clause is necessary. I admit that I have not had representations from any fire authority other than the Highlands and Islands authority but, as my hon. Friends have said, the board is sure that the provision that the Minister has set out is not correct. I hope that the Minister will make an undertaking to look into the matter and I also hope that the Minister will examine the education aspect.

Mr. Ancram: I have dealt with the education matter. I believe that the case put forward by the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye, was not sustained in the light of the provisions in the Bill, and not only in this Bill but in previous legislation. I therefore rejected the hon. Gentleman's argument.

In connection with the fire houses, I said that while I thought that the Bill as it stood provided the protection for which the hon. Gentleman's constituents were looking, I had not received the representations that he had received. I said that I would examine those representations and would write to the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends once I had had a chance to do that. On that basis, I hope that the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber will withdraw the new clause.

Sir Russell Johnston: I should like to make one last point in respect of the education authorities. It is passing strange—no stronger than that—that the argument has been produced late in the day that somehow or other, even if teachers are not likely to agree to occupancy of a particular house being a condition of employment, in some way that is not clearly defined if that is implied by the regional authority, it becomes the case. That is a very unsatisfactory argument which has not appeared before, even when the Minister has been subjected to representations from local authorities. That has been discussed both on Second Reading and in Committee. That is very odd indeed.

However, as the Minister is willing to examine the matters again — I take it from that that there is an implication that should he find anything wrong he will introduce amending legislation in another place—I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 8

AMENDMENT OF HOUSING (HOMELESS PERSONS) ACT 1977

"In the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, in section 1(2), after paragraph (c) there shall be inserted —

"(d) it does not provide the ordinary facilities of a residence and it is inappropriate for his needs, or it is unreasonable for him to continue to live in it".

In section 4 there shall be inserted after subsection (6) —

"(7) Where a local authority has a duty under subsections (4) and (5) above to either secure that accommodation does not cease to be available or to secure that accommodation becomes available for the applicant 'accommodation' shall be defined as a separate dwelling house that shall conform to section 89 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1966 and section 14 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1974".'.—[Mr. Dewar.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): I beg to move, That the clause be read a second time.

This is an extremely important clause, and I regret that considerations of time means that we cannot have as full a debate on it as we might have liked. I am anxious that we should have the opportunity to sketch in the anxieties that are felt about certain judicial happenings in recent times in connection with the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977. We may have the opportunity of hearing the Minister give some reassurances about, or at least careful Government consideration of, the consequences of what has happened.

I am referring to the judgment of Lord Brightman in the interesting and recent case of Puhlhofer v. the London Borough of Hillingdon. That judgment was delivered on 6 February 1986 and is therefore hot off the judicial press. It may sound a long way from Scotland and the Housing (Scotland) Bill, but it is a House of Lords judgment and it interprets the term "accommodation" as used in the 1977 Act. It therefore has distinct and important consequences for local authorities in Scotland, and, more important, for homeless people or those who may become homeless in Scotland.

The Puhlhofer case can be described, in view of the facts, in a short compass. The couple had a complicated history, but the material fact is that when the courts started to consider their predicament they were asking for assistance under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977. At the time they were living in bed-and-breakfast accommodation. A husband, a wife and two young children were living in one room in a bed-and-breakfast establishment. That room contained a double and a single bed, a baby's cradle, a dressing table, a pram, and a sterilisation unit. All that had certain repercussions on their limited income from social security benefits.

When the family applied for homeless persons status, the London borough of Hillingdon told them that it had accommodation available for occupation, but that it did not need to offer help under the 1977 Act, because the family had accommodation. That is an unsatisfactory and reactionary view, considering the difficult circumstances in which the family were placed. Therefore, it was decided to take the matter to court to test the judgment by judicial review. Lord Brightman handed down his judgment on that case.

The case raised two questions. The first related to when someone is homeless, — that is, when a person has accommodation of a sufficient standard to allow a local authority to say that he is not homeless. The second question related to what accommodation was in terms of what is provided under the 1977 Act. If one becomes homeless, what must the local authority offer? What amounts to accommodation to satisfy the terms of the 1977 statute?

I do not want to criticise unnecessarily, but I am disappointed at Lord Brightman's approach. He stated that the Homeless Persons Act

"is not an Act which imposes any duty upon a local authority to house the homeless . . . It is an Act to assist persons who are homeless, not an Act to provide them with homes."

That may sound like a semantic argument, but it gave rise to some unfortunate consequences in his Lordship's mind. He continued:

"In this situation, Parliament plainly, and wisely, placed no qualifying adjective before the word 'accommodation' in section 1 or section 4 of the Act, and none is to be implied. The word 'appropriate' or 'reasonable' is not to be imported. Nor is accommodation not accommodation because it might in certain circumstances be unfit for habitation for the purposes of part II of the Housing Act 1957."

It is extraordinary that the judge should take the view that because the words "appropriate" or "reasonable" were not specifically included in the Act, accommodation does not cease to be accommodation merely because is it unfit for human habitation. One could argue that one could discharge one's duty under the 1977 Act by putting people in accommodation which is genuinely and literally, in terms of the statutory requirements, unfit for human habitation. That is too broad to leave unchallenged, and too dangerous to remain as the considered judgment of the courts' interpretation of the 1977 Act.

"There are no rules. Clearly some places in which a person might choose or be constrained to live could not properly be regarded as accommodation . . . it would be a misuse of language to describe Diogenes as having occupied accommodation within the meaning of the Act."

He then said that anything short of living in a barrel would do, that it was a matter entirely for local authorities, and that no other standards should be imposed or expected.

The judgment could have alarming consequences, and is unsatisfactory. Will the Minister give the Government's view on that line of reasoning? Do Ministers think that it is satisfactory? Where does the judgment lead? In view of the judgment, what is the standing of the Scottish code of guidance under the Homeless Persons Act 1977? The House will remember that the code asks local authorities "to bear in mind the relevant provisions of general housing and public health legislation", and stresses that

"the basic need of families is for self contained accommodation."

In those two examples the code appears to interpret the word "accommodation" and to make some sensible suggestions about a local authority's duty under the Act. Lord Brightman's reasoning clearly undermines the code of guidance and may leave local authorities in doubt about where their duty lies. It is important that the Minister makes it clear where the Government stand on that.

The new clause is comparatively simple and is tabled specifically to highlight that point. It is no secret that Shelter prepared the brief and drew the matter to our attention. I am grateful to Shelter for doing so, because without that it might have been a long time before we came across Lord Brightman's thoughts on the subject. We may have done so only when they started to have unpleasant, unwanted consequences north of the border.

The Minister will be aware that the new clause has all-party support. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher), asked me specifically to say that he had put his name to the clause. He would have liked to attend the debate, but unfortunately, he had to go to his constituency. He wanted to record his support for the anxiety that I have mentioned.

As the Minister, who is a member of the Faculty of Advocates, knows better than I do, a House of Lords judgment in a civil area has relevance in Scotland. Indeed, it is highly persuasive. I noticed, sadly, that the judgment was endorsed by Lord Keith of Kinkel and Lord Mackay of Clashfern who are in the Scottish legal world. The judgment will undoubtedly lay down a standard which will be difficult for the Court of Session to ignore in a judicial review on an application concerning the 1977 Act. That is why I am so anxious to debate the matter.

One of the genuinely alarming features of the judgment is Lord Brightman's remarks about judicial reviews. He said:

"My Lords, I am troubled at the prolific use of judicial review . . . And I express the hope that there will be a lessening in the number of challenges which are mounted against local authorities who are endeavouring, in extremely difficult circumstances, to perform their duties under the Homeless Persons Act."

No one wants frivolous applications to the courts, but we have come down a long and difficult road, most of which has been signposted by Brown v. Hamilton district council —that interminable Jarndyce v. Jarndyce performance— when we tried to establish the importance and availability of judicial review. The Minister will join me in paying tribute to the efforts that were made, particularly by Lord Drumpark, to evolve a new procedure which allows judicial review to be less of a legal marathon and obstacle race.

I hear reasonably encouraging reports of the new procedure in Scotland, so I hope that in passing the Minister will distance himself from Lord Brightman's expressions on the subject. It is important that on such a basic matter as this people should be free to go to the courts if they feel that the administrative discretion allowed to local authorities under the Act has been abused.

I hope that I have said enough to set out the limits of the argument. Shelter's brief talks of "serious inroads into the duties of local authorities", and points out that having taken legal advice it believes

"that the Homeless Persons Act will cease to have any practical use for homeless people."

That may be overstated. I hope that most local authorities will continue to take a responsible view, to take the common-sense meaning of the word "homeless", and to offer decent accommodation to those in that position. I hope that the loophole opened up by Lord Brightman will be ignored in the vast majority of cases. I hope that the Minister will at least show that he agrees with the general trend of my attack and that if the Government cannot accept the new clause — I accept that it will require consultation — consultation will be put in hand and positive efforts will be made to find a solution which will ensure that Brightmanship does not break out in Scottish housing.

Sir Russell Johnston: I support what the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) has said. Nevertheless, I shall take the opportunity to give one more quotation from the past which the hon. Gentleman did not give but which I think is apposite. He referred to the case of the Hamilton district council v. Matthew Brown, in which Lord Justice Clerk Wheatley stated:

"I reject the argument that as long as accommodation was available it did not matter what the nature of the accommodation was. In my view it must be reasonable accommodation in all the circumstances. A pig-sty could be accommodation but not reasonable accommodation."

That was qualified afterwards by Lord Fraser when he said that a distinction might be made between temporary and long-term accommodation. However, in either case, it was fundamental in determining the Scottish code of conduct.

I should particularly like to know to what extent the Brightman decision has any effect on the position in Scotland. As a signatory to the new clause, I accept that the wording may not be perfect, but I think that both sides of the House would welcome an intimation from the Minister that he will take the problems into account and, if so required—I do not know whether it will be—will introduce legislation to prevent Brightmanism from becoming the law of the land.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): As we have been discussing some legal judgments, perhaps the best thing that I can do is to say that I concur with the remarks of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). However, I will make a short observation of my own to add to the argument that he has lucidly put forward.

One of the difficulties of using a common brief is that the quotations tend to be used up during the early stages of a debate and afterwards there is repetition, but I would like to mention Women's Aid. I agree with the hon. Member for Garscadden that any responsible or sensible local authority would use its discretion and would follow the code of practice and rehouse those who were homeless. I should be surprised if many local authorities fell out with that aim. We have to return to the original case involving Matthew Brown, in which a local authority did not respond and a judicial review was necessary. Equally, in the case of the judgment we have just heard, a local authority again was not prepared to rehouse someone in suitable accommodation and, accordingly, a request was made for a judicial review.

Along with other hon. Members, I have received a letter from Scottish Women's Aid. It wants me to point out that it is worried about the situation. In many cases women who leave their husbands, perhaps after having been battered, go into temporary accommodation. If one follows the judgment in the Puhlhofer case, the temporary accommodation which they moved into could prevent them from gaining adequate accommodation in terms of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977. It was found necessary to pass the Act in 1977, so obviously there must have been a need for it.

I also received some information from Shelter about the position in Dundee. It gave me two quotations, one about a women's refuge in Dundee where there were "Two flats within one building. One flat had two bedrooms, each of which can house a mother and her children. The occupants share two toilets and one bathroom. They all share one small cooker in the kitchen."

That accommodation might debar someone from obtaining suitable accommodation.

The second quotation was about a night shelter in West Bell street, in Dundee. That accommodation consisted of "a single dormitory for up to 26 people. They share one bath and one shower. There are two toilets. No cooking facilities."

However, under the judgment in the Puhlhofer case, that, too, might debar those who are in that accommodation from their rights under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977. I do not think that that is reasonable.

We have good grounds to be critical of the House of Lords because, in the original case of Hamilton district council v. Matthew Brown which the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) quoted, the criteria which were adopted by the Lord Justice Clerk were very sound. He looked at the nature of the accommodation and I think that that is the most reasonable way of doing it. That statement was qualified subsequently, as the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber said, in the House of Lords, but the definition adopted by the Law Lords was better than that enunciated in the Puhlhofer case.

I understand that in Scotland, from the beginning of April, the legislation bifurcates between Scotland and England and Wales. If that is so, we can take advantage of this debate to put the law back to where everyone thought it was in 1977 and as was subsequently defined in the case of Hamilton district council v. Matthew Brown, which was the first case to interpret in 1981 the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977.

Those of us who have had the matter drawn to our attention are grateful to be able to bring it to the House at this stage in the Bill. I always appreciate the difficulties that Ministers may have in finding a legislative vehicle which will allow them to repair legislation which may have been savaged or mauled in the courts. In this case, we have a highly suitable Bill and, given the decision in the House of Lords, it would be very influential, if not binding, on the Scottish courts, especially in view of the concurrence of the two Scottish Law Lords.

I hope that the Government, through the Minister today, will correct the situation. I would not be happy if he were to say that, because the voluntary code is still in existence, it will adequately deal with the problem. That code of practice followed upon a statutory obligation which appeared in the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act. If the Act has holes knocked in it, statutory obligations become worthless. If that happened, the code would be neutered, and I do not think that anyone, including the Minister, would like to see that happen.

Mr. Ancram: I have listened carefully to the views expressed in this debate. Hon. Gentlemen may be assured that their concerns have been noted and I intend to consider them. Hon. Gentlemen will appreciate that it is not for me to comment on the decision of the Law Lords, although we will give careful thought to the implications of the judgment.

The decision illustrates some of the general principles underlying the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977. When a person presents himself as homeless under the Act, the local authority is required to look into the circumstances of his case, but the authority then has the discretion, having regard to the code of guidance issued by the Secretary of State, to reach its own judgment on whether the person is homeless and whether he falls into one of the priority need categories. Therefore, the purpose of the Act is to regulate the function of the local authority with respect to persons who are homeless or who are threatened with homelessness.

In allocating houses, local authorities have to deal with difficult decisions as to needs and priorities and to balance competing claims for the resources available. I have tremendous sympathy, as I think we all do, with a family living in overcrowded conditions. Their needs may require to be assessed alongside other applicants on the authority's waiting list who may be in equally difficult positions. An example is an elderly couple whose house suffers from dampness and condensation who may not be termed as homeless, but who may equally have a good reason for seeking a transfer. It is fair to say that the Act is primarily intended as a safety net for people who do not have a roof over their heads. It is important that it should not become a means at the other end of the scale by which other people, however deserving, can bypass the authority's normal rules for allocating houses according to its Members assessment of need.

Mr. Wilson: The hon. Gentleman has chosen an interesting example. Does he have any evidence that such an abuse of the housing rules has taken place? My experience in Dundee is that, when someone is homeless, a house is made available, but it is rarely in one of the higher amenity districts.

Mr. Ancram: I hope that the hon. Gentleman did not misunderstand me. I was saying that the present position, which, to a large extent, gives local authorities discretion, would effectively allow local authorities to make proper judgments. This raises a marker about the potential dangers of looking for a statutory definition.

Having set out the general background, the decision of the Law Lords—that "accommodation" in section 1(1) of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 does not mean "appropriate" or "reasonable", as the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) said, but merely accommodation that can properly be described as such within the ordinary meaning of the English language—has implications. I should like to consider those implications further. I should like time to consider the report of the decision more carefully than any of us have been able to do so far. This is a matter on which I think it would be appropriate that I should consult my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

The decision concerned an English case and an Act which has application in Great Britain. I am advised, as the hon. Member for Garscadden suggested, that it would almost certainly be followed in Scotland. Clearly, there are implications for the whole of Britain which need to be looked at together. I do not believe that there is a strong case for importing a definition of "accommodation" into the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act for Scotland which may differ from that for England and Wales. I think that, in this respect, it makes sense to keep in step.

Mr. Dewar: I understand that the code of guidance is issued under the Act. Lord Brightman could not consider the code of guidance, for understandable reasons. Does the hon. Gentleman believe that that Scottish code of guidance is still binding on local authorities and that they are expected to observe its conditions, as before?

Mr. Ancram: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will allow me to come to that point. I can confirm that the code of guidance is referred to in the Act, although not necessarily in specific terms. Section 12 of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act provides:

> "In relation to homeless persons and persons threatened with homelessness a relevant authority shall have regard in the exercise of their functions to such guidance as may from time to time be given by the Secretary of State."

That is the statutory basis.

I think that the Opposition will accept that the new clause could give rise to problems of its own. They are seeking by it to provide that, where an authority has a duty to secure accommodation, it shall take the form of a separate dwelling house which conforms to the statutory provisions relating to overcrowding and the tolerable standard. I sympathise with the intention, but I believe that we must be careful not to impose unrealistic duties on local authorities. Where the Act places an obligation on an authority to ensure that accommodation is available, it is for the authority to decide how best that obligation can be met.

Chapter 4 of the code gives some guidance to local authorities. In particular, it recognises that there may be cases where, as a last resort, authorities need to arrange accommodation in lodgings, guest houses or hotels. It is made clear, however, that this is to be a last resort and that such accommodation should be for as short a period as possible. I do not think that we can entirely rule out such accommodation as a temporary solution, which would appear to be the present effect of the new clause.

The hon. Member for Garscadden referred to the implications of the decision on section 4 in so far as it placed a duty on local authorities to secure accommodation for certain homelesss persons. At present, the code of guidance states explicitly in paragraph 4(15) that bed and breakfast accommodation is not to be regarded as appropriate permanent accommodation. Even as temporary accommodation, it is to be used as a last resort or for as short a time as possible.

What the code of guidance has to say about accommodation in respect of local authority duties under section 4 may still remain relevant. I do not necessarily accept Shelter's contention that it is overturned by the decision of the House of Lords. That is a matter of some doubt and one of the matters on which I should like to take legal advice and make an assessment. The position is complicated. This and other aspects must be given further consideration.

I assure hon. Members that I intend to give full and careful consideration to the implications of the decision. I shall want to consult and to hear the views of interested organisations. As part of that process, yesterday I met representatives of Shelter (Scotland) who set out their anxieties to me. I hope that, in the light of my assurance that I intend to give this matter consideration and to consult, the hon. Member for Garscadden will withdraw the motion.

Mr. Dewar: I think that the Under-Secretary of State has persuaded me that we should not push the new clause.

It would be unreasonable to do so. This matter must be carefully considered and we must ensure that we obtain the right answer.

I take at face value—I am sure that I am entitled to do so—the hon. Gentleman's assurance that consultation will be put in hand urgently, that he will consult interested bodies and take his own legal soundings on the impact of the judgment on Scotland. Clearly, that will take some time and it will not be possible to catch up with this question if action is needed during the passage of this legislation. If the advice is that the code of guidance has been undermined or set aside by the House of Lords' judgment, I hope that the hon. Gentlman will not hesitate to take steps to reinstate it or to ensure that there is a reasonable framework within which local authorities can exercise their duties. If that requires some form of legislation, I am sure that all the Opposition parties would be anxious to accommodate it, assuming that there was general agreement on the necessary steps.

Mr. Maclennan: I agree with the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) that the Under-Secretary of State has been very forthcoming, but he has not said what was his understanding of the law before the case. It would have been helpful to know whether the Government's understanding was in line with Lord Brightman's view. It certainly was not my view, and I doubt that it was Parliament's when the legislation was put on the statute book. In light of the fact that the Under-Secretary of State is obviously seized of the urgency of meeting the inquiries that will undoubtedly come from local authorities as to where their duties lie, I think that it would be wrong to press him further.

Question put and negatived.

Clause 2

INCREASED DISCOUNT WHERE DWELLING-HOUSE PURCHASED IS A FLAT

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I beg to move amendment No. 27, in page 2, line 17, at end insert 'provided that where the flat is part of a deck access block, or of a free-standing tower block having at least ten consecutive floors of tenanted accommodation the discount shall be 50 per cent.'

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this, it will be convenient to consider amendment No. 28, in page 2, line 20, after 'cent', insert 'provided that where the flat is part of a deck access block, or of a free-standing tower block having at least ten consecutive floors of tenanted accommodation the discount shall be 80 per cent.'.

Mr. Marlow: I apologise as a mere Englishman intervening in a Scottish debate before the massed ranks of Scottish Members of Parliament. However, I have not come totally from out of space—in fact, I have come bearing gifts.

I am a member of the Standing Committee on the Housing and Planning Bill. The Committee passed an amendment which increased still further the generous increases in discounts which the Government had put in the original legislation. The discounts which we have increased are those that should be available for people living in flats, in high rise blocks or in deck access accommodation. As we know from tenants in London, Birmingham, Newcastle, Cardiff and Plymouth who live in such accommodation, their mouths are watering in anticipation of increased discounts. I think that it would be totally unreasonable if the people of Scotland were denied similar opportunities. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will agree.

The amendment was passed. All parties participated in the debate and voted for it. The Labour party and the alliance supported it and five out of six Conservative Members who were not on the payroll supported it also. So the measure has a great deal of support in the House. It was a cross-party amendment.

As we know few flats have been sold. Many hon. Members are anxious that people should have the opportunity to buy their homes. A great number of houses have been sold, but not very many flats.

Discounts on flats and houses were in the past much the same. If somebody buys a house he has to pay the mortgage. He can pay other bills—maintain the house and insure it—but he is not forced to do so. If, however, somebody buys a flat, he is forced each year to pay, in addition to his mortgage, insurance, maintenance charges, service charges and a whole range of other charges that are outside his control. It is perfectly right and proper, therefore, that there should be a significantly higher level of discounts for the purchase of flats from local authorities.

A similar amendment was debated in Standing Committee on the Housing and Planning Bill. It was accepted and passed by the Committee. It is only right that the House should have a brief opportunity to discuss exactly the same amendment on this Bill.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): I rise to support the amendment, for the fundamental reason that I believe that there should be consistency in the United Kingdom's housing policy and that a distinction should not be drawn between the rate of discount that applies in Scotland and that which applies in England and Wales.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): The hon. Gentleman says that he believes in consistency. Why, then, was that amendment passed without consultation with Scottish Members? It seems to have been passed by English Members and now they are trying to foist it upon us.

Mr. Shepherd: With great respect, there was a Scottish Member on the Committee. He was aware of the amendment and voted for it. The fact that other Scottish parties do not find that to be a convincing argument is not one with which I would necessarily agree. I should like there to be consistency throughout the United Kingdom. Furthermore, the right-to-buy legislation does not refer to flats, although they constitute 30 per cent. of the housing stock. However, sales of flats account for only 3 per cent. of total sales. If we cannot encourage the occupiers of flats to buy their homes, we shall end up with a completely unbalanced residue of housing stock. We shall be left with the most unsatisfactory form of housing.

Mr. Maxton: The hon. Members for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) and for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) keep referring to flats, but their amendment does not cover all flats. A distinction is drawn between certain flats and the flats which are covered by their amendment.

Mr. Shepherd: Substantial statistics were not available to enable us to identify the nature of the sales, but we reached cross-party agreement about those which it was identified are the most difficult to sell. That is why we focused upon the most difficult element, which we deemed to be those which are included in the amendment. For those reasons I support the amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North.

Mr. Maxton: The idea that there must be consistency between what happens in England and Wales and what happens in Scotland on housing matters is complete and utter nonsense. If that were so, there would not be separate housing legislation. One Bill would cover the whole of the United Kingdom. The hon. Member for Northampton, North may believe that that is right, but no Scottish Members believe that that is right. The Bill contains major differences relating to the legislation that affects housing associations in Scotland compared with that which affects housing associations in England and Wales. There is no reason, therefore, why different discounts should not apply in England and Wales compared with Scotland.

I shall explain briefly why my Labour colleagues on the Standing Committee voted for the amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton, North. It was a wrecking vote. It was designed to wreck the clause and make it inoperable —[Interruption.] Conservative Members may deny that but if they read Labour Weekly they will see that that was exactly the argument that was put forward by my hon. Friends who were leading for the Opposition.

Mr. Shepherd: It may be that one should read Labour Weekly, but it might be helpful if one read the Hansard report of the proceedings in Committee. The hon. Gentleman would then be better informed about the views of his colleagues.

Mr. Maxton: I prefer to read Labour Weekly. Scottish members have opposed and continue to oppose the Government's increase in the discount for flats. The discounts for the sale of council houses are too high. If we are pushed to a vote tonight, we shall certainly vote against the amendment.

8.15 pm

Mr. Ancram: Having listened to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) I am amazed at his view that in order to find out what the Labour Party mean by their vote we have to read Labour Weekly rather than Hansard. However, it appears on the face of Hansard that many of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues supported my hon. Friends the Members for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) and for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) who have spoken in this short debate. His colleagues voted for an amendment of the type that is now before us.

I appreciate the concern of my hon. Friends about the need to increase flat sales. They know that the increase of 10 per cent. in the discount was precisely to achieve that purpose. Their argument in Standing Committee on the Bill was to the effect that they did not think that that went far enough. They wish a further incentive to be introduced.

The corresponding part of the Housing and Planning Bill has been amended, with the result that the provisions contained in the Bill that is before us today and in the Housing and Planning Bill are no longer identical. It would no be right in principle for tenants who live in similar houses to have a different entitlement to discounts in England and Scotland. Therefore we have tried to create consistency where no consistency previously existed. Our intention is to try to keep England and Scotland in step. Therefore we shall look again at flat discounts and bring forward—if necessary in another place—amendments to ensure that there is no divergence.

I do not, however, believe that these amendments are satisfactory, and in their heart of hearts my hon. Friends may believe that that is the case, too. I recognise the strength of the views that have been expressed on an all-party basis in Committee and also in the House in favour of an improved discount for flat dwellers. I join my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction in giving the House an assurance that we shall look carefully at how best to give effect to those views. In the light of this assurance, I hope that my hon. Friends will withdraw the amendments.

Mr. Marlow: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what he has said and for the way that he has said it. I said in my brief introductory remarks that my idea was to give to Scotland the opportunity to have the same discounts as are now to be made available in England and Wales.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) feels that Scotland does not need the same opportunities. That is his point of view and he is entitled to it. However, he then went on to say why the amendment was passed and why it was supported in Committee by the Opposition. I have a slight advantage over the hon. Gentleman. I was there. An amendment previous to this amendment was moved by the Opposition Front Bench. It was to show the Opposition's concern about the sale of flats in areas that they defined as being areas where it was difficult to let.

The reason for this amendment being put forward and eventually accepted was that it was agreeable to the Conservative Back Bench and the Labour Front Bench. It was not a wrecking amendment. The hon. Gentleman would be well advised to read the Hansard report of the debate. He will find that there is a distinct difference between his housing policy and the housing policy of his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker). The hon. Member for Perry Barr says that his housing policy is concerned with people rather than with dogma. His housing policy might therefore be in advance of that of the hon. Member for Cathcart. The time will shortly come when he will follow behind his hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr.

In view of what my hon. Friend said and the satisfactory commitment that he has given, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 13

PAYMENTS ETC. IN COMMUNITY-BASED HOUSING ASSOCIATIONS. 1985 c. 69

Amendment made: No. 11, in page 10, line 35 after 'dwelling', insert ', or as the case may be part,'.—[Mr. Ancram.]

Mr. Millan: I beg to move amendment No. 12, in page 10, line 46, at end insert

'or—

(iii) has lived in a dwelling within the particular community mentioned in subsection 4*(a)* below relevant to the association for a continuous period of at least three years immediately preceding the granting of the tenancy.'.

The amendment deals with the granting of tenancies to persons who are either committee members of community-based housing associations or who are close relatives of committee members. The granting of such tenancies is completely forbidden at present but the Bill goes some way to meet the rights of those people by including provisions under which in certain circumstances tenancies can be granted to committee members or to close relatives of committee members.

The provisions are very restrictive. Strong feeling has been expressed in local housing associations. When an amendment was moved in Committee there was reference to representations that I had from Linthouse housing association. Housing associations feel that the rules are grossly unfair to people who voluntarily give up their time to act as committee members of community based housing associations. The restrictive rules are unfair not only to committee members but even more so to close relatives. A son or a daughter is not eligible for the allocation of a house, regardless of need.

I am sorry that the Minister did not accept in Committee the amendment that such tenancies could be granted provided they fell within the published rules of the association for the granting of tenancies. That would be a much more satisfactory way of dealing with the matter. In my amendment I am not returning to that concept although it would be best. I have included another condition, namely, that any person to be granted a tenancy either as a committee member or as a close relative should have had a continuous local association for at least three years immediately preceding the granting of the tenancy. That would meet the fear that committee members might abuse the provision by granting tenancies unfairly or unjustifiably to themselves or to their relatives.

I do not approach the matter on the basis of requiring stringent safeguards in case committee members behave disreputably. If there is a problem, it is offensive to approach it like that. Committee members give up their time voluntarily and put in much effort to improve housing conditions in their communities. They should be dealt with as public spirited local citizens who are doing their best for the local community. If there is a fear of unfair treatment, it might be necessary to put safeguards into the Bill. As I have said, the safeguard that was proposed in Committee was best. My amendment is much more limited, although it requires a genuine local connection.

The present provision is grossly unfair not just to committee members but to immediate members of their families. It discourages public-spirited people from acting as committee members of housing associations. We should remove the disincentive and treat committee members with fairness and generosity in view of their voluntary activities. Although the amendment is limited, it recognises that before a tenancy could be granted the prospective tenant should have had a demonstrative local connection for at least three years. I hope the Minister will accept the amendment in the spirit in which I move it.

Mr. Kennedy: I support the amendment. Skye and Lochalsh housing association is perhaps a peripheral example of the point the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) was making. When the association first wrote to me about the Bill in general it pointed out that the 12 highly motivated active local residents give their time, skills and commitment to the association entirely voluntarily. It is important to stress that. I am glad that the right hon. Member did so.

Lest there be discrimination in carrying out the policy, the right hon. Gentleman has suggested that a person should have been established in the locality for three years before being granted a tenancy. That is relevant not just in Skye but in other parts of the Highlands where there are many holiday homes, the existence of which causes aggravation and disenchantment to many people who give their time voluntarily to the running of housing associations. That point has been made to me specifically by the housing association of Skye and Lochalsh. It pointed out that at least 12 per cent. of the housing stock in the area is used as holiday accommodation. In some communities the figure is as high as 50 per cent. Anything which helps to underpin a direct local connection which has been sustained for some time is to be welcomed in the context of my constituency. Therefore I am happy to support the amendment.

Mr. Maxton: I briefly support my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan). It is wrong that there should be an anomaly in the treatment of relatives of voluntary committee members of housing associations compared with district councillors and housing officers and housing employees of district councils. In the latter case there is no bar on the rights of relatives in the granting of tenancies. Yet people who have built the housing association movement in Scotland are discriminated against. Scotland is different from the rest of the United Kingdom with its community-based community housing associations. We have a right to be proud of those associations yet we are placing this burden on the relatives of committee members. It is not right. I support the amendment.

Mr. Ancram: I understand the right hon. Gentleman's reasons for tabling the amendment which, as he explained, would increase the range of circumstances in which a community-based housing association could grant a tenancy to a committee member or a close relative. I am not sure that the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) was appraised of the fact that the clause refers only to community-based housing associations as designated under the terms of that provision. I do not know that the amendment would help in his area.

The particular problems of community-based housing associations in relation to the granting of benefits centre around the nature of their activities and the fact that those are confined to a limited geographical area. Their renovation programmes must, therefore, at certain points, conflict with the interests of their committee members or their relatives who live in houses which are or are likely to be affected by the programme. In that position there is a clear need on grounds of equity for an association to be able to buy houses from and offer a tenancy to those people when their existing houses are directly affected. The clause as drafted gives them that ability and the 12-months period makes allowance for those who have moved out of the area recently or temporarily.

8.30 pm

The right hon. Member for Govan has suggested that community-based housing associations should be able to grant tenancies to committee members or relatives who are currently resident in the area but not in houses owned by or being acquired by the association. I see that as a distinctly different category of allocation from those categories that are already provided for in new section 15A*(b)*. The same arguments about the direct effect of the development programme on their homes do not apply, and without that distinction they are not in a materially different position from the relatives of committee members of any other housing associations, whether community-based or not.

The provisions that are set out in clause 13 were drawn carefully to provide a specific solution to a particular problem, which is probably unique to community-based housing associations in Scotland. As such, I accept that it merits a solution that is not available to housing associations generally, but only to the degree that the problem can be demonstrated to be uniquely different from those of other associations. That is where the amendment falls down, and it is for that reason that I do not believe that it is necessary, or even desirable, to widen the clause in the way that is proposed. Accordingly, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will withdraw the amendment. If he does not, I shall have to ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to reject it.

Mr. Millan: I have no intention of withdrawing the amendment, especially after such an unsatisfactory reply. The Minister has not directed himself to the real unfairness that currently exists. There are three community-based housing associations in my constituency that are operating in different parts of it, and committee members are typically those who have lived in their local communities all their lives. In some cases their sons and daughters have lived in those communities all their lives. It is absurd that they should be debarred statutorily from being allocated a house in their particular areas. That is monstrous.

There are satisfactory ways of avoiding any suggestion that someone is being treated unfairly or with undue favour. There are different ways of avoiding unfairnesses and the method that was proposed in Committee was rejected. The amendment sets out another approach and that, too, is being rejected. The Minister is turning it down without advancing any substantial argument in favour of refusing to deal with the problems. He is doing so without any real recognition of the sense of injustice which the present provisions cause to committee members as well as to their unfortunate relatives, who in some instances may have nothing to do with the committee members or with them becoming committee members. If I live in a certain community and my brother decides to become a member of a community-based housing association, why should that deny me statutorily of any prospect of being housed by the association? That is absurd and I have no intention of withdrawing the amendment.

Something will have to be done to remedy this injustice and if the Minister will not take the sensible course and have an appropriate provision inserted in the Bill in this place, I hope that those in another place will do the job that requires to be done.

Amendment negatived.

AMENDMENT OF 1980 ACT

Amendments made: No. 15, in page 21, line 38, after 'charity', insert '—(i)'. No. 16, in page 21, line 41, leave out '." and (g)' and insert '; or

(ii) which but for section 4(4) of, and paragraph (g) of the Second Schedule to, that Act (exempt charities) would require to be so entered; or

(f) where by virtue of section 49(2) of the said Act of 1960 (extent) a landlord so mentioned is not one to which Part II of that Act (registration of charities etc.) applies, but—

(i) the landlord has, in respect of all periods from 3 October 1980, claimed and been granted (whether or not retrospectively), under section 360(1) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 (special exemptions for charities), exemption from tax; and

(ii) the rules of the landlord, registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act 1965 and in force at the date of the landlord's first being registered by the Housing Corporation, were such as would have admitted of such exemption had it been claimed as at the said date of registration; or

(g) where, within a neighbourhood, the dwelling-house is one of a number (not exceeding 14) of dwelling-houses with a common landlord, being a landlord so mentioned, and it is the practice of that landlord to let at least one half of those dwelling houses for occupation by any or all of the following—

(i) persons who have suffered from or are suffering from mental disorder (as defined in the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984), physical handicap or addiction to alcohol or other drugs;

(ii) persons who have been released from prison or other institutions;

(iii) young persons who have left the care of a local authority, and a social service is, or special facilities are, provided wholly or partly for the purpose of assisting those persons.";

(g) after subsection (11) there shall be inserted the following subsections—

"(11A) The Secretary of State may by order amend, or add to, the list of classes set out in sub-paragraphs (i) to (ii) of paragraph (g) of subsection (11) above.

(11B) The Commissioners of Inland Revenue shall, as regards any registered housing association, at the request of the Secretary of State, provide him and the Housing Corporation with such information as will enable them to determine whether that association is a landlord in respect of which this section will not, by virtue of subsection (11)(f) above, apply; and where a registered housing association is refused exemption on a claim under section 360(1) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 the Commissioners shall forthwith inform the Secretary of State and the Housing Corporation of that fact.

(11C) Where information has been received by the Housing Corporation under subsection (11B) above and having regard to that information the Corporation is satisfied that the housing association to which it relates is not a landlord in respect of which this section applies, they shall make an entry to that effect in the register of housing associations maintained by them under section 3(1) of the Housing Association Act 1985, and they shall cancel that entry where subsequent information so received in relation to that housing association is inconsistent with their being so satisfied."; and Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mr. Ancram.]

8.36 pm

Mr. Maxton: I shall be brief, but I wish to make it clear that, while the Government have made some concessions for charities and special need housing, the basic objection to extending to tenants of housing associations the right to buy, especially to community housing associations, still remains.

We object strongly to the changes that the Government are making to discount arrangements both in raising the percentages for flats and in reducing the repayment period for that discount from five years to three. We do not believe that those changes are necessary. They are part of a sell-off. They demonstrate the Government's great ideological desire to get rid of every council house that they possibly can. This is the only part of their housing policy that is not directed to the cutting of housing expenditure. Against this background, I shall be asking my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against the Bill's Third Reading.

8.38 pm

Sir Russell Johnston: I shall ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against the Bill's Third Reading. We are not opposed to the right to buy. We shall oppose Third Reading because it is our view that this measure could blight the remarkable progress of the housing associations, which have done so much to provide houses for those who would otherwise not have them, and to make improvements where improvements would not have been made, as well as filling a continuing gap between the private and public sectors in housing provision. We accept the right to buy, but we believe that there is a right to rent.

8.39 pm

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): We have been asked to give a Third Reading to a Bill which only tinkers with the problems of housing in Scotland. It refers to the sale of houses and the role of housing associations but it hides what is happening—for example, how vast sums are being extracted from the public purse for private gain. I am thinking of Newton Grange in my constituency, where many think that what is happening borders on a public scandal. I refer to the former 550 National Coal Board houses at Newton Grange, which were on land leased from the Lothian estates by the board. When, in 1983, the lease expired, the land and properties reverted to Lothian estates. It is not disputed that many of the houses needed substantial improvement. Despite repeated questions to the Government and the NCB, I have never been able to discover whether Lothian estates acquired all of that property without payment. The secrecy of the matter brings me to the reasonable conclusion that there is something to hide.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must remind the hon. Gentleman that on Third Reading we must confine ourselves to what is in the Bill. The hon. Gentleman is going well outside the Bill.

Mr. Eadie: I intend to speak for only a few minutes and I believe that the House will realise that what I am saying is in order.

The case that I am outlining illustrates that the arguments used in support of the Bill are defective. In March 1984, the Housing Corporation approved funds for rehabilitation by Castle Rock housing association of 119 houses in the Newton Grange No. 1 housing action area. It is public knowledge that Lothian estates acquired a small fortune as a result of the Castle Rock housing association's decision. I do not criticise that, but Lothian estates paid little or nothing for the properties and demanded more than £300,000 for the properties which the Castle Rock housing association proposed to rehabilitate. Housing associations are mentioned in the Bill. The Castle Rock housing association eventually paid £209,750 for the properties in the housing action area.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I find it extremely difficult to relate what the hon. Gentleman is telling the House to what is in the Bill.

Mr. Eadie: The Bill affects the funding of housing associations and how public money will be disbursed. I am therefore entitled to speak on behalf of my constituents and to say that the Bill should not receive a Third Reading.

Lothian estates acquired a small fortune of public money perfectly legally, but the circumstances surrounding the sale are of dubious propriety, to put it mildly. It is not that Lothian estates is a good landlord. When pressed about the dubious propriety of its actions, it oozes a spirit of benevolence. I have had many letters from constituents. I draw the Minister's attention to Mrs. Young of 47, The Square, Newton Grange because the House is entitled to know that the public purse has been robbed. The Minister happens to be the son and heir of Lothian estates, and therefore of the public money to which I have referred. We are entitled to know why he is piloting the Bill through and why he has the right to pilot it through, as he will get some of the money I have mentioned.

This is a disgraceful Bill in many respects. It will not solve Scotland's housing problems and it will merely transfer housing from public to private hands. It is more concerned with profit than housing and I hope that the House will not give it a Third Reading. I also hope that the Minister will have the decency to say what is his vested interest and why he is taking the Bill through the House as a landlord who stands to gain substantial sums of money.

Mr. Ancram: When the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) considers that speech in the cold light of day, he may feel that his remarks were unworthy. Listening to the political prejudice enunciated by the spokesmen for the Liberal party and for the Labour party strengthens my view that the Bill is good for tenants and good for housing in Scotland, and I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to support it.

Salmon Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

8.55 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

When the Government announced our intention to bring forward salmon legislation, there were critics who accused us of wasting parliamentary time on a minor issue when we had so many other problems such as unemployment. Leaving aside the point that legislation does not create employment, other than perhaps for the bureacrats, I believe that this attitude showed a considerable ignorance of the Scottish rural scene. While those employed directly or indirectly in the salmon industry may not add up to a lot of people in Glasgow or west central Scotland terms, they add up to a lot of people in the remote rural corners of Scotland, often in the most fragile economic parts of the countryside.

Angling in general is the biggest participation sport in this country. It is a multi-million pound industry. Salmon angling is the most sought after and often the most expensive part of the angling scene and, dare I say it, often the most unrewarding. There have been many efforts to quantify the value of salmon angling to Scotland. Figures have been put variously at between £22 million and £140 million per annum. If the true figure is somewhere in the middle that clearly indicates the importance of salmon angling to many parts of rural Scotland. In addition to ghillies, boatmen and keepers directly employed, hotels, self-catering, shops, restaurants and all parts of the rural economy benefit from the angler. That angler will come, and continue to come, only if he feels he has a reasonable chance of catching fish, and that depends on how well we conserve the stocks of salmon.

The legitimate netsman is equally an important part of the rural economy. I can think of parts of my constituency, and I am sure other hon. Members can do of theirs, where the netting forms a very important part of the annual fishing cycle, enabling fishermen and their families to make a living in the country, often, in my case, on islands. Their survival is linked, critically, to the survival of the salmon and in sufficient numbers to allow them a reasonable catch.

The Bill has a direct impact on employment in the countryside. Its aim is to improve the protection of the salmon so that the legitimate netsman and the angler can have continuing livelihood and sport.

The Bill has three main objectives. The first is the modernisation and improvement of the administrative arrangements in Scotland. The management of salmon stocks is the responsibility of district boards, which are composed of an equal number of upper, or rod, proprietors and lower, or netting, proprietors with the person owning the fishery with the highest rateable value being automatically the chairman. We propose to modernise and democratise the arrangements by providing for the chairman to be elected by a meeting of proprietors in the district and for the co-option of representatives of anglers and tenant netsmen who have a significant interest in the proper management of salmon fisheries.

[Mr. John MacKay]

Because of their substantial financial investment, the Bill provides for a constitution that gives proprietors a majority of the votes. The Bill also provides for amalgamation of districts where the proprietors consider that this is necessary to create a more viable management unit. All told, we hope that the new provision will encourage greater coverage of Scotland by district boards. At present, there are in existence only about half the boards in the 108 districts for which the existing legislation provides.

The second main objective is the streamlining of the arrangements for the regulation of salmon fisheries. It is intended that certain changes which at present require primary legislation may in future be achieved by statutory instrument, subject to parliamentary approval where appropriate. This will allow a quicker response to changing circumstances, for example in relation to the length of close times and the prescribed methods of fishing.

Thirdly, there are further measures to combat poaching through new offences of being in possession of unlawfully taken salmon, and also the powers enabling the Government to bring forward salmon dealer licensing schemes.

This is, of course, not a purely Scottish Bill, although the major part of it deals with the situation in Scotland. From the outset it was recognised that, as regards the new possession offence, the measures could be effective only if they applied throughout Scotland and England and Wales.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Will the Minister accept that severe problems face the future of salmon in Wales, and no doubt in England as well? Why do the Government not see fit to take more radical steps to safeguard the interests of salmon and salmon fishing in Wales and England, as well as in Scotland?

Mr. MacKay: As I continue my speech the hon. Gentleman will see that we are taking important and radical measures in England and Wales. The main thing that we are doing in Scotland is to improve the arrangements for the district fishery boards, and, I hope, improve their role. I have no doubt that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will touch on the hon. Gentleman's point about England and Wales when he sums up.

As some, at least, of those here this evening will know, the Bill has undergone fairly rigorous scrutiny in another place. One of the outcomes of this was the inclusion of powers which would enable the introduction of a dealer licensing scheme in England and Wales.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): Following on the point made by the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), Welsh salmon conservation is important. Clause 28 will be important for Welsh salmon interests. Will the Government introduce a scheme urgently? Will the Minister advise the House that the obvious authority to implement the scheme is the Welsh water authority, which has the fullest knowledge of and involvement in Welsh fishing interests?

Mr. MacKay: I shall come later to the licensing scheme, especially with regard to Scotland, but I know that the hon. Gentleman has to be in a Committee, so I say to him that in both Scotland and Wales we hope to act as quickly as possible. In Scotland we have the mechanism, which I shall explain when I come to that part of my speech. I know that my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food hope to act as quickly as possible in England and Wales. I think they recognise that the water authorities look like being the appropriate vehicle, but some thought will have to go into that because it is a new concept. In Scotland we already have dealer licensing, as I shall mention when I come to it.

The Bill has been criticised by some as falling short of what was required. It is a fact, however, that there has to be a limit to any piece of legislation, and I am in no doubt that the Bill addresses itself to the main elements of salmon fisheries which require attention. I hope that the Bill will commend itself to the House as an appropriate and practical response to what is needed.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): Before the end of the Minister's speech, may I declare an interest — an unsatisfied interest—as a fisherman in west Wales. We want better conservation measures. Will he consider sympathetically in Committee an amendment to provide that when rivers in Wales, or indeed in other parts of the country, are very low, all fishing should be banned for a short time in order to conserve the salmon and ensure that they arrive in the river at the appropriate time?

Mr. MacKay: I appreciate that some time will be spent in Committee on this difficult question of drought, just as there was in another place on the same subject. As a fellow fisherman, I appreciate the point made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. I am sure he is aware that there are major problems of definition and area. The simple proof of the oft-repeated statement that low water means that net fishermen take a disproportionate amount of salmon and that this has a deleterious effect on the stocks, is difficult to obtain. This is an important issue, and I shall listen sympathetically to the points that are made about it. I look forward to an interesting debate. However, the right hon. and learned Member was a little premature if he thought that I was about to sit down.

I said that the Bill was an appropriate and practical response to what is needed. It is practical because, down the years, there have been a variety of views on what should be done about salmon management, conservation and other matters. It would have been possible for the Government to rest on the fact that, beyond general principles and statements of intent, there could be said to have been a lack of real and general consensus over a number of areas. We have, however, focused on the areas of importance, and the general response in another place was that the Bill is a worthwhile measure.

In deciding to build on the existing structure and arrangements in Scotland, we were conscious of the fact that the Scottish legislation, essentially the Acts of 1862 and 1868, has stood the test of time in many respects, and one must acknowledge the far-sightedness of those who drafted these provisions. It is also worth noting that, despite the effects of activities such as high seas fishing and large-scale poaching, our salmon stocks have been remarkably well maintained. It is interesting to note—certainly as regards Scotland—that the fluctuations in catches over recent years are not novel. There were short-term variations in the 1930s, and at the end of last century, every bit as great as that in the 1960s and 1970s. However, we cannot be complacent, and in particular we must continue to give a lead to other countries when it comes to national conservation measures.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): I acknowledge the point about variations in given years, but surely my hon. Friend will accept that world stocks of salmon have declined by about 50 per cent., as indeed they have in Scotland, over the past 20 years.

Mr. MacKay: I accept my hon. Friend's point about the world stocks of salmon. However, if my hon. Friend were to look at the figures in the most recent statistical bulletin published by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, he would see that over the past 30 years there was first a marked increase in the salmon take and then a decline. The current figure is not too far from the figure for the early 1950s.

I know that there are debates on how the cycles are caused, and these debates have gone on for a long time. There are mysteries about salmon, including these cycles. It is important that we take all possible steps to conserve salmon and make certain that we can, as far as knowledge permits, control these cycles, which would be to the benefit of both the legitimate netsmen and the salmon angler.

Before I describe the various clauses I should like to draw the House's attention to the four particular points.

The first is the possession offence, to which I have already referred. As the House will know, poaching is no longer confined to small local operations, but is carried out on a large and well-organised commercial scale. The provisions in the Bill will allow action to be taken against those involved with the outlets for poached salmon and should have a significant effect on the level of poaching by making it more difficult to dispose of illegally caught fish. Clauses 21 and 29 set out respectively provisions for Scotland, and England and Wales. The fact that the wording is not identical reflects a difference of starting point. In the Scottish case we have chosen to build on the existing provisions in the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Protection Act 1951, whereas in England and Wales the approach has been to build on the Theft Act.

The net result of both clauses is to ensure that it will no longer be the case that someone can be in possession of salmon, believing, or having reason to suspect, that it had been illegally taken, and not be convicted. Hitherto, this has been a major gap in the enforcement of salmon legislation. The new clauses strike the right, and essential, balance between improving the prospects of convicting those involved in the illegal handling of salmon, without going so far as introducing measures which could lead to the conviction of innocent people.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): Can the Minister think of any comparable clause in our legal system that attributes guilt on the basis of suspicion?

Mr. MacKay: There are some examples, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) may be able to find them. I cannot put my hand on them while I am making this speech, but they are there. It is sensible to take this small action to make sure that people cannot get away with large-scale poaching of salmon. Perhaps the hon. Member approves of that, but I know that most hon. Members do not. In my constituency we could greatly improve the chances of catching people and bringing them before the courts and, if the evidence is properly there, of getting convictions, if the House passes the two clauses.

Mr. Martin J. O'Neill (Clackmannan): Is the Minister suggesting that it has been acceptable to poach one for the pot, as was said in the debate in the other place, but that larger-scale poaching is unacceptable? If he is claiming that, he is flying in the face of historic evidence about the treatment of poachers.

Mr. MacKay: The hon. Gentleman should know that it is a question of scale. The Bill is being approached from a conservation point of view. The person who goes out and gets one for the pot is not endangering the species, but those who poison rivers or net rivers by setting miles and miles of monofilament net are endangering the species. That is especially true of the poisoner. If the hon. Member has ever seen a river after a poisoner has been at work, he will know the deep feelings of bitterness in the breasts of countrymen when they see the havoc that has been wreaked down river.

Dealer licensing will be a valuable complement to the new possession offences, and it is the intention to have detailed schemes under subordinate legislation brought forward as soon possible after the enactment of the Bill. These schemes will be subject to the affirmative resolution of both Houses. Here again the net result will be the same, although the starting points north and south of the border are different. In Scotland we are building on the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. In England and Wales, where there is no similar legislation, the provisions will have to be made in another direction. I have already said that the water boards are one possible direction in which my right hon. Friends in the south will be thinking of moving.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I apologise for interrupting my hon. Friend. The dealer licensing scheme is crucial to the effectiveness of the Bill in dealing with poaching. Will it be possible for the Committee to have some information about how it will operate?

Mr. MacKay: I note what my hon. Friend says. It depends on how readily and quickly we can move with our consultations in Scotland with COSLA, as it is directly involved through the Civic Government (Scotland) Act and the police, and in England and Wales where the Government will have to talk to, among others, the water authorities. I cannot promise my hon. Friend that we shall have any more details in Committee about how we intend to implement this. Of course, that point will come to the House for debate under the affirmative order provision.

I was about to mention my third point concerning water bailiffs. There has been much ill-informed comment in Scotland about the role of water bailiffs in the dealer licensing scheme, including the suggestion that they be given the power to enter and search dwelling houses. Let me scotch—if I may use that word—that suggestion once and for all.

With regard to unlicensed premises, which include dwelling houses, the police have a power of entry and search under section 6 of the 1982 Act. They have, however, to satisfy a justice of the peace or sheriff, on oath, that there is reasonable ground for suspecting that an activity for which a licence is required is taking place there. If satisfied, a warrant may be granted by the sheriff or justice of the peace. That power of entry and search is one reserved to the police and there is no intention of extending the power to water bailiffs in the context of salmon dealer licensing.

The fourth point concerns clause 33 which commits the Government to a review, three years after the enactment of the Bill, of the salmon net fisheries in the north-east of England and in the Scottish east coast salmon fishery districts as far north as the river Ugie. This review embraces the undertaking given in my hon. Friend's statement of 7 November 1985 to review the effects of the new measures being introduced in the north-east English drift net fishery. The decision to introduce this clause was welcomed in another place, and I hope that it will commend itself to this House, and the conflicting interests in it.

I hope the House will find it helpful if I describe briefly the specific provisions of the Bill. Clause 1 creates new salmon fishery districts but builds upon existing districts by retaining existing coastal limits and existing names. The new districts will include, not only the major rivers flowing into the sea between the existing coastal limits of the district but all other rivers that do so. Regulatory provisions are applied to minor rivers as they presently apply to the major rivers in any district. Subsection (2) as read with clause 2 will enable districts to be amalgamated. There is, in subsection (4), the power to make minor adjustments to district boundaries.

Clause 2 and schedule 1 provide the power and procedure for making a designation order to abolish salmon fishery districts and create new districts. This power can be used, as I have said, to enable districts to amalgamate or, where the extent of existing districts is considered to be unsatisfactory in some way. The procedures to be followed before a designation order is made, are set out in schedule 1 and include provisions for consultation, publication and the receipt and consideration of objections.

Clauses 3 to 9 deal with the regulation of salmon fishing. Clause 3(2) deals with technical matters such as the construction and use of cruives and dams and the mesh of nets. Clause 3(3) deals with the duration of the weekly close time and enables changes to be made by regulation subject to annulment by resolution of either House. At present, any such change would require primary legislation. This change provides flexibility which has long been asked for.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I hope that the Minister recognises that there are anxieties about this part of the Bill, not that it is not right that the Minister should from time to time update these specific rules. However, fishermen may find that, when the Minister makes a change in a permitted fishing method, the only recourse open to an aggrieved person is to ask a Member of Parliament to pray against an order. There may be a repetition of the position that exists now over the monofilament net ban, where large sections of the industry believe that they have not been consulted and their Members of Parliament have no means of voting against the provision.

Mr. MacKay: That is the usual cry when all consultations are carried out. If people do not agree with the results of the consultation, they say that the consultation has not been adequate. However, this is the way that Parliament works and it is the only way that the changes to legislation that are needed from time to time, for example in the close time, can be made.

It will be observed that, whereas the annual close time for all districts except the Tweed is currently a fixed period of 168 days, although it may commence on different dates in different districts, clause 6 provides that in future the "annual close time will be a continuing period of not less than 168 days".

There is no change in the provision that angling may take place after the start and before the end of the annual close time. However, as a district may in future, as a consequence of a designation order under clause 2, include more than one major river, we felt it prudent to provide that there might be different close times for different rivers within a district. It will be noted that a change in an annual close time may be made only on the application of a district salmon fishery board, or on the application of any two proprietors within a district where no board is in existence. The procedures in schedule 1 contain safeguards with regard to publication, notification and so on. Alterations to estuary limits under clause 7 will also depend on an initiative at district board or proprietorial level.

Clause 9 provides that regulations made under clause 3 will, in general, apply to the Tweed. The present annual close time of 153 days for that river is retained but, as in the case of other rivers, as a minimum period in future.

Clauses 10 to 12 deal with salmon fishery proprietors and their qualifications to vote for and be elected to a district salmon fishery board. The present distinction between upper and lower proprietors and their power to appoint a mandatory to act for them are retained. Clause 11 provides for the unusual position of there being only one proprietor of a salmon fishery in a district, and where, following enactment, he ceases to be so because other rivers and proprietors are included in the district.

Clauses 13 to 17 provide for the constitution, membership, powers and duties of district salmon fishery boards, clause 13 and schedule 2 deal with elections to and the constitution of a district salmon fishery board. The concept of an association is new in salmon legislation, but I am advised that we are on sound and desirable grounds in requiring proprietors to form an association and elect a committee which will then become the district salmon fishery board.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Will the Minister clarify the relationship between the Government and brown trout interests?

Mr. MacKay: That is opening up the much wider issue of the relationship between salmon fishery boards and brown trout interests. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the legislation deals specifically with salmon. We may have an interesting debate in Committee about whether brown trout should come within the scope of salmon fishery boards and their names altered, or whether we should consider an alternative to preserve brown trout fishing which, at the risk of digressing from the motion, is equally important to many people and the tourist industry.

As at present, boards will be voluntary organisations so that they will be created only at the wish of proprietors.

The procedure for setting up boards is set out in schedule 2. We have retained the existing procedure for weighted voting, but have updated the valuation figures which determine whether a proprietor is entitled to multiple votes. We have also provided that, however small the valuation of a fishery, the proprietor will be entitled to one vote. Provision is made in the schedule for the co-option of representatives of anglers and tenant netsmen.

I have already mentioned our intention to introduce a salmon dealer licence in Scotland. The enabling power is clause 19. The intention is that district and islands councils will be the licensing authorities. At an earlier stage in our consultations the idea of a dealer licensing scheme was welcomed in principle by COSLA and the Association of Chief Constables. My officials will be consulting further with these and other bodies, and I shall certainly try to get some of the details for the Committee stage.

Clause 20 adds to section 2 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries (Protection) (Scotland) Act 1951 permitted methods of fishing for salmon in the sea. Power is given to define by regulation the terms net and coble, bag net, fly net or other stake net. This should be a useful provision.

Clauses 21 to 27 deal with offences and introduce new penalties in Scotland. Clause 21 provides the new offence in Scotland of a person being in possession of salmon either believing that it has been unlawfully taken or possessing it in circumstances in which it would be reasonable for him to suspect that it had been unlawfully taken. Clause 29 provides for the offence as it will apply in England and Wales. Although worded slightly differently in places, the effect of the clauses will be essentially the same and provision is made so that prosecution may take place regardless of which side of the border the original offence took place. It will be a defence to show that no relevant offence had been committed.

Clause 22 will enable a court to find an accused guilty of any one of the specified alternative offences if satisfied that the accused did not commit the offence charged but committed the alternative offence.

Clause 23 makes it an offence to introduce salmon or salmon eggs into inland waters in a district where there is a district board without the board's consent.

Clause 24 provides for exemption from certain offences where a person has the permission of my right hon. and learned Friend. It will be noted that he may give his consent only where all affected proprietors in a salmon fishery district have also consented. That provision will, for example, enable an otherwise illegal method of fishing to be used in individual cases—for example, salmon ranching or other developments in salmon fishing.

Clause 25 adds to the present exemptions for acts done for scientific purposes or for the purpose of protecting and improving salmon stocks.

Clause 26 provides for the application of clauses 24 and 25 to the River Esk and to the River Tweed.

Clause 27 removes the right of a clerk to a district board or any other person to prosecute offences relating to salmon. In future prosecutions will be undertaken solely by the procurator fiscal. Clause 28 enables a dealer licensing scheme to be introduced in England and Wales.

Clause 29 makes it an offence in England and Wales for someone to receive or handle salmon where he believes, or it would be reasonable for him to suspect, that it had been taken illegally. This clause parallels clause 21 which relates to Scotland.

Clause 30 will remove the unnecessary requirement under section 30 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975 that fish farms in England and Wales must obtain the consent of the water authority before they introduce fish or spawn into their waters. This is a change which was forecast in the 1981 consultation paper on inland and coastal fisheries in England and Wales.

Clause 31 modifies the penalties under the 1975 Act for fishing with an illegal or unlicensed instrument, removing a distinction between acting alone and acting with another.

Clause 32 amends the provisions of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975 regarding fishing of licensed nets by authorised servants or agents of the licensee. The effect will be that, in areas where the number of licences issued is restricted under section 26 of the 1975 Act, the servants or agents must be accompanied by the licensee when they fish with the net. The only exception will be in the case of illness or injury.

Clause 33, as I said earlier, commits the Government to a review, three years after the enactment of the Bill, of the salmon net fisheries in the north-east of England and on the Scottish east coast.

Mr. Morrison rose——

Mr. MacKay: I will finish, if my hon. Friend will allow me.

In the course of my remarks I have dealt with schedules 1 and 2. I should also refer briefly to schedules 3, 4 and 5. Schedule 3 is a necessary provision to allow existing district boards to continue in operation in their present form for a period of up to three years if the proprietors so wish. Boards can, of course, be reconstituted in terms of the provisions of the Bill within this period. Paragraph 6 of schedule 4 will remove some of the restrictions which currently apply to the publication of salmon statistics. Schedule 5 is a list of repeals and from them the House will be able to judge the extent of the modernisation contained in the Bill. We are repealing entirely seven Acts, with removal of sections of some other Acts.

One of the features of the Government's approach to consideration of the Bill has been the willingness of Ministers and our Departments to listen to the views of salmon and other interests and where possible to take these into account. That has, I think, been acknowledged as a constructive and essentially non-political approach and I very much hope that this attitude will be reflected in our debate today and in the succeeding stages in this House.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): The Under-Secretary of State may well be hopeful, but I may be about to shatter some of his hopes, because I beg to move, to leave out from "That" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"this House declines to give a Second Reading to the Salmon Bill [Lords] on the grounds that it would extend the powers and privileges of private proprietors of salmon fisheries without making adequate provision for anglers or for the wider public interest, and that it is an inappropriate and inadequate measure to deal with the urgent need to conserve salmon and other fish species, and to protect the environment of rivers and estuaries for the benefit of the whole nation's sporting, recreational and environmental interests."

I should declare an interest in the Bill because it would, as I understand it, extend my rights and privileges as one who happens to farm land adjacent to a Scottish river. I do not fish on the River Tweed or derive any benefit from it—nor do I want to—but the Bill will give me a greater say in the administration of the river than it gives to the people who fish on it. It is amazing that, in this day and age, legislation should entrench the powers of absentee landlords, foreign investors and, in this case, a Labour Member of Parliament while doing practically nothing for local fishing interests. That is absurd, and that is why I have tabled the amendment.

I acknowledge the obvious fact that the number of salmon in our rivers has fallen disastrously in recent years. Urgent action is needed to protect these magnificent fish from the threat of extermination. Scottish Office statistics published in December last year show that the total recorded catch of salmon and grilse in 1984 was the lowest since records started in 1952. The trend since the mid-1960s has been extremely worrying. With that in mind, obviously I welcome the fact that the Government have decided to do something about it, but that is about as far as I can go.

The Government, in presenting the Bill and using this parliamentary time, have given themselves an opportunity to bring Scottish freshwater fisheries legislation into the 21st century, but instead they have opted to stay in the 19th century. They are simply building on failure by readopting the discredited framework of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Acts 1862 and 1868 which concentrated all power in the hands of the private proprietors of salmon fishing rights, the riparian owners.

It is a bit much for the Under-Secretary of State to say that he is democratising Scottish district salmon fishery boards. The franchise will be extended only to the people who own the fisheries. How that can be called democratisation is beyond me. Even supposing that those riparian owners never took any account of their own private interests in exercising their powers on district salmon fishery boards, it is inevitable that others will see the district boards as protectors of the landlords' interests. Similarly, bailiffs appointed by such boards are bound to be seen as the landlords' men. I believe that this fundamental inequity in the constitution of the Scottish district boards is a significant factor in the lawlessness afflicting so many rivers in Scotland.

The concept of the private ownership of a wild fish which happens to be swimming in water adjacent to someone's estate is pretty absurd. That is why most people —this point was raised earlier—have a certain sneaking respect for the traditional poacher who catches a few fish in the laird's water. He may be breaking a law which most people believe is silly. That is all very well when we talk about the one poacher catching the one for the pot about which we hear but, because the law has fallen into disrepute, there is a big poaching industry using sophisticated gear and marketing techniques. We have only this discredited law and these laughable district fishery boards to deal with the problem in Scotland.

We want a new type of river authority with genuine representation for all the people with legitimate interests in the river, including elected local councillors. I believe that the token presence on the existing boards of co-opted representatives with no power to outvote the riparian owners is hopelessly inadequate. We need genuine representative river boards wich will command the respect of all concerned. The Bill simply restores the failed and discredited structure of Scottish river boards from the 1860s legislation. I believe that that fundamental flaw will undermine the conservation objectives in the Bill.

As we all know, the crisis facing the Atlantic salmon has international dimensions. We now have a fully fledged international organisation—the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation — based in Edinburgh working on this problem. If we want NASCO to succeed in its efforts to get Greenland, Iceland, the Faroes and the other north Atlantic countries to observe their quotas and to control the fishing efforts in their waters, we must put our own house in order. That means firm and fair control of all our salmon fisheries, both in our rivers and at sea. The thrust of new legislation should be to conserve salmon for the benefit of all concerned, but I doubt very much that the Bill can measure up to that objective.

As for the detailed points of the Bill, first must come the proposal to extend the annual and weekly close times to allow more fish to get to the spawning grounds. That is a sensible objective, although the Salmon Conservancy and the Salmon and Trout Association want that principle to be further extended. There may be a case for a more flexible approach, based on scientific evidence, in a particular year or in a particular river, in much the same way as certain sea fisheries are regulated from time to time. However, when referring to any of these restrictions it has to be pointed out that there is no close season for those who ignore all of the regulations with absolute impunity.

The licensed net fishermen on the River Tweed—the river that I know best because I live on it—voluntarily have postponed the start of their season during the current year, but when I went for a walk along the banks of the River Tweed near my house last Sunday I saw plenty of evidence of the continuing activities of the poaching fraternity.

I agree with the Government that poaching will probably be most effectively and fairly deterred by controlling the trade in salmon. There are two ways to control that trade: either by tagging salmon, as is the practice in New Brunswick, Canada or, as the Government have decided to do, by introducing a dealer licensing system. Given the right framework, either of those systems could work. However, it would have been absurd if the licensing system had stopped at the English border. I am happy to notice that the Government have already accepted that point by introducing an amendment in the other place.

The regulation of dealers should go hand in hand with properly constituted, staffed and funded district fishery boards. I have said something about the shortcomings of the constitution of these boards. I must now say something about the fact that there is to be no Government funding of the boards. I must also express concern about the staffing of the boards, in particular about the appointment of water bailiffs. The landlords who control the district boards can appoint whomever they like as bailiffs. The Bill will provide the bailiffs with very extensive powers. Clauses 21 and 29 establish powers to search vehicles and premises. The courts will be able to convict upon the uncorroborated evidence of a single witness, presumably the water bailiff. There is to be the disturbing extension of a recent precedent whereby an accused person can be presumed guilty of the offence of handling a poached fish until he can prove that he is innocent. Clause 21 says that a person who is in possession of salmon "in circumstances in which it would be reasonable for him to suspect that a relevant offence has at any time been committed in relation to the salmon shall be guilty of an offence".

Even if it is reasonable to suspect that he might have known that an offence had been committed, he can be guilty of an offence. We should be thankful for the small mercy that the Bill also says:

"It shall be a defence in proceedings for an offence under this section to show that no relevant offence had in fact been committed in relation to the salmon."

However, it also says:

"It shall be lawful to convict a person charged under this section on the evidence of one witness."

It may be too difficult to get somebody prosecuted for poaching now. However, with that kind of legislation on the statute book I fear that it could be rather too easy to get innocent people convicted. It may appear to be attractive to set that kind of legislative precedent in order to stamp out particularly heinous crimes such as drug trafficking, but is it justifiable to undermine some of the fundamental principles of Scottish, and for that matter English, justice, in order to make it easier to prosecute poachers who are after salmon?

I appreciate that there is a need to provide effective control over the trade in contraband salmon, but the House should consider carefully the civil liberties aspects of that part of the Bill. The Government are challenging the Scottish principle of corroboration. The principle that somebody is innocent until he is proved guilty is also being undermined.

If water bailiffs are to be given that kind of power and authority, I want to be absolutely certain that the individuals concerned will be properly selected, trained and controlled—if necessary, with the sanction of police authority. In England and Wales, bailiffs are appointed by properly constituted public water authorities, but in Scotland we are back to our old friend, the riparian owners on the district salmon fishery boards. It is right to demand that the bailiffs should be properly controlled and supervised.

On the licensed netting operations in river estuaries and off the coast of the north east of England, I have some sympathy for the 182 licence holders who are carrying on a long established traditional fishery off the Northumberland and Yorkshire coast. But with modern monofilament nets their catch has increased dramatically from about 15,000 fish in 1965 to over 50,000 in 1984 at a time when the overall number of salmon running in the rivers has been falling spectacularly. Obviously something will have to be done. Clause 33 provides for a review of the fishery. I understand that the Government may be considering the possibility of phasing out that drift net fishery.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): There is no question of the Government considering that. The Government are considering what they have put into the Bill. It is wrong for the hon. Gentleman to put any such words into the mouth of the Government.

Mr. Home Robertson: That was not my understanding, but I am grateful for that assurance from the Minister of State. I believe that the traditional netting techniques, subject to proper controls, are a valuable part of the local economy in the areas concerned and, indeed, form an attractive part of the local scene in those areas. Those fisheries provide regular seasonal employment and are part of the tourist attraction of the area. So it should not be necessary to hound out of existence those people or the licensed drift net fishermen that I have been talking about. I am glad to hear that that is not the intention of the Government.

The Government may not be thinking about closing down the fisheries, but I know that my old friends the riparian owners are making strong representations about the closure of licensed net fisheries. I am not happy about such a suggestion. The riparian owner lobby want to build up a lucrative business with rich seasonal visitors. We must ensure that wherever possible regular employment is protected.

Mr. John MacKay: That last remark is uncalled for. If the hon. Gentleman were to read the reports of the debates in another place, he would see that some of the major owners in Scotland were happy to go along with the amendment that is proposed. In fact, no division was called in the other place on going down the road that the hon. Gentleman has conjured up. His attack on the riparian owners in this regard is uncalled for.

Mr. Home Robertson: I read the reports of the debates in another place. It was a fascinating catalogue of vested interests. I have also read the representations made by some of the fishing interests. It is clear that, although they might not put it in writing, many of them would like to do away with the netting operation. I hope that it will be possible to achieve a compromise which will conserve the salmon and provide a fair share of the available catch to all legitimate interests. In passing, I should like to see considerably more public access to salmon fishing and rather less emphasis on the exclusive rights of the very rich on some rivers.

I conclude with a general observation about the restrictive scope of the Bill. It started off as a largely Scottish Bill. It was expanded somewhat in another place but it is worth quoting the words of the Welsh Water Authority in a recent report:

"Illegal fishing is possibly the most important single factor affecting Welsh fisheries."

I have had similar representations from the North West Association of Sea Angling Clubs, and the Bass Anglers Sports Fishing Society makes the point that the Bill should be extended to other endangered fish species such as bass and trout, which has been referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). It has also been suggested that the Bill could deal with the problems of pollution and acid rain. Those subjects can be touched on in Committee.

I am greatly indebted to all the organisations that have taken the trouble to comment on the detail of the Bill and in particular to the River Doone Angling Improvement Society and the Scottish Anglers National Association. All in all, it is a sadly unsatisfactory Bill. The anglers are disappointed by certain aspects and the debates in another place show that even their Lordships could see certain flaws.

The Bill is supposed to deal with the critical situation which is facing Atlantic salmon in Scottish rivers. I fear that it will fail for a number of reasons, especially because of the fundamental lack of credibility of the unrepresentative district salmon fisheries boards which will have to apply the law in Scotland. It is for that reason that I urge the House to support the reasoned amendment.

9.45 pm

Mr. John Corrie (Cunninghame, North): First, I declare an interest in the Bill. I have a mile and a half of salmon fishing on the River Dee in the south-west of Scotland, which is open to anyone who wants to fish it. Children from the local village fish it free of charge at any time if they want to do so.

I give a warm welcome to the Bill. It makes a start to conserving salmon, and that is vital to the whole of Scotland, especially for the tourist industry. We should like to see much tougher legislation directed to netting at sea. We must accept that if we are to continue to have salmon in Scotland we shall have to continue to talk to representatives of countries where our salmon return each year. Only if we reach agreements with them shall we have salmon returning to our rivers.

I pay tribute to the existing river boards and those who look after them. Much work is done even now to try to ensure that our rivers still have salmon in them. Much is spent on restocking rivers, by seeding and ensuring that there are fish who return in future. The river of which I have a mile and a half has a hydroelectric dam at sea level within the tidal area, which makes it extremely difficult for the fish to get up the river.

Droughts present a problem, and it is tragic that when rivers are low we are allowed to continue fishing. Something must be done about that. When there is stale water in the rivers in my area, the salmon will not face it. The same fish will move up and down the estuary on numerous occasions, and every time they come back up yet more are caught by the nets in the estuary. Until the fresh water runs, the fish will not go up the river, and there is the danger of disease setting in. I hope that we can consider possible ways of closing off rivers when there are serious droughts.

I shall not go through the Bill clause by clause. I am aware that many hon. Members wish to participate in the debate and I shall try to be brief. However, there are a number of questions which I wish to ask. One of the most damaging features in most rivers in Scotland is acid rain. The damage can be reduced by keeping trees well away from the sides of our rivers, especially at the heads of the rivers where there are large pine forests. When we have the new boards, will we have any powers even to advise those in the upper reaches where we have the spawning beds that a piece of simple conservation in keeping the trees back from the river heads will do an enourmous amount to help to protect our fish?

We must protect our salmon from commercial poachers and the methods that they use. My river was contaminated with cyanide only two years ago. It is only when one sees the destruction that that causes, from the point where it is put in the river downstream, where it killed every living thing apart from the salmon that it was supposed to kill, that one ceases to have any sympathy for the poachers.

It is important that the salmon get up the rivers and it is vital that the smolts get down the river. That was reasonably well covered in section 19 of the 1968 Act. However, there is a new dimension that we must consider. Many rivers in Scotland have fish farms on them and most of the fish farms draw their water off the river through sluices. We must seriously consider putting grids on sluices to ensure that the smolts are not passing through to the fish farms. If that happens, it is guaranteed that they will die quickly from the diseases that are to be found in the farms. The smolts are of no use to the farmers of trout.

I see that the Bill covers salmo salar and salmo trutta. Herling is mentioned in many of the Acts of Parliament which are affected by the Bill and I wonder whether it is also covered here. Trout are a game fish in the rivers that flow into the Solway, but I assume that they are not covered by the Bill.

The Bill is intended to improve salmon management and to improve and conserve stocks. I am pleased that the option of tagging has not been dropped. That would have led to legalised poaching. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the Member for Agyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay), knows that I pushed very hard for a licensing system. Like the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), I am pleased that England and Wales will now be covered, because there is no doubt that much of the fish that is poached in the south of Scotland is taken to England and sold.

It is important to consider the Bill's approach to the illegal taking of salmon and the carrying of salmon. We shall have to wait until the Committee stage to consider that matter more deeply, but it worries many hon. Members. I also wonder whether the Bill covers the theft of all salmon. We have salmon from the river, salmon from nets on the coasts and fish farms. Theft from fish farms is a new industry. Will those who steal fish from fish farms attract the Bill's penalties?

There has been a substantial increase in the tonnage of fish produced by fish farms, and that will continue. A scarce commodity commands a premium price. I hope that, as fish farms produce more fish, the pressure on poachers will diminish. It is too late to go into a long debate on drift netting but, tomorrow, before the House will be a Statutory Instrument banning the carriage of monofilament nets in Scotland. It must be galling to all Scotsmen to think that the shoals of salmon which go down the east coast of Scotland, where they cannot be caught by such nets, are slaughtered when they reach the north of England. We must scrutinise netting in that area. The numbers that have been quoted already show that the stocks are diminishing in those areas.

I am not sure what happened in another place regarding the owners of smokers for salmon and roe. Will they be licensed? I hope that anybody who abuses a licence will lose it and be liable to punishment.

Rod fishing is undoubtedly one of the fastest growing leisure sports in Scotland. Although some beats are extremely expensive, many other rivers are cheap and easy to fish. However, such rivers will be useless unless the fish come back. I sincerely hope that the Bill will help to conserve salmon. Those of us who enjoy fshing and perceive the growing requirement of fishermen for rod and line want it to succeed.

9.53 pm

Mr. Roy Mason (Barnsley, Central): I welcome the Bill, but I must express my disappointment over the fact that, on the major issue of salmon conservation, it falls far short of the demands that many of us have made over the years.

Now that the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation is being established in Edinburgh, we must prove that we take the problem of salmon conservation seriously. It is a pity that, having at last obtained a slot in the legislative programme, the Government have produced such a timorous and half-hearted measure. I must admit, however, that some progress has been made. Thanks to the expertise and detailed knowledge of a number of Members in the other place, the Bill now before us has been improved.

On the question of salmon conservation, the Minister must constantly be aware and repeatedly be reminded that three major steps must still be taken: nylon monofilament gill nets should be banned, poaching should be drastically curbed and drift netting off the north-east coast should eventually cease if we are serious about salmon conservation. In 1984, 7,700 salmon were taken by this method, compared with about 2,000 in 1959. This is a sign of the rising take of salmon by this interception netting technique. It is bound to have a calamitous effect on salmon stocks, on conservation and on legal salmon fishing off Scotland.

The Government have recognised the seriousness of the situation and, albeit slowly, are starting to impose some controls and restrictive measures, in alliance with the Yorkshire and Northumbrian water authorities, to curb the exploitation of the system. The licensee has to be present when a salmon is netted—and not before time. Too many licences have been issued with not many checks on who is using them. The Bill will help to curb some of the abuse. Night fishing by drift nets is to be banned, and we are to see the introduction of standard close times. As the Ministry said, this should help to control the problem—control, but not get rid of it.

I am aware that some fishermen's livelihoods are at stake here, but there is no reason why over a phased period of time, with proper compensation for those drift netters who are likely to suffer, the Government should not be able to set a date for the ending of drift netting off the north-east Yorkshire and Northumbrian coastline. According to the 1985 Yorkshire water authority board, 29 drift net licences were issued for the 1984 season, and these are to be reduced to 22. It is interesting to note in the report that due to low river flows at the time when fish would normally run, they remained at sea, where high numbers of salmon were caught, no doubt by the drift netters.

Yorkshire has one major salmon river, the River Esk, linked by Whitby to the sea. Because of the poor rod catches of salmon in past years, the Yorkshire water authority has introduced 30,000 salmon smolts into the middle and upper reaches, of which 1,000 were tagged to assess the numbers returning to the river. It will be interesting to see how many do so.

Mr. James Tinn (Redcar): My right hon. Friend refers to phasing out, with compensation by the Government, of the drift netters off the north-east coast in order to conserve salmon stocks. He accepts that idea, but I certainly do not. Would he apply that principle in order to conserve coal stocks and phase out some of the Yorkshire mines, with compensation for the miners?

Mr. Mason: That is exactly what has been happening. The Government have been managing to run down the coal mining industry by providing financial compensation. The 23 nets involved off the Yorkshire coastline should be adequately compensated, but given time to phase out their operations. I think that this will be a worthy step in the cause of salmon conservation.

Mr. Beith rose—

Mr. Mason: The hon. Gentleman will no doubt raise the same point as he raised on the last salmon Bill, and I shall give him the same reply.

Mr. Beith: It is a slightly different one. What is the logic of phasing out the drift net fishery at sea, as opposed to phasing out the net fishery or even the angling in the rivers? Why should any one section be removed?

Mr. Mason: It is obvious from the figures that I have given that the drift net fisheries off the north-east coast of Yorkshire and Northumbria, taking 7,700 salmon which are searching for the estuaries and the rivers and never getting the chance to spawn, are having deleterious effects on stocks.

Mr. Gummer: Why does the right hon. Gentleman suggest that that 35 per cent. should be phased out and the other 65 per cent. ignored? I find that difficult to understand.

Mr. Mason: I do not want it to be ignored. I am just making the point that drift netting should cease in relation to Yorkshire and the River Esk. That should apply also to the Northumbrian coastline. It should be phased out with financial compensation.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Salmon Bill [Lords] and the Ways and Means Motion may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Neubert.]

Salmon Bill [Lords]

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Mason: There is no mention in the Yorkshire water authority's last report of salmon poaching on the River Esk, yet there is no doubt that that highly organised criminal practice has been responsible for the poor rod catches and, therefore, the introduction of the 30,000 smolts, but the writing has been on the wall for years.

The 1982 report of the water authority said:

"Salmon catches on the river are still well below the long-term average and the trend is a steady decline."

Even in 1981 the water authority said:

"It is sad to relate, salmon catches on the river"— and so on. The wording is the same. In 1980 it said:

"During 1979 there was a dramatic decline in the number of salmon and migratory trout caught by rod and line in the River Esk".

Why? One reason is the undoubted take of salmon by drift netting at sea, but the other main reason is poaching.

In 1977, 40 illegal fishing nets were discovered on the River Esk alone; in 1978, 80; in 1979, 100; in 1980, 157, and in 1981, 180. Five persons caught in possession of an illegal net were fined—two of them £25, one £50 and two £100. None received the maximum penalty of £500, and none were gaoled. That was disgraceful leniency by magistrates. They imposed no deterrent measures, yet they had the weapons in their hands. Magistrates should realise that poaching our salmon rivers in Scotland, Yorkshire and south-west and Wales has become a national scourge and that it is incumbent upon them to help to wipe it out.

In 1982, in spite of the many criminal gangs operating on the River Esk, nine salmon poachers brought before the petty sessional division of Whitby Strand were found guilty and fined an average of £59. What an indictment of the Bench! As recently as last year 153 illegal nets were found, yet there were only 18 convictions. That is on one river—the salmon River Esk in Yorkshire.

I quote from a letter that I received from a member of the Yorkshire water authority. He said:

"It is now necessary for the bailiffs to work in teams of four when patrolling the river, and the problem can only be contained by maintaining this level of manning together with the full back-up facilities of radio and other surveillance technology and the co-operation of the local police force . . . Moreover, it is often very disappointing to have put considerable effort into obtaining a prosecution for poaching and then find that when the case comes to court, the fines are ridiculously low. The expense to the Authority of each case can be very high indeed, but the costs awarded by the courts rarely even partially cover the expenditure."

Poaching is now big business. Poachers operate in gangs, creating intimidation on the rivers and using violence against bailiffs. They wreck the legal fishermen's boats and nets and put them out of business. They use high quality nets and even cyanide. In a letter, a bailiff in the south-west told me:

"The water bailiffs around Barnstaple have received physical violence from poachers—one bailiff had paint remover thrown over his car and there have been numerous cases of tyre-slashing . . . It has been suggested that a lot of revenue earned by these poacher crooks goes back into drugs and other serious crimes, i.e. smuggling of drugs into England, and most poachers seem to have criminal records in other fields."

Mr. Buchan: In view of the terrible situation, is it not curious that my right hon. Friend is content to leave matters in the hands of private security, in the form of river boards and water bailiffs, instead of having proper social prevention?

Mr. Mason: I have not dealt with that yet, but that was what my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) said when talking about providing better facilities and improving the water boards in Scotland. The water authorities want more facilities and more money, and it is incumbent upon the Government to assist them in this respect.

There have been many complaints of water authorities not being able to provide the requisite number of bailiffs because of the squeeze on cash. The bailiff from whom I received the letter was astounded by the information that I received from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, which showed that 283 illegal nets were recovered from Devon and Cornwall — the highest total for any region—followed by 180 on the River Esk in Yorkshire, 126 from Anglia and 88 from Wales.

This is a widespread national criminal racket, and that is why I welcome the national licensing system. On Tuesday 4 May 1982 I questioned the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, on whether he would introduce legislation to control the sale of salmon through licence holders only. That is now in the Bill, so at least some progress has been made.

I hope that one of the penalties to be considered will be the loss of a trading culprit's licence. Once we have embarked on the course of prosecuting those who have obtained salmon in suspicious circumstances — as the Minister said at a very low price, received at a late hour, or by a backdoor transaction — and they are found guilty, their licence to trade should be in jeopardy. That is the sort of deterrent that is required. The receiver should be as guilty as the stealer. These poacher crooks must be stopped, and if we cut out the outlets and have the right sanctions for those outlet dealers who are found guilty, we have a chance of doing so.

The ban on nylon monofilament gill nets must also be considered. I am pleased that the Government are considering banning the carriage of monofilament nets in British fishing boats while in Scottish waters, and also the use of gill nets to fish the salmon. That is another encouraging advance.

I shall not intrude into the massive, detailed management problems of the Scottish salmon fishery districts and boards. For me, suffice to say, the Bill has advanced from a timorous measure to more useful legislation. It may be better still when it is returned to another place. I support it, for the reasons that I have advanced, and although I know full well that it could be better, I shall not oppose it tonight.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I am glad to follow the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason). He has always taken a firm line on the conservation of salmon and all fish stocks and he is known as a highly competent angler.

The right hon. Member's speech shows the paradoxical position of his hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) on the Front Bench, who is prepared to divide the House on the Bill. That seems quite astonishing. The hon. Gentleman is out of touch and quite wrong to criticise the district salmon fishery boards which after all represent the netting authorities and local authorities as well as the riparian owners. If those volunteers did not look after most of the rivers in Scotland nobody elsewould. The hon. Gentleman has set a poor example by his speech tonight for making any improvements in fishing in Scotland.

Bearing in mind the constraints of time and the breadth of legislation, I have to say I am a little disappointed that the Bill does not go as far as I would have liked. It is, to a degree, a missed opportunity. It is not often that we get the opportunity to discuss salmon fishing, and even less often that there is any legislation on it. I am glad that the Bill made good progress in the other place and had some valuable amendments to it that were either introduced by the Government, or accepted by them after detailed discussion.

I hope that we shall have a little more time before Committee, because we have to carry out detailed consultations with a large number of fishing interests, and consider amendments. I hope that we shall have at least a fortnight before the Committee begins. By then, too, the House will have had the advantage of the report of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs that deals with fishery protection, which will give valuable information.

Sadly, I have no interest to declare, having no fishing rights. However, I have a constituency with a number of good salmon rivers and a major salmon smokery, which provides much employment. There is also employment for those involved in netting on the Solway Estuary.

I am pleased that the Government are making changes in the district salmon fishery boards. Their structure had become somewhat antiquated and greater flexibility will be an advantage, although I see difficulties without some form of financial incentive or pump-priming for new boards to be set up where there are none now.

As my hon. Friend the Minister knows, I am keen, as are my hon. Friends on both sides of the Solway, to have a joint Solway board. I hope that we shall be able to introduce an enabling clause that will allow the district boards in Scotland to discuss with the North-West water authority the future of the Solway without having to come back to the House for primary legislation. This may be of tremendous advantage to salmon fishing in the Solway area.

My noble Friend Lord Gray said that we would close the river Esk loophole. I say no more than that, because it has been a difficult problem, but I would like assurances again from my hon. Friend the Minister that this will take place in Committee. I also hope that the North-West water authority will soon bring in a limitation order so that it can restrict the number of haaf net licences that is issued on the English side of the Solway.

I have studied all the detailed proceedings in the other place and I was disappointed that the Government could not see their way to support an amendment to restrict netting and other methods of fishing in exceptionally low water conditions caused by drought. The noble Lords who tabled the amendment won all the arguments but withdrew it. I hope that this will be considered because there is a tremendous weight of evidence in favour of it, although the Government kept coming back with the reply that they had no evidence to support the amendment.

One of the main objectives of the Bill is to deal with poaching. Parliamentary questions have highlighted the number of prosecutions. I noted reports in one newspaper today that there were no fewer than 2,300 nets confiscated on the River Tweed, and 240 prosecutions in that area. For one river, albeit a major one, that is an incredible number of poachers. It is right that the Government should take as tough a line as possible to stamp out something that has become intolerable. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, either in Committee later or when replying tonight, will spell out with the greatest clarity where we stand under the new provisions. The new provisions are particularly complicated and I have read contradictory views from the Lord Denning, and the Lord Advocate. I would like to know exactly what a bailiff, the police and the courts can do when dealing with the issue of poaching.

I would also like clarification about the position of the receiver, who is now likely to be prosecuted under the "suspicion clause". I am wholly in favour of the toughest possible line but I would like to have clarified exactly what that line is.

I am glad that the other place and the Government have brought in dealer licensing throughout England and Wales as well as in Scotland. As I have a constituency on the Border, I can see tremendous problems ahead if that provision remained for Scotland alone.

I believe that the heart of the Bill is conservation, although I believe that the Government are perhaps not taking a tough enough line on this issue. If we do not ensure that sufficient salmon come up to spawn, there will not be many salmon left in a few years' time. I am sure that the Government are well aware that there has been a drop in salmon stocks of nearly 50 per cent. over the past 25 years. If my hon. Friend the Minister of State examines any of the books of statistics on the subject, he will see that over the past 10 years in particular there has been a very considerable drop in the salmon catch. If there were no farm salmon, there would be a great scarcity of smoked salmon and other salmon products that are providing so many jobs in the United Kingdom for a saleable product.

It is vital that we get conservation right. We must examine conservation not only from the domestic aspect but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Corrie) said, from the international aspect. We have heard reports from the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation and we know from the last conference that Denmark will not do anything about Greenland or the Faroes and America will not do anything about Canada or vice versa until we set our house in order and show a greater interest in genuine conservation.

We must take a serious look at conservation. That will certainly mean—and I know that this will not be widely accepted in some parts of the House—that we must over a period of years, with compensation, phase out drift netting around the English coast. We have done that in Scotland although I accept that we still have fixed nets and stake nets and other forms of netting in Scotland. In terms of proportion, my hon. Friend the Minister of State said that 35 per cent. of the nets were drift nets, but the percentage of catch from that 35 per cent. is very high indeed. I hope that we will examine drift netting in greater depth when we deal with the Bill in Committee.

Many of the other aspects raised by hon. Members this evening, the large number of anglers in the United Kingdom, the attraction of income into the country, the large number of jobs in the fishing and haulage industries, tourism and hotels and the rural economy, all depend to an extent on salmon coming up the rivers of Scotland.

We must re-examine the close time for nets and drift netting. I welcome the Bill as a step forward but if three years elapse after the Bill is enacted it will be 1990 and then perhaps there will be two more years for arguments and discussions on statistics. It will be 1994 or 1995 before any further significant step is taken other than the important action which my right hon. Friend the Minister of State took in November when he announced further restrictions. We must shorten the three-year period and take action quickly. I hope that we shall take into the account the whole coast line, not just that from Yorkshire to Peterhead, as the Bill does at present. I want to consider the west coast as well as the east coast of England and Scotland.

We must not let this opportunity slip further. We must do all we can to combat poaching and phase out drift netting, with compensation in the near future. We can do an immense amount in Committee, but tonight I am glad that we are taking a step forward, and I wish the Bill well.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I have no interest to declare, but I represent people who are involved in every category of salmon fishing that has been mentioned tonight. Drift netting at sea, netting in the rivers and angling are all relevant to my constituency's economy. I feel as passionately about conservation as the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), but that does not lead me to conclude that I should put any one of those groups of people out of business. We should find a way to conserve salmon while all those categories of people continue to derive a living from those activities and, in the case of angling, a pleasure.

[Mr. A. J. Beith]

This is not primarily a party political matter. Indeed, it requires considerable effort to work up a party political argument about any of these matters which cut across almost all party issues and party lines. If any area evokes old party controversies, it is the composition of district boards.

I welcome the Bill. It contains a useful collection of provisions to deal with salmon conservation problems. It disproves the theory that a rolling stone gathers no moss, because it has gathered a considerable amount in its extremely lengthy proceedings in another place. An hon. Member suggested that the Bill had gone through the other place expeditiously, but, far from it, their Lordships devoted far more time to this legislation than to almost any other legislation before them. There was a significant parade of interests ownership across the Benches. Obviously, it was a well-informed debate at every stage, although certain interests may have been more numerously represented than others.

A weakness in the Bill has been demonstrated in one of its Scottish aspects, the district boards. The Government's management proposals for Scottish rivers other than the Tweed, which already has its own management structure, cannot be described as a great advance in democracy. The proposals retain heavily weighted voting according to ownership and price, and involve the co-option of angler and tenant netsman representatives, rather than achieveing representation which can be respected by the people involved.

My noble Friend Lord Thurso sought hard to find alternatives based on matching the interests of owners, tenant netsmen and anglers and selecting a chairman without any one group dominating the process. Under existing law, he would be chairman of the Thurso district board in perpetuity, so it is all the better that he put forward better suggestions than those which the Government have so far put forward. That should receive more attention in Committee because it seems that the Government are continuing to give a great deal of support to the land-owning interests of the upper proprietors, and to show insufficient concern for the desires of tenant netsmen and anglers to be directly represented.

I welcome the provisions to tackle poaching in various ways. The problem is massive. Hon. Members who represent the Tweed know how serious the problem is there. An hon. Gentleman suggested that salmon enjoy an uninterrupted course along the Scottish coast until they are suddenly slaughtered in the English nets. There is a curious use of words in which a fish caught by the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) with a rod is not killed—mysteriously its life is supposed to be enhanced by its being caught by him—whereas a fish that finds its way into an English net is slaughtered. That is a strange difference in the use of language.

I was digressing, because the point made by the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Corrie) underestimated the serious extent of poaching along some sections of the Scottish coasts and which some of the provisions are intended to deal with. I welcome the attention that the Government have given to that. The provisions will require detailed examination because they represent some curtailment of civil liberty. I have to concede, as a Liberal Member who is extremely concerned about civil liberties, that existing provisions on the Scottish and English side of the border do not appear adequate to secure conviction. It is possible for somebody who, by any layman's assessment, must have been poaching to get off again and again. Clearly, the provisions need to be looked at in some detail.

I particularly welcome the decision of the Ministers, after the debates in another place, to extend the dealer licensing system to England and Wales. It would have been absurd to have dealer licensing only one side of the border. As a noble Lord said in the other place, his first act would have been to set up in Berwick, in my constituency, as an unlicensed salmon dealer with none of the restrictions that would then apply on the other side of the border. Clearly, it is essential to extend that provision to England and Wales.

I am worried about the way in which it is set out in the Bill. I hope that Ministers will look at the provisions of the Bill to see whether they can go a little further. I appreciate that the procedures will be a little slower than in Scotland because of the need to get agreement on how it will be done but I have two grievances about the way it is done in the Bill at present. The Bill gives the powers to the Minister to make orders dealing with absolutely fundamental things. It gives him the power, by order, "to create criminal offences". It also gives him the power to "make provision, . . . for the purpose of facilitating the enforcement of any provision made under this section."

Maximum offences, maximum fines and maximum prison sentences are all set out in the relevant Scottish clause. I think that the Minister must look at what I think is the impropriety of including in the Bill the power to make orders specifying what is or is not a criminal offence and what is or is not a maximum fine or prison sentence. They are fundamental things which should be on the face of the legislation.

I understand that the Minister has brought the clause into the Bill in its present form following discussions in another place, but he should have time, and if there is not time he should give himself time, to see if we can get more of the basic powers on the face of the Bill. We should leave to order some of the mechanics, administration the decisions about which bodies are involved and the time of introducing it, which I hope will be as quickly as possible because I would not want to see a gap open between the Scottish provisions and English provisions. It cannot be right if we create criminal offences by statutory instrument. That is not the way the House proceeds and we should not do so in this case.

My second doubt about the way of introducing the licensing dealer system is my worry about the privatisation of the water authorities. If the authorities are privatised it does not seem right that they should become the body which decides whether somebody should be a salmon dealer. I do not propose to enter into the issue of whether they should be privatised—we all have views on that—but it does not seem appropriate for a private water undertaking, of the kind I have experienced, to make that decision. In my constituency, the water supply is already privatised but the water authority is not. The regulatory body is publicly accountable and that must surely make sense for the dealer licensing system. In fact, I do not see that it makes sense for the functions concerned with the licensing of drift netting to be carried out by private enterprise. I cannot believe that Conservative Members who are concerned about the drift net fishery can believe that it would be right, in the long term, for those powers to proceed to a private body when it concerns the decision as to whether someone may or may not earn his living by having a salmon licence.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): Some Conservative Members have anxieties which go further. They are not wholly happy about the prospects of angling interests being preserved if privatisation takes place.

Mr. Beith: I share the hon. Gentleman's concern. It would then be difficult to restrain the amount that would be charged to anglers for their right to fish. Currently, there is a considerable amount of subsidy from the water rate income of the water authorities towards fisheries management and fisheries conservation. My own water authority — the Northumbrian water authority — puts a great deal of money into fishery management and conservation. Indeed, it has been estimated that it puts more money into that than all the Scottish district boards put together. The present system avoids the anglers' licence fees going up to as high a level as they might. Therefore, there are a number of fundamental issues here which I believe are and should remain public regulatory functions. That will have to be considered in Committee.

Although I welcome the dealer licensing scheme, I still think that we could have made a more serious attempt to consider the salmon tagging option as a way of tackling the problem. That view is shared by many people in the fishing industry. I have in my hand a salmon tag which is the essence of the regulatory scheme operated in New Brunswick in Canada. That device could have been tried here. Fishermen in the Northumbrian area have made representations to me about it. Welsh anglers have said that they would welcome it if Wales were used as a pilot area.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): We in Wales would certainly support salmon tagging. We are concerned that we shall not be able to trace poached salmon. I believe that the Bill should be called the salmon conservation Bill. We believe that measures should be undertaken to tag salmon in this way.

Mr. Beith: Obviously, I agree with my hon. Friend and with those hon. Members who at different times have pressed for a tagging experiment.

The Bill now contains, following its progress through the other place, provisions for a three-year review of all net fisheries up the east coast, including the Northumberland sea drift net fishery and all the river net fisheries up the east coast of Scotland. Some of the fishermen in my constituency have been worried about this. They have said, "We had the November measures which the Minister brought forward. We thought that we were then entering a settled period." They feel a sense of insecurity because, after three years, the issue will be brought up again. My argument to them is that I believe that the licensed drift net fishery has nothing to fear from a proper scientific examination of the basis on which net fishing is conducted along the coasts and rivers. That is one of the measures for which we have been crying out for a long time.

All sections of the salmon industry could then be told by the scientists, with some authority, "This is the position. These are the dangers. This is the amount by which the catch needs to be reduced or increased. This is the level at which you can continue to catch. We must now calculate how this can be shared." If we have the scientific basis on which to do that, I think that we can regulate the fisheries properly.

I therefore say to fishermen in my constituency that, worrying as it is always to have new dates and threats hanging over us, I see an alternative prospect. A three-year review could fully vindicate the drift net fishery and prove to be a powerful counter argument to people such as the hon. Member for Dumfries and the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) who want to phase it out completely. If we talk about phasing out the drift net fishery, we are talking about phasing out the livelihood of large numbers of people. In my part of the world, Northumbria, we are talking about employment for more then 500 people in the fisheries. We are talking about an essential part of the year-round fishery. The fishermen who go out on the small Northumbrian coble have a balance of activity over the year, fishing for salmon, lobsters and crabs which, between them, provide their fishing livelihood. We cannot ask those men to go back to the hemp nets of past years any more than we can ask the anglers to go back to some of the methods they were using in earlier years. Using hemp nets depended on night work, which the Minister has now, understandably, restricted with his new measures. I do not think that it would be reasonable to expect the type of arduous cleaning operations that went with all the old nets to be part of the present life of a fisherman, which is hazardous enough anyway.

I am convinced that tackling the problem of illegal fishing on the Tweed in Scotland and in England is likely to produce a much more significant improvement in salmon conservation than any restriction imposed on the drift net fishery. Naturally, the drift net fishery must be properly regulated. That has been happening for a number of years. If overall reductions have to be made, the drift net fishery has to take its share in them.

Mr. John MacKay: I have been listening to the hon. Gentleman with interest. He is making some valid points. I have been listening in particular to his remarks about Northumberland drift net fishing. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman must know, if he has ever gone to the Tweed valley to fish, as I have done, that the feeling there, to put it mildly——

Mr. Home Robertson: I hope that the Under-Secretary of State was not fishing in my water.

Mr. MacKay: That sedentary intervention from the hon. Gentleman shows the miserable man he really is, because he has never asked me! When I go to the Tweed valley to fish, I come across people with strong feelings about the interceptory fishery in the constituency of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). I wonder, as a gentle chide, what the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) and my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) who represent the fishermen who fish on the Tweed, think about his fishing.

Mr. Beith: My right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) and my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) represent effectively the interests of their constituents. Indeed, we have all found it possible to recognise our common interest in salmon conservation and to appreciate that regulation should apply to all fisheries. There is no more emotive an issue in my part of the world than the salmon fisheries, and broadly speaking, all those who fish for salmon think that all other categories of people who fish for salmon should not be doing so. We must achieve a balance that will ensure that salmon are available for all those who earn their living from the salmon fisheries.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): Did the hon. Gentleman note in yesterday's annual report the statement that most of the 2,300 confiscated nets were taken from the mouth of the Tweed? The report went on to refer to illegal drift net fishing off the Berwickshire coast. Let us not put all the blame on the Northumberland fishermen.

Mr. Beith: I agree. There is a large box around the Tweed which no Northumberland drift net fisher may enter to fish, and in that area we have the most serious poaching problems. A feature of the Northumberland drift net fishery is that it is, to a degree, self-regulatory in that those licensed to engage in it do not want illegal fishing to take place in the area. The report showed that many successful prosecutions had arisen from information obtained from the legal fishery. The drift net fisherman has an interest in ensuring that his fishery is properly conducted.

The Minister has visited the fishery, as did his predecessor, and has seen for himself the way in which it is regulated. The measures that he has introduced will have the effect of decreasing the take from the fishery. The fishermen have themselves asked for some of those measures to be taken. For example, the restriction that the licence-holder must be in the boat—unless he is taken ill—when fishing is taking place was suggested by the representatives of the industry on many occasions.

Some of the Bill's other provisions will cause difficulties for that fishery. For example, the night restrictions will be a problem because of variable tide times. If a boat cannot get to sea over a four or five hour span because of tide conditions, an apparently simple night restriction may extend far into the day as well. Fishermen recognise that they must accept some of these limitations if they are to have a degree of security for their future livelihood.

I remain worried over some of the Minister's powers, not because I believe that Ministers should ignore such things as new provisions affecting fishing methods in Scottish rivers and the Tweed but because the parliamentary negative procedure is an unsatisfactory instrument.

In Clause 3, for example, Ministers are given powers to make changes overnight in what is a permitted fishery. When such powers are used, hon. Members can only pray against the relevant order. The matter will doubtless be debated in Committee upstairs, not on the Floor of the House, and in such a Committee there is no real vote. At the end of the day, one can only vote saying that the Committee has considered the instrument; and if one votes to the contrary, that has no effect and, anyway, even that action is not reported to the House. If Ministers get it wrong, hon. Members will not be able properly to represent the interests of their constituents. I shall, accordingly, table amendments at a later stage to have the affirmative procedure adopted for some matters.

I hope that the Minister recognises our concern in this matter. If not, I trust that he will recognise it by lunchtime tomorrow, by which time we shall have considered in Committee upstairs the problems that have arisen over the Scottish monofilament net ban. That will reveal how frustrated hon. Members and interested parties can feel if they cannot get across their point of view.

The most important objective of the Bill ought to be to exstablish a new impetus for the management and conservation of salmon. We ought to be able to pool our commitment in order to achieve that aim. It will involve a certain amount of expenditure—that is a weakness of the Scottish provisions of the Bill—if we are properly to look after our rivers. The north-east fisheries have demonstrated that expenditure and care can increase river catches. Some of the rivers in Northumberland, like the Coquet, have shown extremely good results. These rivers are within the area affected by drift net fishing, but good management has produced good results. Good management could do a great deal for salmon conservation. I hope that this Bill will help us to achieve that aim.

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): Having listened to every speech, and having initially assumed that the Committee stage would be short, I now realise that I was completely wrong. The Committee stage will be very long; there will be a great deal to talk about.

I join my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) in expressing the hope that the Committee stage will not be too rushed. The Bill received its Second Reading in the other place only on 14 January. It is right and proper that legislation should be debated at a measured pace to allow those outside Parliament to express their views on improvements to the Bill.

I agree with the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) that drift net fishing should be properly regulated and that fishermen must accept some limitations upon their activities. It is fairly clear that drift net fishing is not properly regulated and that limitations are not accepted. Lord Home of the Hirsel reminded the other place that the admitted catch in drift nets off the north-east coast of England totals about 77,000 but that it is believed that the actual catch is more than double that figure. There must therefore be scope for proper regulation of drift net fishing.

Mr. Tinn: I am interested in the noble Lord's assertion, but can the hon. Gentleman tell me what evidence the noble Lord or anybody else was able to produce to support the assertion?

Mr. Morrison: No, I cannot, but I suspect that the noble Lord based those figures on certain information. Even if he did not, he reinforced the argument of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed that it is essential that we should be fully informed and that there should be a proper scientific basis for the review that is provided for in clause 33.

I am surprised that on a Bill that deals with salmon management reference should be made to an increase in democracy. I am not sure that that will help the salmon. It is much more important that we should get on with dealing with salmon management.

Salmon are good to eat and exciting to catch. Thus they are born into a dangerous and unfriendly world. Modern technology is now available to man. Therefore, we must exercise control over our ability to catch salmon, if they are not to go the same way as the dodo or, at best, reach the dangerous state that was once reached by the American buffalo and that now faces the Arabian oryx.

A laissez-faire policy is no option if we are to retain salmon. In fact, such a policy is no option in any sphere. Fortunately, that has been realised for a long time, even though vested interest has often vied with vested interest about how and when man-made laws should intervene to protect what has been called the king of fish. Of course, it is not with man alone that the salmon has to cope. At every stage of its development in the river it is subject to predation from different types of bird and from other fish. The salmon has naturally learnt to cope with all of that. It is only when it has been in the sea for some time that the odds become stacked against it. There it runs into the first triumph or disaster of modern detection and technology.

I have a book entitled "The Salmon", published as recently as 1959, whose chapter on the salmon in the sea starts with the words:

> "Once the smolts leave our rivers, we see little or nothing of them: we do not know where they go to; there is no evidence to show that they stay near our coasts."

The author of that book was described as one of the world's greatest experts on the salmon. That was in 1959. Would that his words were still so, but they are not. Maturing salmon have been discovered in the north Atlantic where 30 years ago no salmon were netted. In 1985 the Greenlanders had a quota of 852 tonnes—a quota which I believe they did not achieve—and the Faroese fishery yields an estimated 120,000 fish. Small wonder, therefore, that between 1967 and 1984 world catches of Atlantic salmon have declined from 10,400 tonnes to 5,600 tonnes.

The first and possibly the most important consequence of the Bill, when enacted, will be that by demonstrating our concern and action at home we will ensure that the British voice will carry more weight in international councils concerned with the conservation of salmon. Those fish which escape the high seas fisheries must face the offshore nets and, above all, for many salmon the north-east coast fishery. I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Minister of State has announced a weekly 60-hour close time for the north-east drift net fishery and also that the other place has already much improved the Bill by introducing in clause 33 a three-year review of the fishery and the insistence in clause 32 that only a licensee and not his agent may fish or net.

I should like three or possibly four additions to this part of the Bill. I say "possibly four" after considering again clause 33. This is why I was trying to interrupt my hon. Friend when he was introducing the Bill. In the context of the review, the Minister of Agriculture and the Secretary of State for Scotland have to take account of the need to ensure that sufficient salmon return to the river to spawn and that fishing for salmon by means of nets is properly managed.

There is no reference in that clause to rod fishermen. I should have thought that they should be included because, as I understand it, it is not necessary for a huge number of salmon to return to a river to provide as many smolts as the river can carry. So it is not only for spawning purposes that we wish salmon to return to rivers, we also want enough salmon to return to meet the needs of rod fishermen. That point should be taken into account in the three-year review. If I am correct, clause 33 is deficient. But that apart, I should like there to be a phased abolition and prohibition of nylon monofilament nets. I agree with the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed that such nets are much more efficient than their predecessors. However, they do untold damage to untold numbers of salmon, many of which will undoubtedly die in the sea. Although the fishery itself may be traditional, there is nothing traditional about nylon monofilament nets.

I should like to see the extension of all weekend close periods for netting in line with what has been done already with the 60-hour provision. I should like there to be powers in the Bill to control netting when rivers are low, a point which has been made strongly already. There is no doubt that many salmon bide their time in the sea or the estuary when the river is low. The evidence is that the proportion of net-caught salmon to rod-caught increases dramatically in drought years. I do not know why the Government have not yet been prepared to accept the evidence which has been produced by some water authorities and which is now beginning to become available from others.

Before following the salmon out of the sea and, once again, up its river of origin, I wish to refer to another of its predators, the seal. I know that the seal is an emotive animal, but allegedly the United Kingdom grey seal population has increased to about 84,000 from the 24,000 at the time of the heyday of Scottish salmon fishing. Apparently, one seal consumes about 2 tonnes of fish per annum. That fact emerged during debates on the Conservation of Seals Bill of 1970. Obviously not all of that fish is salmon, but the increase in the seal population is bound seriously to affect the stock of salmon. This issue cannot be shirked and seals must be sensibly culled.

I have no doubt that the proposals to deter poaching and the licensing of dealers throughout Great Britain will be beneficial offshore and up river. I think that the other place did a good job by including England and Wales in dealer licensing. Likewise, I believe that the reorganisation of the system and the constitution of district salmon fishery boards are welcome measures, but they would perhaps be more effective if they were grant aided, as the previous Conservative Government suggested in their White Paper of as long ago as 1971.

Salmon fishing is of enormous benefit to the economy of Scotland, and surely that is justification enough for some grant aid. The amount of extra money which salmon fishing can bring into the Scottish economy is enormous and some of that is creamed off in taxation. I should have thought it a reasonable quid pro quo for the Government to provide grant aid for the district salmon fishery boards.

This is a useful and helpful Bill. It was described originally as a "wee. . . tim'rous beastie", but it has been much improved by another place. I hope that the House will improve it a little more. Even then, the Government cannot rest on their laurels. All credit to the Government for introducing the Bill, but the salmon is a resource of such infinite importance for food and sport that constant surveillance of the salmon stock, especially in home waters and in the Atlantic, must continue and action must be taken whenever necessary.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): In the Gracious Speech at the beginning of the Session, about the only reference to Scotland was a commitment by the Government to introduce a Bill to protect salmon. In the light of the problems facing the people of Scotland, that tells us something about the Government's priorities

In the debates on the Bill in another place, the majority of the participants declared their interest. Many of them are involved in salmon fisheries as owners of rivers or estates. The Bill does not deal with the underlying fundamental issue of the feudal system which allows these landowners to claim ownership of wild fish.

It would not be in order for me to develop this point now, but I submit that there ought to be community involvement in the fisheries, which would protect fish and allow more reasonable access for the public.

I have sympathy with people who are stocking their rivers and are facing depredation from poachers. I have no sympathy with poachers who place explosives or poisons in rivers. They deserve everything that is coming to them. That type of poaching is unknown in the salmon rivers of the Western Isles and the north. The references that I have heard have all related to the lowlands.

There have been references to the old "one for the pot" poachers, but nobody known to me can recall such a tolerant attitude on the part of owners. As the hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) said, it is an absolute figment of the imagination that landowners give a benevolent wink when they see a man coming along with a salmon to feed his family.

The Minister said in his opening remarks that this legislation is aimed at those who are getting away with the wholesale poaching of salmon. Perhaps very few of us would take exception to that, but this Bill is aimed at one man and one fish just as much as it is aimed at those who are going in for wholesale salmon poaching.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I trust that the right hon. Gentleman is not suggesting that poaching is not rife in Scottish salmon fisheries. Certainly on the Tay, which is largely in my constituency, poaching is a great problem.

Mr. Stewart: It would be ridiculous of me to deny that salmon poaching occurs. Of course there is some poaching on the Tay, and probably on every other salmon river in Scotland. I do not deny that for a moment.

The Salmon Conservancy—I do not know what body that is, but presumably with a name like that it has some interest in salmon—says:

> "There are no effective, long-term conservation measures such as increased weekly and annual close times for the nets, restrictions on all types of salmon fishing in times of crisis such as drought".

Of course not. This Bill is not about conservation. It is to protect — if that is the right word — the rights of landowners. That is what it is all about.

Netting is one of the obsessions of the landlords, although they do not mind netting their waters when they want a fast buck. I have seen them at it. They have induced the Government to introduce a prohibition on monofilament gill nets, although many Scottish fishermen are using such nets for legitimate fishing of flatfish and crayfish. That is the problem with which the Government will be faced. Despite what the Minister said earlier, fishermen's organisations in Scotland complain that they were not consulted before the ban on monofilament nets was introduced.

The clauses dealing with the district salmon boards are totally unsatisfactory. To quote the Salmon Conservancy again:

> "The balance of influence on the boards still remains in the hands of the major proprietorial interests whose eligibility for election to the board is determined by the value of the fishery. Co-opted anglers and tenant netsmen have restricted powers only."

In no circumstances can the co-opted members outnumber the proprietors.

There are clauses in the Bill that would be repugnant to natural justice and subversive of the long-standing legal axiom that one is innocent until proved guilty. In another place the noble Lord Grimond warned against departing any further than necessary from what he referred to as established principles of "British law."

I know about Scottish and English law, although I do not know of British law. However, I know what point he was trying to make. Clause 21(3) provides:

> "It shall be lawful to convict a person . . . on the evidence of one witness."

I submit that that is a change in Scottish law. Clause 22 says that if:

"the court is not satisfied that the accused is guilty of the offence charged but is satisfied that he is guilty of another of these offences, it may acquit him of the offence charged but find him guilty of the other offence and he shall then be liable to the same punishment as for that other offence."

I should like to hear the Secretary of State's view on that as a lawyer. No wonder Lord Gray of Contin said that it was "a useful provision". The Salmon Conservancy says:

"the reversal of the onus of proof in the new regulations relating to possession has implications which go considerably beyond the salmon world".

The House should bear that in mind.

There is nothing in the Bill about the new powers for water bailiffs. Clause 19(1)(f) refers to powers of entry and search. There are grave concerns about those powers. I warn the Government that if water bailiffs are to have more powers than the police, who are trained in adherence to legal measures and at least have been approved of as respectable before entering the force, the Government are concocting a recipe for real trouble. Some of the estates have been far from particular in their recruitment of water bailiffs. Clause 19(1)(f) provides that an order may "provide as to the exercise of powers of entry and search by water bailiffs and persons appointed by the Secretary of State under section 10(5) of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries (Protection) (Scotland) Act 1951."

It seems to me that we are being sold a pig in a poke. Although the Minister said that there would be no change, the Secretary of State will give water bailiffs draconian powers.

This Bill is tailored for a sectional interest. The owners of the estates have real power. No marches or demonstrations for them — they intercede with the Government to defend their interests, and a Bill is provided for them. The Bill has nothing to do with conservation. It is offensive to natural justice. It is a landlords' charter with oppressive and despotic connotations.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): I shall be brief, as much of what I wanted to say has been said. I, too, welcome the Bill, and especially the improvements made in another place.

It would be unfair to ignore the contribution made by the briefing and discussion organised by bodies representative of anglers rather than proprietors, such as the Salmon and Trout Association and the British Field Sports Society. It would be quite wrong to suppose that the Bill is a landlords' charter. It sets out to protect, and does protect, the interests of ordinary anglers as well as riparian proprietors.

I am grateful to the Government Front Bench in another place for the concessions that it made, although I hope that the Front Bench here will not think me churlish if I say that there is still room for improvement. There is no evident need to rush the Bill into Committee. It is clear that some of the insertions made with the Government's agreement lack the polish which a Committee would expect. If the Government's business managers feel no compelling need to take the Bill into Committee for one month, I do not think that any hon. Member would complain.

There is room for improvement in the extent to which the Bill contributes to conservation. I hope that we shall be able to establish that it is — for it is — a major contribution in the war against poaching north and south of the border. That is good, but the Bill does not yet carry the seal of approval of those who want Britain to make a positive and conscious contribution to conserving the north Atlantic salmon. I hope that Ministers can remedy that deficiency at later stages of the Bill. Difficult as it may be to apply quotas to a mixed fishery such as we have in the United Kingdom, we must go a good deal further if we are to convince our partners in the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation. The Bill must deal with poaching in England and Wales as well as in Scotland.

In Committee it must be shown to be a workable Bill, and clause 28 will need some fairly close attention, because it is merely sketched out at present. We do not know what machinery there is to be to operate a dealer licensing system in England and Wales, especially in those areas where the water authorities are not used to running game fisheries and where there is the additional complication of the ultimate prospect of privatisation, which raises in dealer licensing and in the operation of an effective bailiffing system all sorts of problems, about which we shall need to ask Ministers some fairly searching questions, and on which I must say we shall expect some fairly convincing answers.

Although it may be true that the Welsh water authority, for instance, would like to run a tagging scheme, which most of us would regard as impractical in any other part of the country, if it feels that it needs powers to operate that scheme, I hope that it will not hesitate to come to some member of the Committee with an amendment that can be tested in debate. A tagging scheme elsewhere in the United Kingdom will never be practical, for reasons that are fairly well established. Therefore, we must have a workable dealer licensing scheme. We must also have a system which ensures that magistrates courts understand the consequences of changing the onus of proof and will apply it fairly and effectively.

Other parts of the Bill need improvement with regard to England and Wales. The restriction on the use of nets by endorsees is something that might be usefully extended to the coastal areas of Wales, around the Towy, Usk and Dee. The Dee is one big fish trap nowadays. I am sure that the Welsh water authority would like to be able to do something about it. It needs powers to enable it to act. It could be given power to restrict the use of licensed nets. That is something that we can discuss in Committee.

Not surprisingly, the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) said very little in his speech on the amendment. It is all very well to complain that a salmon Bill is not an appropriate measure for dealing with the problems of the sea bass. I am glad that he has a grasp of that fact, but when he talks about adequate provision for anglers or for the wider public interest, I think he should tell the House what he means by referring to the urgent need to conserve salmon and other fish species. If the hon. Gentleman thinks that the Bill is insufficient, he should say what more he wants done. In particular, when he talks about protecting the environment of rivers and estuaries for the benefit of the whole nation's sporting, recreation and environmental interests, he should say whether those words mean anything or whether they are just waffle and padding.

Having listened to the hon. Gentleman, I acquit him of knowing anything about angling. His words merely raise the spectre of the professional recreation propagandist. They bring to mind the study which the Middlesex polytechnic did for the Welsh water authority, where 49 per cent. of those interviewed were canoeists, who are by no means friends of the angler or likely to be interested in conserving salmon. That sort of waffle and the meaningless verbiage of the Opposition amendment would be best not pressed to a Division, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends will not do so.

I would rather see the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason), who understands these matters and would make a useful contribution to the debate, serving on the Committee and making a constructive and non-political approach to the problem, which is what I can promise will happen from these Benches, than have an ignorant absentee landlord on the Committee.

11.9 pm

Mr. James Tinn (Redcar): One thing that should and I hope does unite us all is concern for the conservation of salmon. I know that that concern is shared by my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), with whom I have discussed my contribution this evening, and I am glad to see him with us. It is particularly shared by the north-east drift net fishermen, with whom I have discussed these matters and who have been so much maligned, perhaps not this evening but certainly in the other place.

In the course of a speech which was otherwise moderate and unexceptionable, my eyebrows rose more than slightly when the noble Lord Gray, on moving the Second Reading in another place, spoke about falling stocks, poaching and so on. He defended the Government against accusations of not doing sufficient in the Bill and pointed out that existing legislation had largely been ineffective. He said that it had stood the test of time.

"despite the effects of such activities as high seas fishing and large-scale poaching".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 January 1986; Vol. 469, c. 991.]

To lump together those two activities, one entirely illegal and the other a historical and legal pastime, as though they were equally worthy of condemnation caused my eyebrows, and perhaps my blood pressure, to rise.

No one is more aware of the need for restrictions on poaching than the sea fishermen of the north-east coast. They brought home to me the point that simply banning night fishing would do nothing other than assist the poachers. Legitimate fishing can be stopped, but, without spending a great deal more on policing and protection, sea poachers will not be stopped.

Concern for the fishermen of the north-east emerged even more clearly from the speech—the first of many that touched on this—of the noble Lord Home of the Hirsel. He said——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. Only Ministers in the House of Lords can be quoted here.

Mr. Tinn: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In the other place the point was explicitly made that north-east drift net fishing should be modified and phased out. Indeed, we heard that from the Labour Benches tonight. That justifies the concern that has been expressed to me.

The fishermen of the north-east coast accept the need for restrictions. They observe them and carry them out, but they want them to be effective and fair. Above all, they do not want them to be based on some assumption that salmon have a nationality and carry passports, that because they happen to be born in a river north of the border they are Scottish, although they may then leave, swim halfway across the world seas and spend most of their life off Greenland or wherever before they come back. It must not be thought that if some English fisherman then dares to catch them he should look at their passport and pass them on with the best of good wishes to the Tweed, or wherever.

Accusations about the harmful effects on the North sea fisheries on the Scottish stocks do not seem to be based on any evidence. Dr. Derek Mills of the fishing and forestry department of Edinburgh university was until recently a critic of English fishermen, holding them responsible for declining stocks. Now he exonerates them and attributes declining stocks to a natural change in the fishing cycle. The fishermen south of the border accept the need for restrictions and will go along with them if they are equitable and fairly based. They should not be biased against those whose living and the living of their families over generations have depended on the fish and in favour of those who may have bought only time-sharing rights to Scottish rivers. The fishermen south of the border would not regard that as equitable.

I suggest to my Scottish colleagues, in all frankness and kindness, that, while they are entitled to look for ways of conserving the stocks, further action needs to be taken north of the border. They need to spend more than £400,000—I believe that that is a niggardly sum—on policing and protecting their own fish. A shoestring budget of £400,000 is totally inadequate to prevent the widespread netting of fish at night.

The towing of nets along the river is illegal, but two years ago when evidence in the form of a television video film was presented to a previous Minister, no action was taken. Something should be done about that sort of practice. I understand that the Scottish licence fee varies with the catch. This should be studied because, without wishing to be cynical, it encourages people to understate the size of their catch.

I draw the House's attention to the fact that the stock of salmon in English rivers is increasing and that of Scottish rivers is declining. Perhaps the fault lies with malpractice on Scottish rivers, and perhaps something more could be done—as we do at Kilder hatchery—to restock the rivers, which benefits all rivers.

It seems to me that the accusations against the north-east fishermen, where they are not based on pure self-interest, are due to the fact that the fishermen are too effective. They are effective, and that is what they are in the business for. The same accusation could be levelled against the West Indians, Australians or New Zealanders, yet nobody has proposed that we should phase them out of cricket because they are too effective.

Conservation should be the responsibility of us all. It should be continuing practice running from Greenland, the breeding place, and back to the birth place, the Scottish rivers and the English rivers in which many salmon are born. This is the problem, and it should be tackled. I am afraid that, if the views of many noble Lords in another place were given effect to, it would be the north-east fishermen who would be the endangered species and not the salmon.

Mr. Neville Trotter (Tynemouth): I shall also concentrate on commercial fishing on the north-east coast.

I remind the House that this is a long-established industry that goes back for at least a century. It is legitimate, wellregulated and one of the best controlled of all fisheries. It makes an important contribution to the livelihood of the coastal areas in the north east, represented by the hon. Member for Redcar (Mr. Tinn), myself and other hon. Members who may wish to take part in the debate. In North Shields and Cullercoats in my constituency employment in this industry is important. It is not just salmon fishing but fishing in general with which we are concerned, because the former cannot be taken out of context with the rest of the industry. It is a seasonal activity, and it would be ruinous for the other stocks in the area if the fishermen could not fish for salmon at that time of the year.

Ours is a much maligned industry that is unjustly blamed for anything that seems to go wrong in the rivers, especially in Scotland. It was blamed by Scottish speaker after speaker in the other place who was seeking to cut down on our fishing for the benefit of their anglers. I cannot see, if I were a salmon, why it would be any better to be caught by a hook than by the net. A salmon caught is a salmon out of the stock.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): is not the difference that in Scotland the rivers are being restocked in the hope that the salmon will come back, but someone else is ensuring that they do not come back, and there is constant restocking without contribution from the north east?

Mr. Trotter: I am glad that my hon. Friend raised that point. I intended to mention the question of stocking on Northumbrian rivers and will now do so. In 1980, 252,000 new fish were put into the Northumbrian rivers, in 1981, 400,000, in 1982, 250,000, in 1983, 290,000, and in 1984, 286,500, which is a total of some one a half million over that four-year period. A large amount of new stock was put into the rivers in the north-east of England.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Is not the difference between catching fish by net and catching them by rod that there must be a way to tell where they have come from? If fish are caught in a river, it makes the management of stocks in that river easier. Therefore, the conservation of the species is more possible.

Mr. Trotter: My point is that, in looking at the future of the salmon fishing stocks, we should look at all aspects of it, and that includes the numbers that are caught and killed on the rivers by line and rod fishermen. One noble lord said in debate that after 50 years' experience of fishing in over 50 rivers, he had noticed that the deadliness of the line and rod was a great deal more than it used to be. He referred to much more clever baits, and from what he said monofilament is as deadly when used by rod fishermen as it is when used by net fishermen.

We already have considerable restrictions on commercial fishing on the north-east coast. The number of licences has fallen from 200 in 1970 to 120. We have already heard that restrictions are to be placed on who can operate the boats—no longer will the endorsee of a licence be able to go out on his own without the licensee. There has long been a closed season, and now the restrictions on weekend fishing are to be tightened up and there is to be a significant eight-hour ban at night. A great deal is being asked of the north-east coast fishermen, and I believe that they will accept the restrictions—reluctantly, but as something with which they will have to put up. Enough is enough, and we should not further penalise those carrying on a legitimate and important commercial activity.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said that the poaching in the Tweed may be due to the fact that no legalised fishing is taking place there, and there are no legalised fishermen to report poachers. On the rest of the north-east coast the licences certainly act as very effective policemen in the prevention of illegal fishing. Nobody knows how many fish are caught illegally off the Scottish coast, but it is clear that poaching there is very great. Indeed, it has been said that the poaching in Scotland is on a systematic, continuous and massive scale. It is estimated that the illegal catch in Scottish waters is twice as great as the whole of the licensed catch in the north-east. That certainly needs further inquiry, investigation and action.

I find it hard to understand how it was that in the lengthy debate in the other place there was no reference to the number of fish being caught by the commercial fishermen in Scotland. When I look at the figures for the relative catches, as an accountant, that seems to me to be an astonishing omission. There has been a tremendous amount of comment about the amount of salmon caught off the north-east coast of England, but we hear nothing about the far greater amount caught off the north-east coast of Scotland. They do not catch the fish in the same way there, as they do not go out in boats like our English fishermen. They catch the salmon in nets set out from the shore, but the effect is just the same for the salmon. Indeed, it is a great deal worse for the salmon, as many of these nets are set not in the sea but across the mouths of the rivers and the estuaries; and the fish have far less chance of escaping from that form of netting than they do in the North sea.

The figures for this shore-based commercial fishing on the east coast of Scotland make very interesting reading. The rod and line fishermen in Scotland caught 65,000 salmon in 1982 and in that year the north-east commercial fishermen caught 50,000 salmon. The interesting point is that the Scottish commercial fishermen caught no fewer than 271,000 salmon. We heard nothing about this huge catch from the Scotsmen in the other place, who were so keen to attack the English fishermen, yet it is clearly by far the biggest problem facing the river fishermen in Scotland. How can they overlook that activity in their own area when they complain all the time about ours?

I welcome an inquiry into the salmon industry's future and it is sensible that the proposal in clause 33 to prepare such a report includes the activity off the north-east coast of Scotland. I will in due course read the conclusions of that report with a great deal of interest.

Reference has been made to the effect that seals have on salmon fishing. Of course, it is difficult to estimate how much fish is poached, and it is even more difficult to estimate how much salmon is eaten by the seals. One can estimate what an average seal eats in total fish in a year, but it must be hard to analyse its diet between the different types of fish that it eats. It must, however, be true that many salmon end their days as a meal, not as a tasty dish on a table, but inside a seal. The seal population is very large. There is an estimate that the seal population off the Farne Islands off the Northumbrian coast is some 8,010. That seems to be a remarkably precise estimate. Perhaps we might settle for an estimate of 8,000. It has been estimated that those 8,000 seals eat 15,930 tons of fish in a year—again surprisingly accurate—let us say 16,000 tons is consumed. That figure ties up with the estimate made by the hon. Member for Redcar of two tons of fish a year per seal. That is a very large amount of fish, when we bear in mind that the total salmon catch in a year in Scotland, by all means, is about 1,000 tons. We should not overlook the effect that the large number of seals has on the salmon fishing and the Government must give attention to this problem.

I have referred to the annual stocking of the rivers in the north-east of England with large numbers of fish. Hundreds of thousands of fish have been added to those rivers each year and many have been the contributions made by the north-east fishermen.

In conclusion, I should like to refer to comments made to me in correspondence by my right hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South (Mr. MacGregor) when he was the Minister responsible for fisheries in England and Wales. Last year my right hon. Friend said in a letter to me that a report prepared for his Department showed that—

"the total effect on Scottish East Coast catches in 1977 was only about 6·4 per cent. . . . the effect on total spawning stocks in these Scottish waters would probably be even less than this figure."

In another letter sent to me at about the same time, my right hon. Friend said he had "seen nothing to support the statement that the North East drift net fishery is putting at risk the survival of the Scottish East-coast salmon industry or of the salmon themselves."

In my judgment, there is a real threat facing the commercial salmon fisherman as a result of the dramatic explosion in the production of salmon by fish farming. Obviously, if the price of salmon at the counter goes down that will effect the livelihood of the commercial fishermen and the huge increases in production are only likely to reduce the price. In 1985, 7,000 tonnes of salmon were produced by fish farming, whereas in Scotland the whole catch that year was about 1,000 tonnes. In other words, seven times as much was produced from fish farming, and that was twice as much as was produced the previous year. Estimates made by one of my noble Friends in his ministerial capacity show that that figure could double again in the next two years to 14,000 tonnes. That will pose a considerable problem for the Northumbrian commercial salmon fishermen, who do not need in addition to be unfairly treated as a result of pressure from Scotland.

There is a great tradition of commercial salmon fishing on the north-east coast, and the hardy fishermen there earn their living by their hard work often in atrocious conditions. These hardworking men deserve to be allowed to continue in that tradition.

11.30 pm

Mr. Martin J. O'Neill (Clackmannan): The debate has been busier and longer tha most hon. Members expected. I have spent several days recently sitting through debates about the defence of the realm, but it seems that more interest is generated in the defence of the salmon and salmon fishing interests than in our national defence. Certainly the time that the debates took in the other place suggests that it is a major preoccupation there.

The Minister said that the Bill had three aims: the modernisation and improvement of administrative arrangements, the introduction of greater flexibility into salmon fishing regulations, and the inclusion of further measures to combat poaching. I have had representations from the Forth district board in Scotland, and I know that they have been made on an all-party basis to the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth), who has the upper reaches of the river in his constituency.

The board's fundamental misgiving is the glaring omission from the Bill of adequate financial provision to secure its objectives. Certainly the imposition on all management boards of new responsibilities without adequate funding will place further burdens on ratepayers who must meet the cost of the boards. In this case the ratepayers are the licensees—the people who own the fishing rights. Some of them are not landlords but merely tenants and people of modest means who find it increasingly difficult to meet the demands, especially after the revaluation botch-up which has created considerable difficulties for some of my constituents who are working fishermen, not landed aristocrats.

Some misgivings have been expressed about the lack of definition of the right to participate in the boards. There is no qualification for those with previous convictions. They are not debarred from participating in the fishing management boards. There is no scrutiny. Providing an individual owns the land or is a tenant, he can, by one of the means identified by the Minister, achieve membership of a board. I hope that that matter will be examined in Committee. I doubt whether I can participate in the Committee debates, and I wish to make it clear, in case any Labour Whips are around, that I am not interested in attending that stage of the proceedings. I take the point of my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) that once the Whips are on the move it is difficult to get them off one's back.

I do not propose to offer the Whips the flexibility which the Bill hopes to achieve on the issue of the seasons. It has been put to me by fishermen in my constituency that the opportunity to fish for salmon in February 1986 has been rather empty because of the inclemency of the weather. It may be that on the basis of experience this year we shall be able to move the dates from February to March and from August to September. I do not know how that would meet the demands of conservation, but some of the fisherman of my area feel that it would certainly be of assistance for fishing on the Forth.

Much has been made of the matter of poaching. The quotation from The Guardian today has been amply used concerning the tremendous level of poaching on the Tweed and the evidence that the poaching is organised crime with large sums involved. As I have said, it seems that the attention of the authorities has been directed towards the large poacher and is moving away from the small poacher. If that is the case, we shall have to wait and see. However, many of us feel that the enthusiasm and tenacity of the bailiffs in pursuing all poachers has been such that any small-time poacher who thinks that he will have an easy ride in the future is probably kidding himself and will have an unhappy awakening, no matter how sentimentally or affectionately we may view them.

We have had a discussion on nets, and a point which may be for the consideration of the Committee is the sale of nets. Much is made of the type of net, but I should have thought that a closer examination could be made of the people who seek to purchase nets. The display of a licence or the exposure of some form of bona fides should be made to the seller or manufacturer of nets. That would go some way towards preventing nets from getting into the hands of poachers.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, because it will save me making a contribution. Does the hon. Gentleman share my concern that there have been instances in the Stirling area of nets which have been confiscated by the sheriff court from poachers being resold by the sheriff clerk at a discount price although they were illegal drift nets?

Mr. O'Neill: There is a case in that instance for the destruction of the nets. I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's enthusiasm for the defrayal of any tax imposition, but we must welcome small conversions, whatever form they take and on whatever occasions they arise. We must be grateful for the small mercy that we have seen a change in the hon. Gentleman's attitude at least on this form of privatisation. There ought to be closer scrutiny of the sale and destruction of confiscated nets. It would be helpful if that matter was explored in Committee.

Anxieties have been expressed on both sides of the House about many of the powers which have been vested not only in the Secretary of State but in the bailiffs. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) developed that helpfully for all concerned. It is important that, if we are to increase the rights and responsibilities of bailiffs, we should make provision for better training for them. If they are to appear in court and their testimony is to be afforded greater weight than in the past, those individuals should be adequately equipped and trained to state their case. If their evidence is based on what can only be regarded in Scottish terms as minimal corroboration, even greater responsibility must rest on them. The authority with which they speak can only be enhanced if they have adequate training. A policeman who goes into the witness box to give evidence is better trained and equipped for his responsibilities than many of the bailiffs in Scotland. In some areas, bailiffs have been appointed simply because no one else would do the job. Their payment is not adequate. All in all, it is a very casual arrangement.

The Bill is viewed by the Opposition with some suspicion. We recognise the need for it, but we are always suspicious when the vested interests which the Government nakedly and openly represent greet legislation with the enthusiasm that this legislation received in the other place. We should remind ourselves that the main purpose of the Bill is to arrest the decline in stock and to ensure that we can prove to other countries where we are seeking quotas that we can allow the fish to swim to our waters and then can apply effective conservation methods. If we can ensure that this legislation achieves those aims, we shall have gone some way towards helping those people such as my constituents who eke out a modest income by catching fish in rivers such as the Forth.

Many of us still have some misgivings about the nature of the organisation, the unrepresentative arrangements for the fishing boards and the possible threats posed to civil liberties if the full powers afforded by the Bill are exercised in other than a sparing and sensitive way.

It is 21 years since Hunter was asked to examine this matter. A considerable time has elapsed before the legislation reached this stage. Even if we have to wait another 100 years, I extend my good will to Committee members. I hope that they ensure that the improvements I have suggested are embodied in the form which I think everyone wants.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): I am glad that the hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) has given a cautious welcome to the Bill. I assume that the Labour Front Bench will now drop its opposition. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] I am sorry that the reason that persuaded the hon. Member for Clackmannan has not yet affected his colleagues on the Labour Front Bench. What a shame.

In contrast, I should like to congratulate my colleagues on the Front Bench on the way in which they have presented the Bill. I congratulate the Government on the fact that they have agreed to a number of amendments in another place which have strengthened the Bill. However, I should like to emphasise strongly that there is a great deal of hostility to the idea that the Bill should be considered in Committee before the many people outside the House and hon. Members have time to consider the amendments made by the other place.

As many of us have said, this is possibly the last occasion on which we shall be able to consider a Bill of this kind. It would be a shame to dissipate the good will which my hon. Friends have acquired merely to suit the convenience of the party managers. I suspect that, if any people are pressing for early consideration of the legislation, it is them.

I particularly welcome the Government's decision to review the effects of north-east coast drift netting and netting in Scottish and estuarial waters. The more I listen to the debate the more I realise how wise the Government are to take those two controversial issues together and so, I hope, avoid a clash between north and south of the border.

I also hope that the evidence that we shall amass will make us realise that there must be give in the north-east and in the estuarial waters. We cannot go on in the way we have been, in the light of the figures that have been given. It is clear that action must be taken, but it must be taken on a fair basis, and I welcome, for example, the extension of dealer licensing to England and Wales. While it may be said that the Bill does not go far enough, what has been done is based on common sense principles.

I was concerned when the Minister referred—such references have been made in the past—to what he believed to be facts which, in his judgment, did not support the view expressed by hon. Members on both sides that a serious problem existed with Atlantic salmon.

The Minister argued that compared with statistics of 30 years ago, there were probably no fewer salmon in our waters today. He said that we were merely in a cyclical situation. One can play with the figures, and one must examine closely what proportion is salmon and what proportion is grilse. No ghillie I have met would subscribe to the view that things have not changed. Most believe that the situation has deteriorated.

Mr. Bill Walker: More people are fishing.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: My hon. Friend is right, but world catches of Atlantic salmon, as the Salmon and Trout Association reports, have declined—from 10,400 tonnes in 1967 to 5,400 tonnes in 1984—and Scottish catches have dropped by 50 per cent. in the last 25 years. That, according to the salmon conservancy experts, clearly shows a crisis of stock decline.

We are not the sole judges of the situation. There is worldwide concern. Hence the setting up of NASCO, the North Atlantic Salmon Conservancy Organisation, and the attitude of the Americans and Canadians to what they believe to be a serious situation. Little wonder that the Atlantic Salmon Trust, which is not prone to exaggeration, said:

"It is not at all clear that Whitehall fully understands the new dimensions of the world salmon situation yet . . . through the EEC being a signatory . . . the United Kingdom has a clear responsibility."

The Canadian publication of 1984, "Atlantic Salmon Management Plan: Major Elements", stated:

"The Department of Fisheries and Oceans will continue to seek a reduction in the quota for the West Greenland salmon fishery . . . Canada will not reduce its interception of salmon bound for United States waters unless of course Greenland reduces the amount of salmon reaching Canadian waters."

The Danes have said that they will not reduce Greenland fishing quotas, which have already been reduced, until the United Kingdom reduces its drift netting in England and Wales and its activities in the estuarial waters of Scotland.

For those reasons, the Minister's remark that we should not exaggerate these matters was not convincing. Even if we found it convincing, no other country would. We are all very concerned. It is little wonder, therefore, that people ask the Government to make more radical proposals.

I shall make a few suggestions which ought to convince the British people and the people of other countries that we are serious about salmon conservation. If there is to be a review of north-east drift netting and Scottish estuarial netting, why cannot it be extended to a review of the whole of British waters? It is not just a north-east or a Scottish estuarial matter. If one of the hon. Members with a Welsh constituency catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, he will probably emphasise that point.

If we cannot persuade the Government to extend the review, I hope that the wording of the clause which provides for a limited review will be extended to take into account the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison): that we are not just concerned with reviewing whether a sufficient number of salmon return to spawn in rivers, although that is fundamental to the Bill, but that note should be taken of the suggestion that was made in another place that "sufficient" is too vague a word and that we must be much more concerned about ensuring that the optimum number of salmon return to the rivers to spawn.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food announced, much to our pleasure, on 7 November 1985 the standardisation of a weekly close for nets of 60 hours in the north-east drift net fishery. That standardisation ought to be extended throughout Great Britain. The Scottish close time is now from midday on Saturday to 6 am on Monday, a total of only 42 hours. Many hon. Members wish that period to be further extended. The Salmon Conservation Group argues that the weekly close time for nets must be increased to 72 hours and that the annual close time for nets must be increased to 212 days. I think that a total of 168 days is provided for in the Bill. The group makes the point that reduced netting would leave more salmon in the rivers. That is true, but it is no part of my case to try to put rods men against nets men. If we are to have a national salmon conservation policy, we must extend the closed periods and make them applicable throughout the length and breadth of the United Kingdom.

There is also the question of netting at low water or in periods of drought. I hope that the Government will take powers to allow the restriction of netting in periods of drought. I have spoken to people who have personal experience of it and I saw the effects of netting last year in very poor drought conditions. It puts the salmon at tremendous risk.

The Government say that the water authorities have provided no evidence and that they have not yet approached the Government. That may be so, but that is not the same as saying that the evidence does not exist. We know that estuarial conditions vary, as do the conditions in one river compared with another. The Spey, for example, has no estuary. There is a hole in the shingle; that is where the fish go. When the water is low, the fish are not vulnerable to netting.

I hope that the Government will ask the water authorities to co-operate and tell us what is the effect of low water in their estuaries. The Salmon and Trout Association informs us that at least one water authority has been able to show a relationship between catches by rod and nets over a 30-year period. It informs us that in normal times it is of the order of one rod-caught salmon to three net-caught salmon. In drought years the ratio went up to between six and 11 net-caught salmon for each salmon caught by rod. I am glad to note that the association will be seeking further data. If it is proved, as I believe it will be, that persistent drought conditions have a serious effect on salmon stocks, the Government should have ready in hand in the legislation power to lay before Parliament measures which will permit water authorities or district salmon fishing boards to introduce restrictions on salmon netting operations in periods of low water flow in rivers and estuaries.

I could make other points, but those are the ones that particularly concern me. If the Government give enough time to collect the voices before going into Committee and pay heed to some of the points that have been made on both sides of the House, we can expect the Bill to be substantially improved.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): The desire to speak diminishes as the hour approaches midnight, so I shall be brief. I virtually took a degree on the Hunter report. I came into office about a year and half after it had been published. Nothing had been done about it, and my first task was to spend a long time on it. I produced two solutions, one of which did not get past my immediate lord and master; the other was thrown out by a Cabinet Sub-Committee. I might have rescued it had we not lost the election in 1970, but that is by the way.

My solutions had very little connection with what is propounded in the Bill. Furthermore, there is very little in the Bill that will be of lasting benefit to the salmon fisheries. There is little in it about an analysis of and a response to the problems which the salmon fishing industry faces on the netting side or on the angling side. There is no sense of a scientific approach on conservation or anything like that.

The Bill will give further powers to water bailiffs. As the right hon. Member for the Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) said, it is a Bill to give fresh reasons for sending people to Botany Bay. The proposals are a major backward step. I am delighted that my party has put forward a reasoned amendment. I regret that we did not simply oppose the Bill.

The legal implications of the Bill are curious. It is not guilt, or suspicion of guilt, that leads to an offence, but it is the fact of suspicion that is of itself the offence. That has been referred to by Lord Denning among others. In another place Lord Mishcon described what might happen to a commercial traveller who in good faith bought three salmon on a quayside at Lochinver. He said that the salmon might have gill marks which would not be recognised by the commercial traveller, who would not know whether they had been taken illegally. All that he could do would be to go into the witness box to show that the circumstances did not give rise to suspicion. It will be a new offence.

I am told that in the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 there is a similar offence in relation to badgers, but that is different. In that case, at least one has to be seen in the act of digging. In this Bill, one does not have to be seen in the act of fishing. New section 7A in clause 21 says:

"(1) A person who—

(a) is in possession of salmon and believes; or

(b) is in possession of salmon in circumstances in which it would be reasonable for him to suspect, that a relevant offence has at any time been committed in relation to the salmon shall be guilty of an offence"

If someone felt that circumstances in which he procured the salmon involved an offence, that in itself would be the guilt. It is an extraordinary proposition, especially in Scotland, where the basic security of corroboration that we have had under Scottish law is being thrown out of the window. Without corroboration, and in the light of suspicious circumstances, a man is ipso facto found guilty. It is extraordinary that such a provision should be passing through the House at the witching hour of 11.59 pm. As if that were not bad enough in Scotland, the provision has been extended to England. Clause 29 applies to England and it reads:

"a person shall be guilty of an offence"—

it reads like the address of a 17th century Scottish preacher—

"if, at a time when he believes or it would be reasonable for him to suspect"— not that he suspects, for it is deemed that he should have been reasonable enough to have suspected—

"that a relevant offence has at any time been committed"— no particular offence is specified; there is no objectivity and no precision. There is no specificity about the charge—

"in relation to any salmon, he receives the salmon"

he is guilty.

There is the lovely provision in subsection (3), which reads:

"It shall be immaterial for the purposes of subsection (1) that a person's belief or the grounds for suspicion relate neither specifically to a particular offence that has been committed nor exclusively to a relevant offence or to relevant offences".

There is nothing that is particular. However,

"it shall be a defence in proceedings for an offence under this section to show that no relevant offence had in fact been committed in relation to the salmon in question."

What kind of law is it that provides that if a man is proved to be innocent he shall be deemed to be innocent? We are faced with an incredible proposition, and yet it has been placed solemnly before us.

We know what the salmon means in Scotland, and especially in the highlands. The salmon means privilege. It has meant privilege, and it has been maintained for the purpose of privilege, and the purpose of the Bill is to maintain that privilege. That is what it is all about in the highlands, where King Salmon still rules. There is more power applied to, more prosecution of and more time spent on the odd fellow who picks the odd salmon out of a local river than there is in trying to create jobs for our people in the highlands.

It is a bad Bill and if we cannot see our way to voting against it, at least we shall vote for the reasoned amendment. I was born on the banks of the Helmsdale river, one of the best salmon rivers in Scotland. I was born alongside crofters who had been pushed down the glen in the clearances. They were not allowed to fish the river. If they had done so, we know what would have happened to them.

We know about the problems that arise from the existence of new gangs, which have been described by my right hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason). We know that they possess dynamite and cyanide, and my right hon. Friend suggested that they are involved in drug abuse. If that is so, these matters should not be left to a private security force. We have a police force to deal with that sort of crime. The community interest has not featured on one page of the Bill. Instead, the Bill has been designed to meet private interests. I believe that it will fail. The right solution is to take the waters under community control and community direction, in the interests of the community. That is the answer.

Mr. Bill Walker: What about poaching?

Mr. Buchan: We shall prevent poaching by community action. Legislation of this sort almost turns a national pastime into a national duty. There is a difference between that and the sort of poaching that should be prevented by community control. I wish that the Bill were being opposed, but at least we shall have the opportunity of voting for the reasoned amendment.

12.4 am

Sir Michael Shaw (Scarborough): I am chairing a Committee and I had not expected to be able to participate in the debate. I am rather surprised but grateful to have the opportunity to do so. My local fishermen, with whom I spoke over the weekend, asked me to voice their views. They feel that they are being oppressed and that the drift netters, along with others in the north-east, are being gradually squeezed out. I am glad that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, an English Minister—I trust that an English shadow Minister will reply to the debate from the Opposition Front Bench, as English matters are involved —gave an assurance that that is not so.

The Minister has visited Scarborough and Whitby in the past 10 days. I know that his visit was much appreciated. He will have learned from my drift netters their deep concern about the legislation.

I want to deal with just two points. I shall deal first of all with the drift netters, and then with poaching.

[Sir Michael Shaw]

The right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) talked much about the river Esk, which is virtually all in my constituency. He was very inaccurate in one respect. I am sorry that he is not here, but he has taken part in the debate so I feel justified in saying this. He claims that the drift netters as well as poachers off the mouth of the river Esk, have caused the great scarcity of salmon in that river.

I spoke of this matter in some detail in the debate on 28 October last. I shall not go over it all again, save to say this. The Yorkshire river Esk is a real example of what I believe is happening in the rest of the rivers, especially in Scottish rivers.

The management of the river Esk, the riparian owners, the harbour authorities and the drift netters themselves are organised to keep the salmon stocks high. They are all making a contribution. There is no rivalry. The riparian owners accept the fact that salmon caught by the drift netters are not going into the river Esk.

What does this mean? It means that the salmon are not reaching the higher reaches of the river Esk. They are disappearing lower down towards the mouth, for the very reason mentioned by the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central. They are being poached commercially by professional gangs. Large numbers are being taken. That is the source of the problem. I am convinced that the same circumstances apply to the Scottish rivers.

It is said that there will be a review in three years' time. If that review takes place I hope that all the facts will be brought out, but I fear that the main fact will not be brought out. How many fish have been poached at the source of the rivers? That is the key question. I do not know how my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will get this information, but those figures are vital so that we may make a meaningful comparison.

I believe that my own drift netters are justified in their fears. They need to have those fears allayed. Poaching is done in rivers, estuaries and seas. Often, the netters pay large sums in licence fees. They go fishing, and alongside them are people who have not paid anything. The netters go off to other fishing areas because their time is up. There, they see illegal fishing. Apparently, nothing is being done. I believe that if we are not careful we shall see the demise of drift netting and then the continuing run-down of salmon stocks. We must tackle the real problem of poaching.

I believe that if, in order to home in on the poachers, we have first quite unnecessarily to get rid of the licensed net fishers, that would be a tragedy and a gross injustice to those small fishermen who have been fishing for generations.

It would be tragic if a drift netter were not allowed to pass on his rights to the crew man whom he had brought up almost as his own child. I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to consider the matter carefully, to go for the poaching and to uphold the rights of licensed drift net fishermen.

12.10 am

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): I wish to speak briefly and mainly about Welsh interests.

I was brought up on a tributary of the River Wye which has been a playground of the privileged. It has been extremely difficult for people who live in the area to get access to the river. One of the problems that we are grappling with tonight is that many fishermen would like to fish our rivers, but cannot get access to them. If they could gain access, I believe that there would be far less poaching. We cannot achieve absolute access for everyone as that would defeat conservation measures, but there should be more access for ordinary people in the area. I have had the privilege to fish the Wye only twice, although I was brought up in the area and am a keen fisherman.

I declare an interest as a member of Aberystwyth angling association, which owns 12 miles of river. Many people gain access to the river, which is run in the best interest of the fishery. There is quite effective poacher control by members of the association. That is the way forward. Access has not been discussed adequately today.

Conservation of salmon stocks is extremely important. More resources must be devoted to increasing fish stocks by water authorities, even if they are privatised. The problem of poaching varies between different parts of the country. There is fairly innocent poaching in some parts of the country, but in others, such as my part of Wales, there is organised poaching on what I would describe as an industrial scale. It is almost impossible for water bailiffs to tackle the gangs involved. We must, however, protect our fisheries from this assault which depletes our salmon stocks.

I should have liked to have discussed many other matters such as control of netting, especially around Greenland, on an international scale. I do not want to prolong the debate, but there are insufficient conservation measures in the Bill and access is not dealt with properly. Control of the disposal of salmon has, however, been improved in England and Wales.

We in Wales regard salmon tagging as extremely important and I hope that we can show a lead to the rest of Britain in that respect.

12.14 am

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): That I am last to speak in the debate I suppose is to be expected because the largest and longest river for salmon fishing in Scotland is in my constituency. Indeed, it is probably one of the most important rivers in the world for salmon fishing.

It is not the fact that salmon does not come up the river but what happens if the salmon does not come up the river that is important. I was interested in what was said by the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) and the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson). They seemed to suggest that salmon fishing was the sport of the gentry, the well-off and the privileged. That is nonsense. If they come to the river Tay, to any of the fishing fleets on the Tay or to any of the hotels in which fishermen are to be found, they will find miners and people from all walks of life because fishing is one of the most popular sports. That is what makes it important to Scotland —the fact that it is popular and that it is worth between £150 million and £200 million to the Scottish economy.

More importantly, directly and indirectly it employs about 30,000 people. If we were debating a matter to do with an industry where 30,000 jobs were at risk, we would quite happily be prepared to sit until 12.15 in the morning. That is what we should be doing this evening. That is what the debate is about—what is happening to the rural economy in Scotland.

To find out why the salmon are not coming up the rivers in the numbers that they previously did, we have to bear in mind that there are many more people now fishing for salmon in all areas—drift netting, estuarial netting and the rod fishermen. There are many more rod fishermen fishing Scotland's rivers today. That is certainly true of the Tay, although many of the best rod fishing fleets on the Tay are unlet for the spring season thus far. I find that very worrying. Many jobs in my constituency are at risk. Tourism is the largest employer in north Tayside. If, indeed, there is another season when the fishing is not successful, there will be many fewer jobs in north Tayside. We have to find the answers.

I welcome the Bill. I believe that it does not go far enough, but that will not surprise my hon. Friends on the Front Bench. For any hon. Member who is interested, may I say that I have never fished for salmon in my life. I know nothing about it other than what I have been told by those in my constituency who are concerned about the impact on jobs. I am surprised to observe that Opposition Members find it fascinating and funny that I have not fished. They have a habit of thinking that if one represents a Conservative constituency one is part of an elite which enjoys all these different activities. Unlike the hon. Member for East Lothian, I was not born into that privilege. I won the privilege in an election—indeed, in two elections. I have not yet taken the opportunity to indulge in fishing for salmon.

My concern is that in the north-east of England it is not a question of fishermen fishing by the traditional methods; they are not. If they were, the probability is that their catches would be the same as they were by the old traditional methods.

We have banned monofilament nets, properly, in my view. I should like this ban to be extended to England. This is equally true in the case of estuarial netting. [Interruption.] Again, Opposition Front Bench Members find that funny. Thirty thousands jobs are not funny. I think that this is one of the most important debates we have had this year on the subject of jobs. It is more important than many of our other debates because these are real jobs that could go on for ever if we look after the resource that provide them—the salmon.

The debate is about looking after, caring for and protecting that resource to make sure that it continues. Nature has provided it; man is destroying it. We must consider how to deal with it.

It is also important that we should examine estuarial netting as carefully as we intend to examine north-east coast netting. I welcome the provisions in the Bill that take care of that. However, the period that we are looking at is a bit too long. I should like to see that shortened so that some decisions could be made earlier.

I welcome the Bill and the fact that rod fishing should be incorporated into any estimate of the river resources and just how many salmon are being caught legitimately.

I also welcome the measures to deal in some respects —it is only in some respects—with poaching. Poaching is a real problem. I was surprised to hear the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) say that poaching did not occur in his constituency. I have heard it spoken about there, so I can only presume that either those who speak about it do not know what they are talking about or that the right hon. Gentleman does not know what he is talking about. I shall leave it to the House to decide who is right about that.

The Bill is long overdue. We in Scotland welcome it. Those of us who are concerned with jobs in Scotland hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will accept some more reasoned amendments, just as they have done in the other place, because the Bill could be improved substantially so that when it becomes an Act it will make a positive contribution to the continuation of the salmon in Scottish rivers.

Mr. Home Robertson: With the leave of the House, I should like to reply briefly to the debate. It is a bit rich for the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) to go on about employment in Scotland so soon after his extraordinary antics on the subject of employment in the steel industry in Scotland.

I want to stress to those hon. Members who have suggested that it is the Opposition's intention to vote against the Bill on Second Reading that that is not so, because we do not want to obstruct the genuine conservation elements within the Bill. Nevertheless, it is our intention to seek to divide the House on our reasoned amendment and I have explained the reason for that. We have serious misgivings about the constitution of the district salmon boards in Scotland and about the manner of appointment of water bailiffs in Scotland. The fundamental flaw in the Bill is that it is a landlords' Bill. That is why it will fail, and that is why we intend to press our amendment to a Division.

Many interesting, detailed points have been raised, many of which involve complicated issues. The Standing Committee which considers the Bill could perhaps do with some specialist advice on the detailed points that have been referred to, and I wonder what the Minister of State's reaction would be to the suggestion that the Special Standing Committee procedure should be applied to the Bill.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) is fond of the expression "It is a bit rich". It is a bit rich that a Bill which deals with a great deal of interest in the north-east of England should have been treated by the Opposition to a monopoly by Scottish shadow Ministers. We have heard tonight an attitude towards the Bill which is frivolous and peculiar. It is peculiar that twice we have heard a representative of a particular group in Scotland attack a Bill as if it were concerned only to entrench present rights. The purpose of the Bill is to extend and improve the conservation measures with which we all ought to be concerned.

It was odd that the hon. Member for East Lothian managed to turn something which ought to have had all-party support into a party political debate. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) did this, too, although it was quite difficult to do so. The speech of the hon. Member for East Lothian was typical of him, and he again raised all the old arguments about landlordism. We know why he did it—it is his annual speech of re-selection. Every year the hon. Member has to come up with something to show the selectors that he is not what he seems to be, and he chose today to do his Militant rain dance.

The hon. Member for East Lothian moved what he delicately refers to as a reasoned amendment. If it is a reasoned amendment, his explanation of logic leaves most of us cold. He has put forward views about the Bill but has not dealt with the central part. The central part of the Bill is to make it possible so to regulate the taking of salmon as to enable us to protect the species for the benefit of all who have a right to them. Dealing with poachers is central to the whole issue. As has been said by many of my right hon. and hon. Friends, unless one can control the poaching of salmon one is not able to have a conservation policy. We have shown that it is impossible, under the present structure of the law, to control poachers. For that reason, we have changed the basis upon which prosecutions may be brought.

I listened carefully to the comments of the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan), who suggested that people would be arrested on suspicion. There is no question of being arrested on suspicion. It is rather a question of being brought into court in such circumstances that any reasonable person would realise that the salmon which had been taken was likely to have been poached. The hon. Member's example gave his case away. Of course it is true that a man who has no knowledge of the effect of a gill net would not be brought into court because he would not be able, reasonably, to have suspected that a particular salmon had been taken in that way. If the man was regularly dealing in salmon and therefore knew a great deal about salmon, it might be reasonable to suggest that he ought to know that salmon bearing particular marks had been taken in that way and would have been taken illegally. In that case he ought to be taken to court.

If Opposition Members do not like that, perhaps they can find an alternative way of dealing with the problem. Some of them cast aside poaching as if it were unimportant when they know that it is now a major industry and a professional activity carried out by people who are not averse to using extreme forms of violence. These people are constantly destroying a resource which ought to be available to a range of people, both netsmen and rodsmen. The Opposition do their case no good by pretending that one can merely cast poaching aside.

I agreed heartily with my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) when he pointed out the importance of the employment issues. It is not for Opposition Members to suggest that we should not be spending this time on a matter which affects the livelihood of many people. I must say to my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) that to suggest that it affects people employed in Scotland is not a proper answer. He said that the Bill was bad for the Scottish people, but there are many other people in this industry and many of them are in the north-east of England and elsewhere. The Bill ought to meet the needs of everyone. That is why we are seeking to ensure that the measures that we take are fair to all the legitimate interests.

We have been tough on the north-east drift fisheries. From now on, those who have a licence will have to be present in the boat while the fishing is taking place. The longest period of weekend closing—longer than is the case in estuarial netting—will now take place. There will not be drift net fishing at night, and all ways of further controlling what is an already controlled fishery will be insisted on. All this will be brought into play, and we shall be able to see at the end of three years whether it has had an effect.

However, all this is not possible if we look only at part of the pattern—say, 35 per cent. We must look at the whole of the netting pattern, and it would be wrong to avoid doing so. That is why we are reviewing the whole lot. Thereafter, we can make reasonable decisions about what to do.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed kindly gave way to me when he was speaking about the Government's intentions. As I pointed out then, it would be preposterous to say in advance of the review that we would phase out the north-east fishery, just as it would be if we said that we wanted to phase out the estuarial netsmen or the rodsmen. It would be improper to do so, because the purpose of the review is to assess how best to protect this resource for all those who have a historic and reasonable right of access to a legitimate employment, or connection with it.

We shall not prejudge what will happen in the review. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed was fair to say that the review will suggest that some of the more extreme attacks on the north-east will probably be shown to be without foundation. However, we must take this matter seriously, which is possible only if we are able to deal with the problem of poaching at the same time. I agree with many of my right hon. and hon. Friends who represent Scottish constituencies that there is a problem in being able to check the amount of fish that are taken, because if so much is taken by poaching the figures will not tie up. Goods arrive in Billingsgate that do not fit in with the figures of what is produced legally. Therefore, the control of the poacher is crucial to the success of what we are trying to do.

It is not good enough for Labour Members to have a so-called reasoned amendment and not face the issue. We cannot deal with this matter unless we are prepared to deal with poaching. We cannot deal with poaching unless we change the nature of the evidence. I hope that some of the right hon. and hon. Friends of the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) will remind him that he has a responsibility to the jobs of the people of the north-east as well as to those whose case he put forward. I am impressed by the way that Members who represent Scottish interests are prepared to watch the work and to take the evidence of the review.

My hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) suggested that we should include rodsmen in the review, but he will, I think, agree that we are asking for a major investigation of the netting in both Scotland and England. That is a sufficiently large task to do effectively, and I wonder whether it would be sensible to extend it, although we could look at this matter.

Like others, my hon. Friend spoke about seals, which is now a matter at which it is almost impossible to look objectively because of the pressure outside. We cannot ignore it, but I hope that the investigation being carried out by my Department and the Scottish Office will soon produce an outcome.

I must take issue with the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) on his endorsement of poaching. His view of the structure of Scotland is somewhat out of date. The right hon. Member spoke about an attitude to Scotland which might have been acceptable in a barn-storming meeting 50 years ago. The right hon. Gentleman's comments about poaching, as if it was a vague thing committed by a nice chap who did not take more than one salmon from time to time, were part of the fairy tales which are so much a part of Scottish nationalism. My hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) rightly suggested that we must look at the situation most carefully. He related the problems of the machinery and the way that the water authorities will deal with the problem if those bodies take over that responsibility.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Woking would expect me to say a few words about dealer licensing. Dealer licensing in England and Wales is more difficult than it is in Scotland because we do not have the means that exist in Scotland under the Scottish form of local government. We are discussing with the water authorities whether they would be the right means of enforcement and licensing. They would obviously be the most sensible bodies to carry out such duties and they have said that they are willing to consider it.

We would envisage the licensing scheme in England and Wales as being extensive and it would deal with the vast majority of transactions. That would mean that many people who are now used to buying their salmon perfectly legally—perhaps at the back door of a hotel—will in future have to buy from a licensed dealer. That is necessary if we are to deal with poaching. We cannot have a half-baked scheme, and one of the reasons why we took some time to agree to have a scheme at all is that it looked initially as if we could not have a scheme that was honest. There is no point in having a cosmetic scheme, one which we merely put over to show that there is the same position south of the border as there is north of the border.

We now have the making of a scheme, but my hon. Friend the Member for Woking is correct to say that the matter will have to be examined very carefully in Committee. We will not have the full details, but we will have to address ourselves precisely to the way that it will be implemented.

I must tell my hon. Friends the Members for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) and for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw) that their views of the north-east fisheries are exactly as I witnessed them when I visited the area and what my predecessor saw when he visited the area before he prepared that part of the Bill. I believe that fishermen in the north-east understand that these new regulations must work if they are to be able to stand up honestly and say that they must have the same acceptance and respect that any other users of this resource have. The proposal must work and we must enforce it.

That is why I have refused to accept the pressures that suggested that there ought to be other reasons why the licensee ought not be in the boat for reasons other than illness or accident. We cannot extend that because, if we do, it will become the excuse for others to point the finger at the north-east fishery. We must make sure that the proposal works and that the three-year investigation takes place on what is known to be a properly regulated fishery. Then if it seems that the fishery needs further restriction or if there were real reasons for it, we would know that they existed, and we would not have the kind of dispute that we have had this evening and in the past.

I should like to say a few words about the comments of the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey). I must accuse the hon. Gentleman of having a fairyland view of poaching. He spoke about fairly innocent poaching. That is an interesting phrase to use. Can there be fairly innocent theft? Can there be fairly innocent murder and fairly innocent shoplifting? I wonder whether we are using scrumping language—that is, using words to pretend that one has a middle lane position? I noticed that the hon. Gentleman was working very hard to produce a position between this side of the House and his own side of the House. He was working again towards the traditional alliance position. On the one hand, they are against serious poaching but, on the other, they do not want to condemn fairly innocent poaching. Obviously the odd poacher or two votes in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. There may be the odd voter in Brecon and Radnor whom the hon. Gentleman does not want to put off at the general election.

Salmon tagging is not a possible answer because of the vast number of imported salmon. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to propose a special scheme in Wales which might offer some advantage, I would be happy to look at it and would not dream of casting it aside out of hand. All the investigations that I have seen show that tagging cannot work in a society such as ours where the access of salmon, especially frozen salmon, gives rise to a genuine problem of control over the tags. Once one does not control the tags, the scheme is tailor-made for an extension, rather than a restriction, of poaching.

The Bill is a major step in the control of poaching, the conservation of salmon, and the protection of the proper demands and rights of those who live from and enjoy catching fish, whether by net or rod. I am sad that what could have been a debate in which all sides of the House could have found a joint answer has been destroyed by the petty, old-fashioned, narrow-minded, landlord-bashing of the landlord himself. The hon. Member for East Lothian has committed the closest to trahison des clercs that I know. The landlord attacks a perfectly reasonable conservation measure on the basis that it is landlordism. I hope that will not have the success that the hon. Gentleman seeks during his reselection process.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Ambulance Services (Guisborough)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Malone.]

12.52 am

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): I welcome this opportunity to speak in an Adjournment debate at an early hour, because on the previous occasion it was at 4 am. My subject matter is much more serious tonight, because this is the last stop for an elected representative to try to redress the position of ambulance services in his constituency.

"Where is Langbaurgh?" is a kind of music hall joke. When I tell people that it is in Cleveland, they ask, "Where is Cleveland?" It is no joke to my constituents to find that the ambulance service which has served the heart of the constituency for many years has been altered by a decision by the area health authority. A couple of years ago the ambulance authorities decided that a report on ambulance services in east Cleveland would be prepared by the health operational research unit. HORU is a respectable and eminent body. It bases its researches on years of study in various parts of Britain. It puts all the information through a computer, which spews out answers at the end. As we all know, computers are capable of producing answers based only on the information put into them. If one fails to put in information about the topography, the weather or the disposition of the population, the answers are liable to be distorted, if they are based on a standard format.

The result of the action of the area health authority, acting on the recommendation of the local ambulance service manager, is that, to all intents and purposes, the Guisborough ambulance station has been closed. It is unusual in political life to find an issue on which all sectors of the community—religious, political and academic—are united. They all say in this case that the area health authority was wrong to make this change. Nobody can deny that the authority's criteria met the specifications of the Department. Indeed, those criteria went beyond the rural and into the metropolitan, specifications. This is a domestic matter affecting the south Cleveland area.

It may be argued that monetary savings are involved and that that must be for the good of the community. In this case, not only is it questionable whether there will be any savings, but I could adduce evidence to show that what is proposed will be more expensive. Either way we need not spend time trying to put a monetary value on people's lives.

The case that I make tonight is based on local knowledge of events in the last 12 months and the strong feeling of the local community that a wrong has been perpetrated. We have nobody but the Government to whom to turn to bring pressure on the area health authority, even at this late stage. to change its mind.

The initial recommendation was that the Guisborough ambulance station should close. That would have meant my constituents living near the north Yorkshire border being denied an important section of emergency ambulance provision. Bowing to public opinion, the local ambulance management had second thoughts and, instead of closing the Guisborough station, kept it open for 22 of every 24 hours by having on hand an ambulance and crew from Redcar.

The result is that there has been no cost saving, and a well-established station, its appliances and crews have been dispersed. Every day an ambulance crew travels half an hour from Redcar to Guisborough. Later, it travels back to Redcar, and then another ambulance does the round journey. Thus, for two hours a day ambulances and crews are travelling between the two areas. For 22 hours a day, a strange crew from Redcar waits in Guisborough to answer emergency calls.

The logic of this has been lost on everyone, apart from the management and the area health authority. The service that is provided to my constituents has been diminished. That diminution goes beyond my constituency, into those of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) and of my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Sir. M. Shaw), for the ambulance services go to many of the small and outpost villages in the north Yorkshire area that are frequently cut off by adverse weather conditions, when the roads are impassable. These are the people who are most likely to be at risk.

An analysis of accident statistics in the area shows that the vast majority of road accidents occur on the fast moors road between Guisborough and Whitby. By definition, it will take longer for an ambulance crew to arrive at the scene of an accident than has hitherto been the case. There can be no justification for this.

Worse still is an analysis of the actions of the area health authority. It produced a plan to close the station, which it then amended. Although the area health authority was supposed to take into consideration the views of all the people in the area, it admitted to what it called "a word processing error." The views of three of the parish and town councils adjacent to Guisborough were not presented at the meeting when the decision was taken. The voices of three important local community councils were not heard.

If there is a case for the alterations which have been made, it centres on a new ambulance station at Coulby Newham, at the western end of my constituency. This was commissioned and built at a time when the extrapolation of population growth was greater than that which has come about. The ambulance authorities were therefore faced with the embarrassment of a new building for which they had no use. They have justified its use by making it operational and by closing down, to all intents and purposes, the emergency service and cover in Guisborough.

Why is Guisborough so special? With a population of just under 20,000 it is the major town in my constituency. If one visited Guisborough, one would see, standing in a row in the same road, the police station, the fire station, the hospital, the Territorial Army barracks and the ambulance station, all within 200 yds of each other. What have the authorities done? They have closed the ambulance station. If there is an accident to which the fire engines and the police are called, they look around to see whether an ambulance will join them, or they hope that an ambulance will come to join them from Redcar or Carlin How. This cannot be right.

All my constituents have been to see me and have prevailed upon me to raise this matter in Parliament. It is their last hope that common sense and pressure can be brought to bear upon those who were responsible for making this decision. The shop stewards at the ambulance station are concerned. In case there are those who might suggest that this is a political intrigue, I must advise everyone that the ambulance service in Guisborough includes a Conservative councillor whose mother is also a Conservative councillor for the town of Guisborough. In the political context, therefore, there is no divide. The new management of the ambulance authority is determined to make the change and to implement the health operational research unit recommendations, irrespective of the views and wishes of the populace.

Public meetings have been held, at the end of which no one was satisfied with the explanations given by the chief ambulance officer to justify the proposed changes. There have also been private meetings of the chambers of trade, Rotary and others concerned in the town. No one is in favour of the alteration, other than the management. Management admits that when it reached its conclusions it did not have all the evidence. It did not have the information which had been missed by the word processor and/or the computer. There is great strength of feeling that the very latest that could be done is for the Govenrment to write to the area health authority asking it to reconsider the view that has prevailed so far.

Some may ask why I have not been supported in my endeavours by other hon. Members in the Cleveland area. They are not supporting me because all of them are getting a better deal out of what the area health authority is bringing into practice. Therefore, I do not blame them for not supporting me. If I were the Member of Parliament for an area that was getting improved ambulance cover I would be grateful. But when one is left on one's own, one's resolve and strength of feeling become greater. It would have been more honest if other hon. Members from the Cleveland area had had the courage to support me in my long and sustained battle over the past 12 months against the area health authority.

There is no element of cost saving or of a cutting exercise. All too frequently people claim erroneously that the reason for Government action is that cuts are being made. That is not the case with the ambulance services in east Cleveland. The alteration is intended to improve the service. For one third of the area that will be the case, but for two thirds of the area—the larger geographical but the smaller numerically—that will be far from true.

I hope my hon. Friend will accept that there is no criticism of the Government and no intention to make play of cost cutting. The decision is wrong. It was made on ill-founded theoretical grounds. I do not want to be responsible for anyone having to tell a newly bereaved widow or mother that her husband or child has died because the ambulance service they had enjoyed has been taken away. That is what we are facing in east Cleveland. There can be no solace in that for anybody.

It is all very well to say that one is arguing about a difference of seven, eight, 10 or 11 minutes, but one is also arguing about a lost camaraderie which had been engendered within the ambulance station. In the community sense, the ambulance service is responsible not only for emergency cover, but for transporting patients to and from hospitals and homes for the elderly. All of that has been dissipated for no justifiable and logical reason, but because of an administrative managerial change. It is incumbent upon the Government to write a very strong letter to the area health authority venting these views so that the authority can reconsider and alter its decision and restore the position that we had before the changes. If it is necessary to justify the opening of Coulby Newham on any other grounds, and if there is not the money for that, the case should be argued for Coulby Newham, but not at the expense of the ambulance station at Guisborough and my constituents.

1.10 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) for giving me the opportunity to pay a brief but sincere tribute to the general contribution which the ambulance service makes to the Health Service and to the population, to the skill which it demonstrates and to the response that it shows in dealing with emergencies and caring for its patients.

I know that my hon. Friend will accept that a great deal of effort goes into ensuring that services are able to respond as efficiently as they do. It is essential that local managers of the services must plan carefully the way in which the services operate to ensure that the best quality of service in provided. There is no point in having ambulance stations running a full 24-hour emergency service if there is not a demand for that level of cover in that particular area. To do so means that an ambulance may not be available in other areas where the demand is greater. I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that set of principles.

As my hon. Friend knows, the South Tees health authority is responsible for the management of the Cleveland ambulance service. As he has said, in co-operation with an independent survey conducted by the health operational research unit—HORU—which had studied emergency ambulance cover in about 20 other services in the country since 1974, the decision was taken to embark on a careful examination of the way in which emergency ambulance services were provided. Account was taken of the sort of factors to which my hon. Friend has referred, such as new roads, population changes and other developments. There was no rush to draw up proposals for future organisation of the service. A careful look was taken at the existing patterns of demand to ascertain where the relative demands of the different areas were and the times of the day when demand was greatest.

I understand that the district health authority was mindful of the fact that the Guisborough ambulance station had only a small emergency work load which, on average, amounted to less than one emergency call each night, two emergency calls each day and between one and two calls each evening. It judged that such a small work load could not justify emergency cover at that ambulance station on a full 24-hour basis, especially when other areas placed higher demands on the service. Instead, it proposed that between 8 am and 12 midnight emergency ambulance cover would be provided by outstationed ambulance crews allocated to the area.

The health authority was satisfied that under this arrangement the national standards for response time would continue to be met in Guisborough. It should be emphasised, as my hon. Friend has said, that the national standards for non-metropolitan areas such as Guisborough are lower than those for built-up areas. The health authority decided to aim for the higher metropolitan standard for Guisborough and for the entire Cleveland area. I suggest that that is a clear sign of the authority's wish to provide the best possible service to all the patients within its area.

But that was not the end of the story. The authority issued a full consultation document on its proposals and invited comments from a wide range of groups and individuals. We shall consider his argument about the failure to register or receive some of the comments. During the consultation period, officers of the authority attended over 30 gatherings throughout the area to explain the proposals and to answer questions. Written comments were received from a wide range of organisations, including neighbouring health authorities, community health councils, local authorities at various levels, trade unions, the staff of the ambulance service and individuals, including parliamentary colleagues.

The health authority considered carefully each and every comment received. On one particular aspect — namely, whether the proposed arrangements for emergency ambulance cover in Guisborough would result in a satisfactory level of cover — some concern was expressed. Although the health authority was satisfied that such cover would be satisfactory, it recognised the strength of feeling within the local community with regard to the proposal. My hon. Friend has reflected that concern again tonight.

The health authority decided to increase ambulance cover by providing a vehicle additional to the original proposals, between the hours of 10 pm and 6 am. That would mean that Guisborough would still have one emergency ambulance allocated to the area. The only difference is that the vehicles will not be based at the Guisborough ambulance station—this was the matter to which my hon. Friend referred—but the arrangement would enable a satisfactory level of cover for my hon. Friend's constituents.

Mr. Holt: Would the Minister kindly note that none of the representations that he has mentioned were in favour of the alterations.

Mr. Whitney: That may not be surprising in relation to proposals of this nature. Those who tended to accept them would not on the whole make representations.

The Health Service has said that the service will be closely monitored in the future. I assure my hon. Friend that there is no question of this being offered as a sop to those who question the new arrangements. It is a clear demonstration of the commitment of the health authority to ensuring that a safe and efficient service is provided. The Department is satisfied that this monitoring will be carried out properly. Certainly, if difficulties occur, which my hon. Friend fears, changes will be considered.

Clearly, what my hon. Friend has said tonight will be taken into account carefully by the health authority. I have no doubt at all that my hon. Friend will be watching the situation closely and will continue to draw any difficulties that he sees to the attention of the health authority I, too, shall follow the situation closely. I hope that this high level of cover in Guisborough will continue.

I understand the sense of loss for the vehicle, but I also understand that much work has gone into these arrangements. The cover for my hon. Friend's constituents is at a very high level.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at seventeen minutes past One o'clock.

House of Commons

Wednesday 5 March 1986

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

DEATH OF A MEMBER

Mr. Speaker: I regret to have to inform the House of the death of John Deane Spence, esquire, Member for Ryedale, and I desire, on behalf of the House, to express our sense of the loss we have sustained and our sympathy with the relatives of the hon. Member.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Human Rights

1. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met the Secretary-General of the Commonwealth to discuss the human rights situation in member states.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Eggar): My right hon. and learned Friend has not met the Commonwealth Secretary-General specifically to discuss the human rights situation in member states and has no present plans to do so.

Mr. Atkinson: Can my hon. Friend confirm that at least a third of the member states of the Commonwealth do not satisfy the human rights criteria of the United Nations' declaration? If so, will he suggest to Sir Shridath Ramphal that the team of eminent persons currently investigating human rights in South Africa should also investigate and report on the situation in the member states of the Commonwealth?

Mr. Eggar: At Nassau, we and other Governments welcomed the recent establishment of the human rights unit in the Commonwealth secretariat. We believe that this is the best instrument to assist in promoting understanding of and respect for human rights within the Commonwealth. Where specific human rights issues arise and have come to our attention, we have made representations, where appropriate, to the Government concerned.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Does the Government's concern for human rights extend to Pakistan?

Mr. Eggar: As the hon. Gentleman knows, Pakistan is not part of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Sims: Is my hon. Friend aware that 12 months have elapsed since I visited Sri Lanka on behalf of the parliamentary human rights group, together with the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk)? Our report on our visit listed a number of ways in which human rights are violated in respect of many members of all the communities in Sri Lanka. As the efforts of the Secretary-General of the Commonwealth and the Prime Minister of India to resolve the problems in Sri Lanka do not seem to have borne fruit, are Her Majesty's Government, who are held in high regard in that country, prepared to offer their services as a mediator?

Mr. Eggar: We see our role as continuing to support efforts by India and others to encourage direct talks between the Sri Lankan Government and Tamil representatives. India's contribution to the peace process is valuable and positive, and we believe that a negotiated settlement is the best route to a lasting peace.

Mr. Nellist: As one who, with the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway), was not acceptable to the Sri Lankan Government to make such a trip on behalf of the parliamentary human rights group, unlike the hon. Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims), may I ask the Minister whether, if he is so concerned about the abrogation of human rights in Sri Lanka, he will break off military and police training, economic links and the support that the Government continue to give to a Government who, on any examination of the facts, are clearly guilty of a serious attack on human rights in that country?

Mr. Eggar: As we have repeatedly said, we deplore the continued violence within Sri Lanka. The Sri Lankan Government have taken steps to prevent undisciplined action by their security forces and have assured us that they continue to further those efforts.

South Africa

2. Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give examples of specific responses made by the South African Government to Britain's diplomatic pressure over the past three years.

10. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about Her Majesty's Government's latest representations to the Government of South Africa.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): The full details of our representations and of the specific South African responses must naturally remain confidential. However, we believe that the many representations made during the past three years have helped in modifying actions and encouraging reforms. On 25 February Her Majesty's ambassador raised the enlargement and projected "independence" of KwaNdebele homeland; the shootings in Alexandra; the detentions of Venda community leaders and the case of the Sharpeville Six.

Mr. Litherland: Has the right hon. and learned Gentleman seen the article in The Guardian today which states that the Prime Minister has personally blocked a move by the Bermudan Government to introduce limited sanctions against South Africa, even with respect to the import and sale of krugerrands? At the moment, our Government are considering barring the import and sale of krugerrands. Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman not agree that that smacks of double standards and is a sop to apartheid?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No. It smacks of precisely the opposite — the perfectly rational conclusion that the Government's decisions on measures taken in relation to South Africa should be uniform not only in the United Kingdom but in colonial territories. That is why the position of krugerrands is under consideration in relation to Bermuda as with the United Kingdom.

Mr. Nellist: Are not the attitude and reply of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to these questions mere finger wagging at apartheid? In view of the £11 billion of British investment in South Africa, do not the objections of the right hon. and learned Gentleman and the Prime Minister have more to do with the profits made by British firms because of apartheid than with these latecomers moralising about apartheid? When will Britain take serious economic action against a system that degrades the people over which it rules?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: If it were left to the hon. Gentleman to judge these matters, the result would be more likely to promote the destruction of the South African economy and of the British economy, to the disadvantage of all the peoples living in both countries. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the balanced policy adopted by the Government of making it plain that we wish apartheid to be brought to an end quickly and of supporting that aim by policies and representations is far more likely to be effective in pursuit of the objectives shared by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Sir Peter Blaker: Is it not clear that many of those who call for a policy of serious economic sanctions have not thought through the implications? For example, would not a policy of compulsory divestment, for which I understand the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) is calling, in practice involve the confiscation of part of the property owned by British subjects and its free handover to South Africans?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That would be one of the many perverse effects of the measures advocated by the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist). I entirely agree with the point made by my right hon. Friend.

Dr. Owen: Has the right hon. and learned Gentleman made representations against the selective ban on television reporting? Does he accept that many of us find that quite unacceptable?

Has the right hon. and learned Gentleman made representations about the decision to go ahead with United Nations supervised elections in Namibia in August and the fact that they should not be dependent upon and linked to the withdrawal of Cuban forces? Such action would be welcomed by both sides of the House, but I believe that the United Nations resolution should be undertaken anyhow.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We have already made representations expressing our regret at the curtailment of the rights of television and other reporters in South Africa. We have welcomed the reaffirmation by the South African Government of their commitment to implement Security Council resolution 435, because we believe that that would offer an opportunity to make early progress on the whole Namibian question and would reduce tension throughout the region. The right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that we do not recognise any formal linkage with any requirement for Cuban withdrawal as part of that settlement. South Africa has made it clear, not only in yesterday's announcement, but many times in the past, that it will not agree to implementation of resolution 435 unless a satisfactory arrangement is found with respect to the Cubans. It is my judgment, having talked about this matter to a large number of people in that part of Africa, that the practical opportunity to implement resolution 435 is most likely to be fulfilled on the basis of United States-led negotiations in the context of the announcement which we now welcome.

Mr. George Gardiner: Will my right hon. and learned Friend, in his dealings with the South African Government, bear in mind the wisdom of encouraging as well as censuring—using a carrot as well as a stick? To that end, would there not be some value in saying that steps to broaden the base of government in South Africa might be reflected in an early relaxation of some of the provisions of the Gleneagles agreement on boycotting sporting contacts?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I do not immediately see the connection between my hon. Friend's specific point, which is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, and his more general point. However, I agree that we should be ready, not only to criticise where criticism is due, but to offer encouragement where that is due.

In addition to welcoming the announcement about the implementation of resolution 435, I am also glad to welcome the announcement about the lifting of the state of emergency, which is a matter that has been addressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House. I hope that that action will help to ease the tension and assist the promotion of dialogue, which is so urgently needed. That is what we must all hope for.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Has the Foreign Secretary read the remarks of Chief Johnathan, in which he makes it clear that it was the refusal of the British Government either to offer proper support to the state of Lesotho or to make adequate representations to the South African Government that led to the downfall of an elected Government in that state?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have seen reports of certain remarks made by the deposed Prime Minister of Lesotho, Chief Johnathan. It is not true that Britain was in any way involved in his overthrow. In response to Chief Johnathan's request for assistance, we immediately asked the South Africans to lift border restrictions and to talk to Lesotho.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that British diplomats attended the funerals in Alexandra today? Will he also say whether diplomats have been similarly instructed to attend the funerals of black policemen murdered by fellow blacks?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall bear in mind the points made in the last part of my hon. Friend's question. It is true that our diplomatic post, together with the posts of other Western Governments, was represented at the funerals today.

Mr. Healey: Will the Foreign Secretary tell the House why Her Majesty's Government have failed to carry out the undertaking they gave nearly five months ago at the Commonwealth summit to ban the import of krugerrands, especially as the United States Administration have found no difficulty with the general agreement on tariffs and trade in banning krugerrands, even before the Commonwealth summit?

Does the Foreign Secretary believe that there is something lacking in British influence when, according to Amnesty International, 8,000 persons have been detained —many of whom have been tortured and murdered in prison—and nearly 800 people have been murdered by the police as a result of South African policy? Of those detained and murdered, a quarter were children. How can the Foreign Secretary excuse breaking his commitment at the Commonwealth summit in the face of those facts?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that one of the many reasons why we wish to see an end to apartheid is that that would help us to reduce the adverse impact on human rights in South Africa. The United Kingdom is not the only country that has found it necessary to consider the general agreement on tariffs and trade implications on the proposed ban of krugerrands.

Sir Anthony Grant: Has it occurred to my right hon. and learned Friend that our relations with South Africa might perhaps have been much better, and certainly the whole beastly business of apartheid, which we all deplore, would perhaps have been avoided, if power had not been handed over to the Afrikaners in 1907 by the Liberal Government?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend has brought his characteristically penetrating rhetorical insight to the subject.

3. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the Council of Ministers will next discuss progress in South Africa on ending apartheid.

11. Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the European Economic Community Council will next disucuss its policy towards South Africa.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): Foreign Ministers of the Twelve have had frequent discussions about South Africa both in the Council of Ministers and in political co-operation. No date has been set for their next discussion.

Mr. Lofthouse: Will the Minister of State make it clear to the South African authorities that the lifting of the state of emergency will be meaningless if all the detainees are not released and if the restrictions on media coverage and political meetings are not lifted?

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman heard the remarks of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary on the subject of the media refusals. He knows full well that we are opposed to detention without trial. We shall remind the South African Government of that when and as it becomes necessary to do so.

Mr. Loyden: In September the Council of Ministers agreed to sanctions on oil exports to South Africa. When will it consider the regulations necessary to impose those sanctions?

Mrs. Chalker: The question of oil was considered at a recent meeting. I cannot from memory say whether it was on 27 January or the following week. The United Kingdom has never sold oil to South Africa. Under the 1979 guidelines, the sale of North sea oil is confined to the European Community and certain other countries. The measure does not apply to petroleum products. The guidelines apply to indirect as well as to direct exports, so, in relation to this country and our partners, the hon. Gentleman need have no worries.

Mr. Ian Lloyd: Will the Government seek to persuade the Council of Ministers, which has great influence in these matters, to distance itself from the anti-apartheid movement whose regard for the truth is becoming of almost legendary inaccuracy? Does my hon. Friend agree that the approach to apartheid should discriminate and distinguish between those features which are unique to aparthied and those, perhaps of an illiberal regime, which are shared by some 90 other member countries of the United Nations? Is there not a great danger that in relation to South Africa our attitude tends to sweep both aspects together so that we expect to impose standards of achievement in public life which in a sense are almost unattainable, or at least have not been attained, in 90 other countries of the United Nations?

Mrs. Chalker: I think that my hon. Friend forgets why we totally oppose apartheid and favour its total elimination in that country. Many people there have no vote, and all black people are unfairly treated. I do not seek to teach my hon. Friend, but our concern about the denial of human rights is clearly shared by every one of the Twelve, and we must stand against that denial. In that situation, there is no way in which we can differentiate, as my hon. Friend seeks.

Mr. Dykes: As a large number of South African citizens have been murdered by the South African police and army and the number of such murders is growing, will my hon. Friend make representations to her colleagues in the Council of Ministers to ensure that the Council repeatedly emphasises to the South African Government the need to discontinue that murderous policy and to release the detainees forthwith?

Mrs. Chalker: That has already happened, and I assume that it will come up again next time we discuss the matter.

Mr. Anderson: On 1 July this country assumes the presidency of the Council of Ministers. Previous Presidents have met the African National Council at ministerial level. Will the Government, consistent with their present policy, continue to refuse to meet the ANC at that level after 1 July?

Mrs. Chalker: We expect to maintain contact at official level at all times. We shall have to see what progress has been made before reaching a decision when we assume the presidency of the European Community.

Nelson Mandela

4. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to the Government of South Africa concerning the release of Nelson Mandela.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Our views about the release of Mr. Mandela are well known to the South African Government. I last raised Mr. Mandela's case when I saw the South African ambassador on 13 February.

Mr. Alton: Will the Foreign Secretary take every opportunity to make it clear to the South African Government that the continued incarceration of Nelson Mandela is an affront to the people of South Africa and that his release is a prerequisite to reconciliation between black and white people there? Will he instruct our ambassador in South Africa to visit Nelson Mandela and to seek an interview to establish the present state of his health and wellbeing?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We have made clear on many occasions our belief that the unconditional release of Mr. Mandela would constitute a major act of reconciliation in South Africa and could provide the impetus for genuine dialogue and a peaceful settlement. We have stressed, and will continue to stress, the importance of that point to the South African Government.

Mr. John Carlile: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that the prerequisite of the South African Government for the release of Nelson Madela, that he should renounce the use of violence, is reasonable? It is in the interests of the ANC that he remains incarcerated while it performs its own acts of violence in South Africa and outside.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I cannot accept my hon. Friend's conclusions about the situation, although I join him—and I am sure the whole House will join him—in condemning violence from any quarter. The ANC is clearly an important focus of black opinion in South Africa. Nevertheless, we thought it right to establish official contact with the ANC specifically to stress our commitment to dialogue and to impress upon it the need to bring an end to all violence in South Africa.

Falkland Islands

5. Mr. McKelvey asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current position with Argentina over the Falkland Islands.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We continue to stand by our commitments to the Falkland Islanders. At the same time, we are working for better relations between the United Kingdom and Argentina. The expressed wish of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary to meet the Argentine parliamentarians who visited London was only the latest in a series of initiatives which we have taken since 1982. We were disappointed that they did not take up the offer, but we shall continue our efforts to promote better bilateral relations.

Mr. McKelvey: Does the Secretary of State agree that it is now time to re-establish full diplomatic relations with Argentina and to discuss sovereignty with a view to reaching an honourable settlement? We could then reduce the staggering £654 million which is the average cost of maintaining Fortress Falklands at the moment.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am afraid the hon. Gentleman offers a misguidedly simple insight into this problem. We want—and I emphasise it yet again—to move towards more normal relations with Argentina. It was for that reason that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State offered to meet the Argentine parliamentarians when they were here. My hon. Friend would have explained to them why we are unprepared to negotiate on sovereignty. My hon. Friend would have been prepared to listen to the Argentinians' position. He would also have made clear our wish to see more normal relations, towards which we have taken step after step, none of which has been met with a parallel response.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that the visit by the Argentine parliamentarians should be seen as part of a long, slow and necessarily patient progress towards the gradual normalisation of relations? Does he further accept that neither the expectation of the Argentine visitors nor the intention of Her Majesty's Government was that this visit should be used as an occasion for initiating negotiations of any kind?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I accept precisely the two points made by my hon. Friend. The intention of the meeting offered by my hon. Friend was not to undertake, launch or conduct negotiations, but to explain our position on sovereignty. That has been well and often stated to Argentina. My hon. Friend wished also to impress upon them the sincerity of our wishes in other respects to move towards more normal relations with Argentina. That is and must be a sensible position.

Mr. Beith: Does the Secretary of State accept that many of us who met the Argentine delegation found them to be a constructive and courageous group of people? Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman recognise that their unwillingness to have a meeting with Ministers during their visit was quite understandable, considering the view that would have been taken in Argentina of accepting British terms as the basis on which such a meeting would be conducted? Will the Secretary of State recognise that he is dealing with a democracy, not a dictatorship? When the Government were dealing with a dictatorship, they were prepared to give away sovereignty. The Government should at least be prepared to have sovereignty on the agenda and not feel that their ability to negotiate is inhibited by opening the discussions.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman has not got it right. There were no strings attached to the offer made by my hon. Friend to meet the Argentine parliamentarians. He was prepared to meet them to explain why we will not negotiate sovereignty and to listen to their statement of their position on that matter.

We have expressly welcomed the restoration of democracy in Argentina. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister sent a message about that as soon as it happened. We have taken steps to support the Argentine economy and to help that democracy. It would be unhelpful to that democracy, however, to offer unrealistic goals on negotiations about sovereignty. Although, since 1982, democracy has returned to Argentina, the fact which makes a fundamental difference to the question is the invasion of the Falkland Islands by a main force at that time. Therefore, it is quite unreasonable to expect us to put the clock back to before the invasion, as though it had not happened.

Mr. Key: Will my right hon. and learned Friend be certain to pursue current Government policy with regard to the Falklands and reject the calls made from a sedentary position by Opposition Members to buy out the Falkland Islanders? Will he further ensure that hon. Members know that the major stumbling block in the gradual long-term solution to the problem is that Argentina has forfeited the trust of the Falkland Islanders and has to start building relations with them?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. It is most important, as a matter of common humanity and democratic principle, that respect be paid to the wishes of the Falkland Islanders by this Parliament and by the democratic Parliament of Argentina.

Mr. Foulkes: Does the Secretary of State not understand that all of us who were able to meet the Argentine delegation, as the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said, found them extremely reasonable people and willing to talk positively about the guarantees that their Government will give the islanders about their way of life? In view of the crippling cost of Fortress Falklands and the lost opportunities in trade with the whole of Latin America, surely everything is to be gained and nothing to be lost by entering into direct discussions with the Argentine Government about all aspects of the future of the islands to try to find a solution which is acceptable to Britain and Argentina, and which protects the interests of the islanders?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman should not imagine that the fact that there is a difference between us and Argentina is now a significant factor affecting our trade with Latin America, or the rest of our relations. Of course we wish to go further to establish more normal relations with Argentina. We have taken step after step in that direction. It is simply not sensible to deceive ourselves into thinking that the issue of sovereignty can be disposed of as the hon. Gentleman suggests. The Argentine Government's stance was restated only a month or two ago. They reaffirmed their unswerving determination to re-establishing the territorial integrity of the republic. They are determined to do that regardless of the wishes of the people who live in those islands. That is not a basis that can sensibly commend itself to the House.

Mr. Shersby: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that there is very strong support on the Tory Benches for the Government's unwillingness to consider negotiating the sovereignty of the Falkland Islands? Is he further aware that the people of the Falkland Islands pay great regard to their freedom and believe that the British Government will support it? What are the Government doing to normalise relations with Argentina with a view to their taking back their war dead? What discussions have there been with Argentina about that problem?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's support. We have made clear to the Argentine Government more than once our willingness to accept a suitably prepared visit to the Falkland Islands under International Red Cross auspices by close relatives of Argentine service men who are buried there, and our willingness to consider any other sensible arrangements that might be proposed. It is one of the many human proposals that we have put forward. We are genuinely anxious to move towards the gradual restoration of normal relations between the people of this country and the people of Argentina.

South Africa

6. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy on South Africa following the speech of President Botha to the South African Parliament in January.

Mrs. Chalker: We welcome the positive proposals in President Botha's speech and hope that they will be speedily implemented. We now wish to see further movement towards the fundamental elimination of apartheid and the beginning of peaceful dialogue between the South African Government and genuine representatives of the black community.

Mr. Fatchett: In that speech, President Botha once again made acceptance of resolution 435 conditional on the withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola. In an earlier reply the Foreign Secretary seemed to acquiesce in that stance. Why? Would it not be in the interests of the Namibian people for the British Government to demand South Africa's unequivocal acceptance of United Nations' resolutions?

Mrs. Chalker: I do not think that it would. We must ensure that the United States-led negotiations can continue and that the formal talks that were held earlier this year in Luanda continue. That is why we believe that the South African Government's reaffirmation of their formal commitment to Security Council resolution 435 is right. It could offer the opportunity to make the early progress that we all want. We want a reduction of tension in the region. I sincerely hope that the United States-led negotiations will now be intensified and that all parties will show flexibility and realism.

Mr. Adley: Does my hon. Friend agree that the sporadic violence of the ANC is as nothing compared to the permanent state of attrition practised by the South African Government on the black and non-white population of South Africa? Is she aware that there is, albeit not always vocal, widespread support on the Tory Benches for the Government's determination to establish relations with the ANC? Will she please continue with the policy of "jaw-jaw", in the interests of trying to bring some influence to bear from Europe on the problems in South Africa?

Mrs. Chalker: We know, sadly, that violence is not confined to one group. It happens on both sides of the border in Southern Africa and it also happens as a result of some activity by the South African Government. However, wherever violence occurs, whether it be from the ANC, the South African Government or any other body, we deplore it and we shall work to see that those who promote violence are dissuaded from doing so in whatever way we possibly can.

Mr. Flannery: Is it not a fact that where there is no democracy in a country and where the officially enshrined policy of the Government is racialism and apartheid, there is bound to be, at some stage, a fight back from those who are being oppressed? In view of a question asked earlier by a well known racist on the Back Benches of the Tory party—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. First, that is not parliamentary. Secondly, we cannot deal with questions that have been asked earlier.

Mr. Flannery: I am sorry that this Chamber will not allow me to tell the truth but in view of that fact——

Hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: I think that the hon. Gentleman, who is an experienced parliamentarian, is withdrawing that allegation.

Mr. Flannery: In view of the fact that I am being forced to withdraw it, in order to continue with the rest of my question, I shall do so. Will the Minister make it clear, as the Foreign Secretary does not, that the policy of brutality against the vast democratic majority of the African people in South Africa is being maintained, and that we, as a Chamber, are totally opposed to the official violence of the South African Government against the vast majority of its people?

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman does my right hon. and learned Friend a gross disservice. He and this Government have consistently impressed upon South Africa the need fully to respect the independence and the territorial integrity of its neighbours, and we shall continue to do so.

Middle East

7. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what part Her Majesty's Government are playing in international efforts to bring about pacification in the middle east.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We shall continue to support all realistic initiatives for peaceful solutions of the region's conflicts. I discussed the situation in the middle east with my European colleagues on 25 February and with the Syrian Foreign Minister on 3 March.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Did my right hon. and learned Friend discuss with the Syrian Foreign Minister the danger of conflict between Syria and Israel? Did he ask him to use his good offices for the release of British citizens imprisoned in Syria and in Lebanon, where Syria has so much influence?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I certainly impressed upon Mr. Shara the need for both sides, Syria as well as Israel, and the other states in the region, to sustain the search for a basis for long-term peace. I also raised with Mr. Shara, specifically, the case of Mr. Alec Collett, and enlisted his continuing help in trying to secure the release of that British citizen along with other hostages held in that country.

Mr. Faulds: In view of the recent re-invasion of Lebanon by Israel—[Interruption.] It would be a benefit to the House if occasionally questions could be asked without interventions persistently made from a sedentary position.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am here to look after the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Faulds: Thank you, Sir. Elder statesmen should be treated with respect.

In view of the recent re-invasion of Lebanon by Israel, which uses international terrorism as a continuing policy of state, is it not time that the Government took the initiative in the EEC to get it to abrogate, or at least suspend, its trading and financial agreements with Israel?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman was able to make himself heard. I do not think that, even at his invitation, it would be right to take that step, but I join him in deploring the continuing residual presence of Israeli defence forces, and the security zone, in Lebanon, which is provocative and without justification. I agree that the recent Israeli incursion into Lebanon will not help to meet the legitimate concern expressed on both sides of the House about border security.

Mr. Walters: While it is generally agreed that the failure of King Hussein's courageous initiative has been a grave setback to progress towards peace in the middle east, does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that as the essence of the conflict is about Palestine and Palestinian rights, it would be absurd to try to exclude the legitimate representatives of the Palestinians from any future negotiations?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I join my hon. Friend in regretting the fact that the initiative taken by King Hussein has, so far, led only to the statements that he made about it—quite understandably—in the past week or two. I agree that we must continue to support the Palestinians' right to self-determination. It is not for us to say by whom they should be represented. We do not accept that the Palestine Liberation Organisation is the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, but it should play a part in negotiations. It is above all important—this is the point that King Hussein was pressing—that it should make plain its recognition of the importance of Security Council resolutions 242 and 338, and renounce violence.

Mr. Janner: In talking to the Syrian Foreign Minister, did the right hon. and learned Gentleman raise with him the murder of the mayor of Nablus, for which credit was claimed by two Syrian-backed terrorist organisations? If so, what response did he receive?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I had already made plain—and I make plain again today—the serious view that we take of the tragic death of the mayor of Nablus, Mr. Zafer al-Masri. That brutal murder of a moderate, courageous Palestinian must be seen as a setback to hopes of a just and lasting peace in the middle east. Of course we raised and discussed that matter with Mr. Shara and made plain our abhorrence of that act, which can only damage Palestinian interests. We urged him in that context, and more widely, to end Syrian support to terrorist groups. He made plain his Government's position of opposition to terrorism.

Dr. Blackburn: Will my right hon. and learned Friend kindly take note of the historic, forthcoming Israeli visit of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, who will be the first British Prime Minister in office to visit Israel? Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the future key to peace in that part of the middle east lies in the full implementation and acceptance of the Camp David agreement?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am glad to welcome what my hon. Friend has said about the forthcoming visit of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to Israel, which I know will be welcomed there and supported in this country. I do not think that it would be helpful at this point for me to support this, that or the other of the many principled plans put forward for the solution of the main Arab-Israel problem. The problem is not to define or redefine principles, but to find effective representation that will bring both sides together in meaningful negotiations to that end.

Mr. Donald Stewart: Is the Foreign Secretary aware that it is unrealistic to demand the renunciation of violence prior to any discussions with the PLO, because if they do that, there is not the slightest chance of getting the Israeli Government to pay any attention to the PLO's legitimate demands?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The right hon. Gentleman is entitled to take that view if he wishes. It is certainly necessary to acknowledge that the renunciation of violence in the context of seeking an end to a dispute of this kind cannot be secured easily. It is necessary to go on pressing the case for violence to be renounced and for the parties to come together on the basis of agreed objectives and principles.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: In view of the Prime Minister's forthcoming visit to Israel, may I ask what arrangements will be made for her to be brought into contact with Palestinian viewpoints? What plans are there for her to visit the occupied territories? Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that many people regard it as most important that the visit should be seen to be balanced in its approach?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Obviously I cannot comment at this stage on the precise details of the plans for my right hon. Friend's visit. I acknowledge, as does my right hon. Friend, the importance for our interest in the problems of the region to be balanced, not only in regard to the visit, but more widely. I remind my hon. Friend that it is only some six months since my right hon. Friend made a visit to Jordan and there saw another aspect of the same question.

Mr. Ernie Ross: Will the Foreign Secretary take the opportunity of the visit of the Prime Minister to Israel to encourage the Palestinians to believe that Britain wants to play a role by ensuring that the Prime Minister makes it clear that when the Foreign Secretary assumes the presidency of the European Council on 1 July, he will continue the long-standing arrangement, which we broke in 1980, of meeting the chairman of the Palestine Liberation Organisation, Yasser Arafat?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I think I am right in saying that since 1976 there has been contact at official level with the Palestine Liberation Organisation. As I have already made clear, we recognise that it will have to be associated with any peace negotiations. Of course, the Palestinians and their interests will have to be taken account of at each stage of all our consideration of the question. That will not be absent from the mind of my right hon. Friend when she goes to Israel.

Mr. Deakins: What views did the Syrian Foreign Minister express to the right hon. and learned Gentleman about the way forward in resolving the Palestinian problem? Did the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree with those views?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I do not think that I am in a position to offer a long exposition of the views of the Syrian Foreign Minister. He gave a long talk yesterday at Chatham House about the matter. The point that I sought to impress upon him is the need on the Arab side to try to secure the involvement of all those countries which in different ways and at different times have expressed an interest in a peaceful solution. That is why we have given encouragement, not merely to the initiative of King Hussein, but to a possible and constructive interest by Israel and have also noted the important initiative by President Mubarak the other day. All the initiatives have to come together and meet a corresponding disposition from the Israeli side. Our effort is to try to promote all those things.

Mr. Anderson: President Assad has recently again called for the tearing up of the Camp David accord and showed himself fundamentally opposed to the Hussein-Mubarak initiative. In view of that, and of the fact that it now seems certain that there will be a change of Prime Minister in Israel, does the Foreign Secretary realistically see any life left in the Hussein initiative? Does he not see the looming confrontation between Syria and Israel on the Golan as the major point of tension in the middle east?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am not seeking from the Dispatch Box to give the impression that all is, or is about to be, sweetness and light. Of course, the House acknowledges, as does King Hussein himself, that his determined efforts to carry forward the peace process with Arafat and the PLO have received a setback. But he remains determined to continue his search for a peaceful settlement. I accept the point made by the hon. Gentleman that some of the observations of President Assad in his recent speech about the need for confrontation and a continued arms struggle are not likely to help that peace process forward. There are plenty of hazards in sight. Without unduly raising expectations, it must be our task to continue to encourage all those who are trying genuinely to advance the peace process.

Mr. Beith: Did the Foreign Secretary find at his meeting with the Syrian Foreign Minister that the Syrians are keen to see British involvement in the peace process? Is that not a particularly useful context in which to stress again the need for Syria to play an active part in stamping out the terrorism which led to Mr. Zafer al-Masri's death, which was greeted with universal grief in the Palestinian community?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is absolutely right that we should take this opportunity of stressing to the Syrian Government and the Syrian Foreign Minister not just our abhorrence of that senseless murder but our opposition to terrorism of all kinds from whichever quarter it may come in the Arab-Israeli dispute. We took the opportunity of pressing that point very clearly. The hon. Gentleman, like everyone else concerned, stresses the British role in helping to promote a solution to this problem. I must continually remind people that although we have a real interest, and are willing to play as full a part as we can, it must be essentially for the parties involved in the region to take the crucial steps that are necessary to bring about a solution.

ANC and SWAPO

8 Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what arrangements he has made for the free passage into the United Kingdom of members of the African National Congress and the South-West Africa Peoples' Organisation conducting their business in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Chalker: Entry clearance visas are issued to representatives of the African National Congress and the South-West Africa Peoples's Organisation in accordance with the terms of the current immigration rules.

Mr. Cohen: Will the Minister undertake to have talks with the Home Secretary to ensure that the Prevention of Terrorism Act is not abused, as it was on 22 September last year when the chief representative of SWAPO sought to enter Britain at Heathrow? Surely we should be supporting the ANC and SWAPO in their struggle against racist domination rather than putting spurious blocks in their way.

Mrs. Chalker: I am aware of the difficulties that Mr. Shapua Kaukungua had in September last year, but what happened then was something that could happen under the prevention of terrorism order to anyone passing through that airport—[Interruption.] Hon. Members may laugh, but on one of my recent visits overseas I had all my baggage opened under the terms of that Act.

Mr. Wilkinson: If the Government are sincere in their laudable determination to help to prevent terrorism, could they, as part of the five-nation Contact Group, do everything within their power to ensure that there is not free passage of SWAPO guerrillas—trained, supported and supplied by Cubans in Angola—into South-West Africa?

Mrs. Chalker: We do our best to bring to bear all those influences that would avoid just the situation described by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is the Minister aware that the long progress of African countries towards freedom from white minority rule has often been impeded by the reluctance of the British Government to encourage representatives of the liberation movements to come here for talks on the diplomatic circuit? Will the Minister ensure that this mistake does not occur again in respect of the last remaining white-dominated countries such as Namibia and South Africa? Indeed, will the Government assist their representatives to come here so that they can make proper contacts to help in the process?

Mrs. Chalker: As both my right hon. and learned Friend and I have said, on every occasion when we can promote dialogue we shall do so, but part of that process is the renunciation of violence by whosoever commits it. That is the other part of the balance that we are trying to create. I am quite determined that the dialogue shall continue wherever it can bring about peace.

Human Rights (CSCE)

9. Mr. David Sumberg asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the United Kingdom delegation to the conference on security and co-operation in Europe meeting in Berne in April will raise the issue of the freedom of individuals to practise their chosen profession without being subjected to religious or racial discrimination.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tim Renton): Although strictly speaking this issue is outside the mandate for the meeting, we are opposed to discrimination on the grounds of religion and race and will continue to raise this issue on all suitable occasions.

Mr. Sumberg: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his reply and also for the constant pressure that he and his colleagues in the Foreign Office have put on the Soviet Union, which has indirectly contributed to the release of Mr. Shcharansky. Will he make it clear to Mr. Gorbachev on as many occasions as possible that until the Soviet Union can be seen to be observing its own constitution on non-discrimination, it will be difficult for the West to believe that it will honour the agreements that it must enter into for real détente to come about?

Mr. Renton: I thank my hon. Friend for what he has just said. Unfortunately, in the case of Mr. Shchransky, one swallow does not make a summer, and there is as yet very little sign that in its treatment of human rights the new Soviet leadership will be very different from the previous one. But we shall certainly continue to raise this issue on every possible occasion, and the Berne meeting gives us another opportunity to do so.

Mr. James Lamond: If the Minister believes that our record is clean on this matter, will he raise with the West German Government the long-standing question of the berufsverbot—the law under which civil servants are prevented from holding professional positions because of what are usually Left-wing views—which is in my view a sign of Fascism creeping back into West Germany?

Mr. Renton: That seems to be above all a matter for the German Government. However, the Berne meeting, to which the question refers, is specifically concerned with human contacts and such matters as family re-unification, about which we shall wish to raise some serious cases.

Mr. Dickens: When my hon. Friend talks about racial and religious matters at the meeting, will he be sure to point out that where there are religious differences and customs, people will be expected to observe the laws of the country in which they reside?

Mr. Renton: I return to the fact that the Berne meeting, about which the question is concerned, is about such matters as travel, emigration and family re-unification. It does not cover a wide area, but I hope that there will be useful contacts on the issues that are covered by basket 3 of the Helsinki final act.

Mr. George Robertson: On the subject of the Berne meeting, may I draw the Minister's attention to the speech made by Mr. Gorbachev in Moscow last week—I had the distinction, and stamina, of listening to all five hours of it—and particularly the part about the interdependence of the world, which abandons the Soviet Government's previous position of irreconcilable camps in the world? Does he agree that that augurs well for continuing dialogue and discussion in the CSCE process? May we have some news about any progress that is being made in those talks?

Mr. Renton: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his patience and ability to listen to all five hours of Mr. Gorbachev's speech at the party congress. There is often a sense of frustration about the CSCE process, but it is worth reminding the House that it is a forum at which the important question of human rights can be discussed. I often think that it is interesting that Labour Members, who are so trusting of the Soviet Government regarding arms control, put down early-day motions about Soviet abuse of human rights, although the same Soviet leaders are involved in both issues.

African National Congress

12. Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give an account of the circumstances appertaining to, and the discussion during recent meetings between, the African National Congress and representatives of Her Majesty's Government.

Mrs. Chalker: We arranged the meeting in Lusaka on 3 February between a senior official of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and representatives of the African National Congress to reinforce the urgent need for dialogue within South Africa, and the general suspension of violence called for in the Commonwealth accord.

Mr. Caborn: I welcome that statement. I also welcome the hon. Lady's recent speech in which she called for the unconditional release of Nelson Mandela and said that that would show to the world that South Africa meant business. Does she not find a twinge of inconsistency in calling for that release, but being unwilling to meet representatives of the African National Congress in London?

Mrs. Chalker: There is absolutely no inconsistency. We have always said that we believe that the unconditional release of Nelson Mandela would constitute a major act of national reconciliation in South Africa, and could provide the impetus for genuine dialogue for a peaceful settlement. We have stressed the importance of that move to the South African Government. In the same way, the official level contacts with the ANC are also to promote dialogue and to get it to renounce violence, and so to bring a peaceful end to the present awful position in South Africa.

Mr. Forth: Will my hon. Friend confirm that meeting ANC representatives in no way condones or supports the techniques of terror that they are prone to use in South Africa? What would be her reaction if a foreign country approached Her Majesty's Government to make representations on the legitimate imprisonment of one of our citizens?

Mrs. Chalker: My hon. Friend is right. In no way do we condone violent behaviour. However, I must tell him that when a foreign Government approach us, we consider each approach on the facts as they are known to us. One cannot give a blanket response to cover the wide variety of approaches with which we must deal from many different countries.

Falkland Islands

13. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with European Economic Community partners concerning the United Kingdom's attitude to negotiations with Argentina over the Falkland Islands; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: As I explained to the House on 18 December 1985, our EC partners are briefed, as appropriate, on the international aspects of our Falklands policy, bilaterally and within the framework of European political co-operation. We have ensured that they are aware of our commitment to the Falkland Islanders, and of our desire for better relations with Argentina.

Dr. Marek: Is the Minister aware that one step along the path towards normalising relations with Argentina would be to end the unprincipled and extremely damaging fishing free-for-all in the waters round the Falkland Islands? Is he aware that many hon. Members, the islanders and Argentina want it ended? If he cannot get anywhere at the Food and Agriculture Organisation talks in Rome, will he do something himself quickly?

Mr. Eggar: We share the hon. Gentleman's anxiety about fishing off the Falklands. As he knows, we are actively pursuing efforts to achieve agreement on multilateral arrangements for fisheries under the auspices of the FAO. We have urged other Governments to co-operate with the FAO, and we were heartened by the signs that Argentina is ready to support the FAO initiative.

British Leyland

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Paul Channon): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement.

As I informed the House on 19 February, an invitation was extended to interested parties to declare by 4 March a firm intention to make a bid for one or more of the Land Rover, Freight Rover, Leyland Trucks and related businesses.

I can now report to the House that appropriate declarations have been made to BL's bankers by Schroder Ventures on behalf of some institutions and some members of BL management in respect of Land Rover, Range Rover and Freight Rover; by Lonrho in respect of Land Rover and Range Rover; and by Aveling Barford in respect of Land Rover only. General Motors has also confirmed its intention to make a bid for Land Rover, Range Rover, Freight Rover and Leyland Trucks.

The Laird Group and Aveling Barford are each in discussion with BL regarding the acquisition of Leyland Bus, for which proposals on behalf of some members of the management are also expected. Discussions in relation to Leyland Bus are taking place over a slightly different timescale from those concerning other Land Rover-Leyland businesses. I shall make a further statement to the House on these in due course.

The BL board is giving careful consideration to all the proposals received on or before 4 March and I hope to have its recommendations shortly. The board and the Government remain anxious to end the present uncertainty surrounding the businesses as soon as possible in the interests of the companies, management and work force and dealers and suppliers.

I take the opportunity to inform the House of a forthcoming change in the chairmanship of BL. Sir Austin Bide's appointment as chairman of BL was extended in late 1984 on the basis that he would continue as chairman until a convenient moment for his retirement was reached. Sir Austin has kindly agreed to remain as chairman until decisions have been made on the future of the main Land Rover-Leyland businesses. That will represent the start of a new phase in the development of BL and, on my nomination, the BL board proposes to invite Mr. Graham Day, at present chairman of British Shipbuilders, to join the board and to become full-time chairman of BL at a date to be determined. I express the Government's thanks, and add my warmest personal tribute, to Sir Austin, under whose leadership BL has achieved notable progress.

I am appointing Mr. Phillip Hares, the present deputy chief executive and board member for finance of the corporation, to succeed Mr. Graham Day as chairman of British Shipbuilders.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): As this tangled web becomes more and more confusing and complex, is it not clear that the Government should never have departed from the concept of British Leyland remaining a integrated and public sector operation strongly supported by the British Government?

Will the Secretary of State confirm that the Government approached General Motors as long ago as April 1984, and for 18 months General Motors has been able to consider and negotiate its position, while all other bidders have been given little more than 20 days? Does that not show that the Government were already predisposed to sell the lot to General Motors? In view of the representations made to the Minister of State by my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) and my hon. Friends the Members for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) and for Preston (Mr. Thorne), why is it that Lancashire Enterprises Ltd. does not appear in the list of those permitted to make a bid for parts of the operation?

What will the time scale be? Is it correct, as is widely rumoured, that the Government will impose a time scale whereby the whole operation has to be completed by the end of this month? Given the fact that the Secretary of State confirms that the only bidder for Leyland Vehicles is General Motors, has that not put the Government in a hopeless position whereby General Motors will be able to insist on acquiring Land Rover as a condition for acquiring Leyland Vehicles? How do any sensible Government put themselves in such a hopeless bargaining position?

After this asset-stripping operation is completed, what will the new chairman be chairman of? Should he not be called chairman of Austin Rover? The Secretary of State will have seen a report on the back page of the Financial Times today, of a speech by Mr. Bob Lutz, chairman of Ford of Geneva. The article says:

> "Ford was willing to restart talks about a possible takeover of Austin Rover . . . He said the Government had panicked recently when it told Ford to end the talks".

What is the Secretary of State's comment on that? In view of that ominous statement, will he give us a crystal-clear guarantee that, throughout the lifetime of this Government, there will be no talks by the Government, or by British Leyland at their instructions, with Ford about the Austin Rover Group?

Mr. Channon: I shall try to deal with the points that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has raised. What he said about selling is unreasonable. It has been known for many years that the Government had every intention of privatising British Leyland and its component parts. That has been known ever since the last general election. There is no question of reopening talks with Ford or Austin Rover; and any rumours to that effect I disown and reject. I am satisfied that bidders had adequate time to put in a firm indication of interests. We shall study them carefully on their merits, and there is no question of any member of the Government having made up their minds before these careful considerations have taken place. I assure the House that that is the case. [HON. MEMBERS: "That is not what the Prime Minister said."] That is indeed what my right hon. Friend said.

We shall consider carefully the indications of interest that have come in. As to Lancashire Enterprises Ltd., people from it had meetings with my hon. Friend the Minister of State early yesterday, and every assistance was given to it to try to get it into a position to make a firm indication of interest, but I understand that by last night it had not given any such indications.

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, whatever the outcome of the consideration of these different bids, parts of BL are now desirable packages and it is a good thing to have several different bidders so that one can choose from them? Does he accept that the Government are no longer a good owner because these businesses need considerable sums of capital investment if they are to keep up with the international market, and the Government will always have more pressing demands on their money for things such as schools and hospitals, and industries in which they have an interest will always come bottom of the list? The sooner these firms are returned to the private sector, the better for the firms, the better for production and the better for the people who work in those firms.

Mr. Channon: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. He has made three very important points. First, he draws attention to the fact that, under this Government, British Leyland is in a much better state than it was when the Opposition had control of it. Secondly, it is quite true that large sums of capital investment are required in various parts of British Leyland if they are to be in a position to compete in the long term. Thirdly, what we are trying to do and what we shall continue to try to do is to secure the long-term commercial future of these industries and the jobs of the people who work in them.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Having talked yesterday to both the management and the shop stewards at Land Rover, may I put a question to the Secretary of State that I have asked repeatedly both of him and of the Prime Minister? What formal consultations will there be with the 8,000 employees of Land Rover about their future before decisions are made? We appreciate that in terms of making a fast buck or short-term employment the case for selling the whole organisation to General Motors must seem attractive to the Government, but in terms of the long run—the design, manufacturing and engineering capacity of this country—surely it is worth while to take a little longer and to try to find British-based solutions for each division of the company?

Mr. Channon: On the right hon. Gentleman's last question, I think I am right in saying that Mr. Andrews makes it clear in his letter that he is anxious for a quick solution because he thinks that it is very damaging if this uncertainty drags on. I cannot therefore agree with the right hon. Gentleman that we should take a long time. We want to have a reasonable period in which to consider the indications of interest that have been expressed and to put forward proposals that meet the best long-term interests of the companies concerned. There the right hon. Gentleman and I are at one. Consultation with the work force is a matter for the companies concerned. They tell me that they are keeping their work force informed continually and that they will continue to do so. My hon. Friend the Minister for Industry has received deputations from the work force and from the trade unions, and we shall be delighted to continue to do so.

Mr. Hal Miller (Bromsgrove): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that not only was it the long-standing policy of the Government to return these businesses to private ownership once they were profitable but that that was also the declared policy of the British Leyland board and of the subsidiary boards? Will he also confirm that we should welcome the fact that these enterprises have become successful, that a return to the private sector is now possible and that the Government's decision will be based upon the best interests of those who work for and supply those companies?

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend is entirely right. As I have explained to the House on a number of occasions, the BL board agrees with that policy. It is entirely right that these subsidiaries should be returned to the private sector. If the Opposition had been in power, the companies certainly would not be in a profitable state.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): Will the Secretary of State confirm that Freight Rover has consistently made a profit on the manufacture and sale of Sherpa vans in this country, whereas General Motors is making a loss on its van operations in this country? Will he also confirm that Freight Rover is now selling more vans than General Motors is selling in this country? Does he agree that for General Motors to take over Freight Rover would be for a loser to take over a winner?

Mr. Channon: I had better give the hon. Gentleman the figures for 1983 and 1984 for Land Rover (UK) Ltd. I can give him the published figures for the first half of 1985; I do not have the later figures. In 1983, Land Rover (UK) Ltd.—which includes Land Rover, Freight Rover and parts and equipment—made a loss of £14·5 million. In 1984 there was a small profit of £2·4 million. In the first half of 1985 the profit, before interest and tax, was £5·7 million.

Mr. Davis: Freight Rover.

Mr. Channon: Of course, one has to split the figures between Freight Rover and Land Rover. I agree with the hon. Gentleman to the extent that, in so far as one can appropriately work out the interest payments and apportion them correctly, Freight Rover is more profitable than Land Rover.

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): In considering the options for the future of Land Rover, will my right hon. Friend take all factors into account and not merely the biggest bid?

Mr. Channon: Yes, I have explained to the House that we are trying to seek the best long-term future for the companies and, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said yesterday, for the jobs of those concerned.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): May I ask the Secretary of State about the interests of the American Government in this sale? Have the Government been in touch with the United States Government and is it a fact that General Motors has been able to say to the British Government that, if it is allowed to acquire parts of British Leyland, the United States will place orders with British Leyland following the sale and that that is the real reason why the sale is going through?

Mr. Channon: No, Sir; I repudiate what the right hon. Gentleman says.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): In relation to the bid from General Motors, can my right hon. Friend assure me that the Government will be seeking clear and firm assurances from General Motors on the future of jobs and investment in the Bedford truck plant in Dunstable before deciding whether to accept GM's bid? There is great anxiety in Dunstable, for obvious reasons.

Mr. Channon: Yes, I understand my hon. Friend's concern, and naturally I shall want to discuss that matter before coming to any decision. Indeed, we should discuss what will happen in either eventuality — whether the General Motors bid goes through or whether it does not.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is it true that the chief executive of the Laird Group has written to the chairman of British Leyland saying that the only basis on which Laird is willing to take over Leyland Bus is if the two plants at Workington and Lowestoft are closed and the Farington plant reduced but retained? Will the Secretary of State rule out that option today at the Dispatch Box? Will he also give me the assurance that in the event that the management buy-out is submitted and is fully funded, it will be given the maximum consideration by the Department, but that if it is not fully funded it will still be treated as a new corporate plan and an alternative option for a Leyland Bus reporting direct to the Leyland board and being retained in public ownership?

Mr. Channon: On the hon. Gentleman's last point, we shall naturally consider any properly funded management buy-out proposals from the management of Leyland Bus. Indeed, I say in my statement that we expect that proposals may come. We shall naturally consider them carefully.

I understand that Laird has given a preliminary view of its proposals to British Leyland. Nothing final has been proposed and we shall consider that on its merit on the same criteria — what will be best for the long-term commercial future of the company.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Will my right hon. Friend accept that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor) said, when we come to a solution as to how the Land Rover problem in particular is to be dealt with, we shall not be preoccupied with making a quick buck—the best sum—but what is in the best long-term interests of the motor manufacturing companies of Britain?

Bearing in mind the Government's preoccupation with those over the other side of the Atlantic solving our problems, was there no British industrialist who would have had the confidence of the manufacturing entities in Britain who could have been appointed instead of yet another person from across the Atlantic? There are good people in Britain who have the confidence of the manufacturing companies in the west midlands and the whole of Britain. Why always overseas?

Mr. Channon: I am rather surprised by my hon. Friend's last point. Mr. Day is a British citizen and he comes from Canada. That has not usually debarred people from appointment in Britain. As to my hon. Friend's first point, I can confirm that we are looking at the long-term interests of the companies concerned.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): As to the work forces and the managements of the various parts of BL, is it a question of management informing the work forces about developments or consulting the work forces about developments?

Mr. Channon: The management and the work force must carry out the normal procedures in cases of this kind. I am extremely anxious, as my hon. Friend the Minister of State has shown, to receive deputations, if they are appropriate, from any of the trade unions that wish to come and see me and make their case direct to the Government.

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): May I endorse the calls by my hon. Friends for a long-term solution and ask my right hon. Friend to ignore the siren voices for short-term expediency? Has not the way in which the Opposition have tangled the publicity on this matter added to the time constraints faced by my right hon. Friend in finding the right solution and restoring market confidence to British Leyland as soon as possible?

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend is entirely right. It is essential to bring these talks to a reasonably early conclusion after full consideration has been given to these matters. I repeat what I have told other hon. Members: we are anxious to achieve the solution that is best in the long-term interests of those in the company.

Mr. Stan Thorne (Preston): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware, following the meeting yesterday morning with the Minister, that Lancashire Enterprises Ltd. sent a telex to Hill Samuel stating its intention to make a bid? Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that that has not happened?

Mr. Channon: My information is that the company had not, by the close of play, expressed a firm indication

Hon. Members: Play?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Public schools coming out now.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State.

Mr. Skinner: The right hon. Gentleman should declare his innings.

Mr. Channon: I shall answer the question if I am allowed to do so. My hon. Friend the Minister saw a deputation yesterday led by the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw). The deputation was given a full opportunity to declare a firm indication of interest but it did not do so.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): Will my right hon. Friend accept that there is some significance in the fact that only General Motors has bid for the whole package, including the loss-making aspect of Leyland Trucks? Will my right hon. Friend refute the allegations by the Opposition and by my right hon. Friends the Members for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) and for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) that General Motors is not a good employer? We in Luton refute those allegations and look forward to the amalgamation of the two companies.

Mr. Channon: I am sure that General Motors has been an excellent employer in the Bedford region. I think that that is well recognised.

Mr. Skinner: What is the right hon. Gentleman's average?

Mr. Channon: Very bad, I would say. My hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) is quite right. We must consider what will be best in the long-term interests of the truck industry.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the overwhelming opposition of trade unionists inside Leyland and of working people in Coventry, the midlands and elsewhere to selling off to private profiteers, whether American or British, any part or all of Leyland? Will the right hon. Gentleman get in touch with the Leyland board and condemn its actions in the past two weeks in attempting to soften up the work force by dismissing two Transport and General Workers Union conveners at Land Rover, Solihull and Unipart, Coventry for their stated opposition to privatisation?

Mr. Channon: I regret that I am unlikely to be able to please the hon. Gentleman in conducting these negotiations. I think that an early-day motion has been tabled about the point he raised. That is another matter.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Can my right hon. Friend give the House an unequivocal assurance that the Government would prefer a British solution?

Mr. Channon: We want a solution that is in the best long-term interests of those involved.

Mr. Norman Atkinson (Tottenham): If the bid from General Motors for the Leyland heavy vehicle division is rejected, what contingency plans have the Government made for heavy vehicle manufacture?

Mr. Channon: We must first of all consider all the indications of interest that have come in, and then decide what to do.

Mr. Den Dover (Chorley): Will my right hon. Friend pay particular attention, if the truck division is separated from the bus division, to the 2,000 workers at Multipart, Chorley, which is a highly computerised, extremely efficient and profitable operation? The workers want to ensure that they can service both Leyland Bus and Leyland Trucks and other manufacturers in future.

Mr. Channon: I will certainly bear in mind what my hon. Friend has said in his important intervention.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): Will the Secretary of State accept that he is not playing a cricket match and that this matter affects people's livelihoods? The hon. Gentleman said that he wants a quick decision, so will he give us the actual timetable as that is very important? Will the right hon. Gentleman bear in mind that the employees of British Leyland have no confidence in being informed by a management that previously denied that any talks were taking place? It is not information but consultation that is needed. Can he say what wages will be paid to the employees? The employees should have a say in the matter when their jobs are at risk.

Mr. Channon: I have already answered the hon. Gentleman's last point in the reply that I gave to his hon. Friend the Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds). In reply to his point about the speed of the decision, I have tried to explain to the House on a number of occasions that we want the quickest conclusion possible that is consistent with arriving at a decision after a detailed examination of the indications of interest that have been put forward. It is in no one's interest that the matter should be dragged out. I cannot today say what the timetable is, as a detailed study has not yet been made of the indications that have come forward.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the main concern among the hard-headed workers in BL is the security of their jobs? They do not like the politicking on the Opposition benches. Is my right hon. Friend further aware that not all BL employees and BL suppliers wish to remain pensioners of the taxpayer?

Mr. Channon: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's comments, and I agree with them.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): What time scale has the Secretary of State given to the British Leyland board? Is the Secretary of State aware of the complaints from bodies such as the West Midlands enterprise board that they were denied access to information from British Leyland? Will he ensure that all those who need information to which General Motors has had access for about 18 months, will now get that information?

Mr. Channon: I am assured that anyone who has asked for information has received it. I have already tried several times to answer the question about the time scale. We shall be as quick as we can but the matter will require some study and the House would expect that proper study would be made before proposals were put forward.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): On that last point, is my right hon. Friend aware that I was informed this morning that Lonhro was unable to have meetings with the management of BL, was unable to meet the work force and was not supplied with the information which it would have normally have expected to receive if it was to put in a bid? Will my right hon. Friend give the House a simple, straightforward assurance that what I have just said is wrong and that all the bidders were provided with precisely the same information as was available to General Motors?

Mr. Channon: Lonhro, and everyone else who asked, was given a packet of information which I am assured by my advisers, as well as by the advisers to BL, was normal practice. Lonhro has made a firm indication of interest and we shall treat that seriously and consider the proposals.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Does the Secretary of State accept that the motor industry plays a central and strategic role in manufacturing industry in any country in the western world? Will he therefore give us an assurance that at least one motor manufacturer in this country will remain under the control of people in this country so that that strategic role can be properly performed?

Mr. Channon: I have already told the House, in answer to the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), that there is no question of any talks going on in connection, for example, with Ausin Rover. I think that that answers the hon. Gentleman's point.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-upon-Avon): Does my right hon. Friend accept that those who are prepared to be rational on this subject are actually much more numerous than he may have supposed at times in recent weeks and today, that they agree with him that British Leyland ought to be in the private sector and that, if it is to be successful there, it will need access to substantial capital and to major markets? If British participants are credibly able to offer those benefits, so much the better. Would my right hon. Friend agree that last-ditch little Englander attitudes threaten jobs and the future prosperity of British Leyland?

Mr. Channon: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right. We must have a solution that takes account of the points that he has made and one that is in the interests of those who will work in the industries and so keep a viable industry in this country.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Is the Secretary of State aware that, under the chairmanship of Graham Day, more than 20,000 employees of British Shipbuilders lost their jobs and that, far from giving BL employees confidence in the future, Graham Day's appointment alone will strike fear into their hearts? Will the Secretary of State confirm that the bid from General Motors includes a substantial sum for the immediate declaration of 1,000 redundancies in BL and that GM is on public record as saying that 1,000 people will lose their jobs almost on the day that it takes over BL?

Mr. Channon: None of the indications of interest have been examined in detail, but that is clearly a point that one would wish to consider in detail with anyone who comes forward with suggestions. I am surprised at the hon. Gentleman's comments about Graham Day, as he was appointed by the Labour Government in the mid-1970s. The hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) said of Graham Day:

"He was well thought of on Merseyside, particularly in Cammell Laird. He did a first-class job."—[Official Report, 9 December 1976; Vol. 923, c. 629.]

I can give quotations from any number of Labour Members if the House wishes.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: I will call those hon. Members who have been rising in their places.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): If the talks between Austin Rover and Ford are truly dead, will my right hon. Friend tell the board and workers of Austin Rover to get their fingers out because in the past 25 years British car manufacturers' share of the home market has dropped from 90 per cent. to 34 per cent.? Does he agree that if yesterday's prophecy by the chairman of Ford (UK) turns out to be right and the abandonment of the talks turns out to be a tragedy for Britain leading to widespread job losses and Austin Rover ends up in the lap of Honda of Japan, a lot of people will have a lot to answer for, including Members of Parliament who blocked that deal?

Mr. Channon: I agree to some extent with my hon. Friend—at least to the extent that it is exceedingly important for Austin Rover to increase its share of the United Kingdom and European car markets. It has under 4 per cent. of the European car market. I very much hope that it will achieve that increase. It has already made some improvement and I hope that that will continue.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): Will the Secretary of State resist making quick decisions on this matter and give careful consideration to the long-term future of the British car manufacturing industry? Will he now respond to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) and say what weight he believes should be given to the opinion of the work force about the future of the industry in which they work?

Mr. Channon: We will, of course, give careful consideration. We must try to achieve reasonably speedy but careful consideration. The House must understand that the two aspects are not necessarily inconsistent. I hope that the closest talks will take place with the work force. Indeed, the companies concerned tell me that they are engaged in talking to the work force, and my colleagues and I are very happy to receive any further deputations.

Sir Paul Bryan (Boothferry): Can my right hon. Friend explain why Labour Members are happy to implore the Japanese Nissan company to set up in this country but will have nothing to do with co-operation with American companies which have already supplied far greater and better employment than BL in the past 20 years?

Mr. Channon: It is impossible for me to explain the workings of Labour Members' minds.

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): Have BL workers and ex-BL workers who have a share interest in BL been properly and legally consulted in this matter?

Mr. Channon: I understand that all legal requirements are taking place. Now that the indications of interest are in, it is essential that the usual procedures be followed.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): What interest has Aveling Barford shown in Leyland Bus and how is that company's interest connected with the Laird bid?

Mr. Channon: So far, we have had only preliminary indications from Aveling Barford. Subject to correction, I do not think that there is any connection with the Laird Group. I will certainly take advice on that, but I am not making a statement about Leyland Bus today.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): Just as BL came into the public sector largely by accident, are we not in danger of getting rid of it by accident? Is the Secretary of State bound to accept the views of the BL board, as he said in his statement? What is wrong with workers having a vote in their own and their families' future?

Lastly, will the Secretary of State place in the Library a copy of every statement made by Ministers since the last general election which could be taken by business men outside as an invitation to the effect that BL or parts of it were up for auction? Where is the evidence for that and can it be placed in the Library?

Mr. Channon: My own statements in the past month would fill a book, so anxious has the House been to hear from me in the past few weeks. The House knows that we have always made it clear that in our view the best future for the car industry and other industries is a return to the private sector, which is far better for them than the public sector.

Rate Support Grant

4.5 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement.

The House will be pleased to know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment was yesterday able to tell the local authority associations that he could guarantee that £500 million of grant would be available to be recycled in 1986-87 and that authorities would be able to take this into account in fixing lower precepts and rates.

As the House will recall, in the rate support grant debate on 20 January my right hon. Friend explained that if local authorities budgeted to spend more next year than we allowed for in the RSG settlement the grant forfeited by overspenders would go into a pool which would then be recycled to all authorities. He illustrated the grant gains to authorities if the pool were £400 million. Those figures could only be illustrative at that stage, because they depended on authorities' budget decisions.

This week, in the light of the latest figures available, we are in a position to go much firmer than that. It is clear that the pool of grant to be recycled will be some £500 million. This means that the grant gains will be bigger than those illustrated in January and that authorities will get more grant than they have assumed. Moreover, to avoid all doubts the Government are prepared formally to guarantee that £500 million of grant will be recycled. My Department has written to all authorities telling them the amount of extra grant that they will receive from that amount of recycling in addition to their grant entitlement under the RSG settlement announced in December. I am placing a copy of the table in the Library.

Councils will now know the size of their grant entitlement more clearly and this will allow them to make a lower call on their ratepayers. Where the rate making has not been completed, I hope that hon. Members will urge their local authorities to revise their rating plans in the light of these figures.

My right hon. Friend wrote to the local authority associations as soon as he was in a position to confirm the level of recycled grant that would be available. Local authorities are now making their rating and precepting decisions, and it was essential to provide them with this information immediately. I am sure that all hon. Members will agree that rate increases should be no higher than absolutely necessary.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Will the Minister confirm that no new extra money is involved in the statement, and that since the abolition of targets last July every local authority treasurer has been aware that a sum of this size would be available for recycling? If there is any substance in the statement, why have the Government waited until most shire counties have set rates for 1986-87?

Is the Minister aware that, so far, Conservative shire counties have increased their rates by far more than Labour shires have done? Is she aware that Kent is raising its rates by 13 per cent., East Sussex by 19·9 per cent., Dorset by 20 per cent., and Buckinghamshire by 30 per cent.? Does she expect any shire authority which has set its rate to change its decision now, and, if so, by how much?

As this is supposed to help lower spending authorities, will the Minister explain why, of the 21 authorities shown in the tables to receive absolutely nothing, nine are Conservative-controlled, including authorities such as Hillingdon, Westminster, South Bucks, Chiltern, Elmbridge, and Epsom and Ewell? Why are those authorities to receive nothing?

Will the Minister confirm that the sums specified in the tables are gross figures and take no account of what has already been lost? As the sums are supposed to be guaranteed, what happens if the authorities spend over the budget assumptions on which they are made? Will they get the money anyway?

Lastly, is the Minister aware that yesterday's announcement and today's statement are no more than a cheap and highly misleading public relations stunt by Ministers who have been panicked by high rate rises in Tory shires and by the financial uncertainty and chaos that they have created in Labour and Conservative authorities alike?

Mrs. Rumbold: I am surprised to hear the hon. Member speaking in such terms. I should have thought that he would have the grace to welcome the new announcement simply because it gives local authorities a greater certainty. That is a rather poor way to respond to news which is important to local councils, especially when they are about to go before their ratepayers to make this announcement.

The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question about the shire counties is that there is still time for them to reconsider their rate levels. In the light of this new information, one hopes that those shire counties which have taken a pessimistic view on what their grant entitlement, through recycling, might have been will reconsider the submissions that they have made. There is still time for the shire counties to do that.

I believe that many local authorities will welcome today's statement, and I trust that most will not share the pessimistic and uncharitable view of the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw).

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I propose to give preference to those Members who were not called on 28 January. I said that I would do this.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): Is the Minister aware that not only have some of the Tory shire counties set their rates without taking account of this flowback money, but that some local authorities decided to organise their budgets to take account of moneys which they thought they might get?

The Government have just come to the rescue of local authorities such as Sefton, which, until today's statement, have made a deficit budget. Sefton was set to "do a Liverpool" and break the law. Is the Minister aware that this miserly amount of money will not make a significant difference, because Sefton will still have a 26 to 30 per cent. rate increase? All the rates will go up by massive amounts on Merseyside, and that is a direct consequence of the cost of abolishing Merseyside county council.

Mrs. Rumbold: I am aware, and I think my right hon. Friend is aware, that some local authorities' treasurers were advising considerable caution about the money which my right hon. Friend said was recycled money. That is one reason why some local authorities were taking a slightly pessimistic view. For those local authorities which were proposing to make a higher rate than they had hoped to make this announcement will make all the difference to what they do, and indeed it has been greatly welcomed by them.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Is my hon. Friend aware that her statement will be widely welcomed on these Benches? The warm welcome that I give to her statement is coupled with a question: what will happen next year? The way in which the announcement has been made and the timing of it—the fact that we are told on 5 March that there is to be a change in the settlement for the coming year—is the reverse of perfect.

Mrs. Rumbold: I understand the difficulties with which some councils have been presented. My right hon. Friend had a greater awareness of the amount of money that he hoped to find in the recycling pool because of information sent in daily of budgets set and estimates announced. That is why we have been a little late. However, I understand the point that my hon. Friend has made. I shall relay that message and take note of it in the future.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): First, will the Minister explain why the announcement was made outside the House before being made in the Chamber? Secondly, will the Minister explain how it is possible for those counties which have already set their rates to do anything to take into account the figures announced today? Thirdly, will the Minister explain how it is possible to justify the decision by her right hon. Friend only two months ago that the average rate increase would be 7 to 9 per cent. when we now know that many Conservative-controlled counties have set rate increases of 30 per cent.?

Lastly, will the Minister explain why the Government believe that they can change the rules of the game at this late stage? In January the Government did not suggest with any certainty that they would so so. Are the Government fully aware that it takes more than a matter of minutes for local authorities to recast their budgets, even if they have not set their rates by today?

Mrs. Rumbold: It was regarded as important that local authorities, many of which were last night in the process of starting to make their rate settlements, should have the information as quickly as possible. That was my right hon. Friend's decision. The information was given to the local authorities because of that decision, and was brought to the House as quickly as possible.

A number of shire counties are setting their rates to spend 10 per cent. more. That is not welcomed by my right hon. Friend or, indeed, by his colleagues. It is sad, and it is to be deprecated that these local authorities are setting their rates quite so high. As the deadline for authorities to set their precept is Monday, we hope that those authorities which have already set their rates will take the opportunity to reopen negotiations when they learn of the substantial sums of money that will come to them in grant. It is possible for them to do that.

I must reiterate to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) that this is information that local authorities will welcome. If the information is a little late the Government regret that, but it is better for the local authorities to have this information at this stage than not at all.

Sir Ian Gilmour (Chesham and Amersham): Any increase in money is welcome, but will my hon. Friend clarify her statement? Will she confirm that the difference between what she has said today and what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said in January is £100 million? That will make a difference in Buckinghamshire of about £1 million, but, compared with the £26 million which the Government have already robbed from Buckinghamshire, that is not a large sum. As the shire counties must increase their rates because of Government policies, does not my hon. Friend think it wrong for her not to regret that?

Mrs. Rumbold: Buckinghamshire is now certain to receive £7,403,000, which will make a difference to the county's rate making. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has always taken the view that local authorities should take care to study the hopes and expectations of central Government expenditure plans when setting their rates. We had hoped that local authorities would be careful to ensure that they did not exceed the Government's expenditure plans.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I welcome the news that £8·5 million extra recycled grant will be given to the county of Leicestershire and hope that Leicestershire county council will reduce the 27 per cent. increase in its rate, but will my hon. Friend explain why Leicester city, which has increased its rates by 80 per cent., will be given an additional £431,000? It is the greatest candidate for being rate-capped.

Mrs. Rumbold: I understand my hon. Friend's position on his local authority of Leicester city. However, recycled grant has to be given even-handedly across the country, otherwise the system will collapse. I sympathise with my hon. Friend, but I hope that he will go back to his constituency and beseech the council to be far more responsible in its attitude towards its ratepayers. It is the business ratepayer who will suffer most because of the exorbitant 80 per cent. rate increase.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): I join my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) in welcoming the Minister's statement. Will she tell us how much East Sussex will gain? What advice will she offer to the leader of the East Sussex county council, which has already made its budget?

Mrs. Rumbold: East Sussex will get £7·432 million. My advice to the leader of the East Sussex council, who is a friend and a well respected council leader, is that if he is so minded, he may like to call a council meeting before Monday and adjust the precept. That is perfectly possible.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): Does my hon. Friend agree that, although what she has announced is an improvement, there must be a better way in which to handle our rate support grant system? Would it not be a much better system if it allowed local authorities which spend less than their grant-related expenditure assessments to get more, and those who spend more than the Goverment think they should to get less grant?

Mrs. Rumbold: I understand the logic of what my hon. Friend says, but the system by which we allocate grant is national. GREAs are made on national expenditure notions, so it is rather difficult to adjust the figures as I suspect my hon. Friend would like, which is in essence to play balances against and for in such a way as would be inequitable across the country. We have to allocate grant as fairly as possible. We all agree that that is right.

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): Does the Minister agree that, although she regrets the rate increases in the shire counties, it was the rate support grant legislation which caused an increase of more than 15 per cent. in Cambridgeshire? Is she aware that if one quantifies her statement, one finds that the Cambridgeshire rate, which is £1·94, can now go down to £1·92½—or could do had it not set a precept last week? Does she agree that good management in local government depends on planning, and that that is impossible if the goal posts are moved while the game is in action? Will she at least give the House a promise that West Derbyshire and Ryedale will not have an extra rate support change before the by-elections?

Mrs. Rumbold: I prefer to ignore the hon. Gentleman's latter remark, as I do not think that it is worth answering. Cambridgeshire is a Liberal-Social Democratic alliance-controlled council, and it has chosen to raise its rate by a disgraceful 33 per cent. this year. That is unnecessary. If the council had examined its expenditure carefully rather than played with figures and toyed with ratepayers, it could have kept its rates far lower. It has set a very high rate. I hope that it will take this opportunity to rethink the position, for the sake of all of its ratepayers.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I said earlier that I would try to call those hon. Members who had been rising regularly. I shall do my best to get everybody in.

Mr. Colin Shepherd (Hereford): Does my hon. Friend agree that there will be a temptation for authorities which have set their precepts without taking account of the possibility of a recycling grant? For example, Liberal-SDP-led shire counties such as Cambridgeshire, might be tempted to put that grant in the bank in balances and not reflect it in a reduction in the rate precept this year. Will my hon. Friend publish a list for each local authority which has set a precept showing what would be possible if it recycled the grant all the way into a reduced rate precept?

Mrs. Rumbold: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. There is likely to be a temptation for authorities which have already set the precept to bank the money. The information in the Library will enable my hon. Friend to see what the reduction could have been if authorities had taken a responsible attitude to their ratepayers and reduced their rates according to the amounts of money that are now guaranteed.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): My hon. Friend knows that Cleveland is the second smallest county, but that it is the second highest rated county, at 235p in the pound. Does she agree that it is highly unlikely that there will be any reduction for ratepayers, but that there will be a huge temptation for the Labour-controlled authority to spend the money without any regard for the national economy?

Mrs. Rumbold: I hope and trust that my hon. Friend will do his best to ensure that his constituents and others in Cleveland are well aware of the amount of money available to the local authority, so that they will be able to draw their own conclusions should the council's expenditure rise.

Sir Ian Percival (Southport): Is my hon. Friend aware that, despite the sour grapes of the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts), what she said will be very welcome to the ratepayers of Sefton?

Mr. Allan Roberts: It will not make any difference.

Sir Ian Percival: The guarantee that she has given, together with other things in the pipeline, could enable Sefton council to fix a rate increase at a figure about 5 per cent. lower. That is to say that, instead of looking at an increase of 25 per cent.—or even 30 per cent. and upwards if the Labour and Liberal parties had had their way over increased spending by the passenger transport authority—we may now hope to be looking at 20 per cent. or less. Is my hon. Friend aware that, contrary to what the hon. Member for Bootle said, this is nothing to do with abolition, but that the main increase is due to the excessive spending of a body that is not abolished—the passenger transport authority? Is she aware that my constituents and I are conscious of the fact that only the efforts of the Government, in curbing the excesses of that authority and then guaranteeing this extra money, have saved us from a really high increase?

Mrs. Rumbold: I am delighted that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has been able to help my right hon. and learned Friend. I am also delighted to learn that Sefton council now feels much more able to set a reasonable rate.

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): Although I welcome the improvement in the grant, is my hon. Friend aware that the real solution lies in rather more generous treatment of shire counties right from the beginning? In that regard, is she aware that she would have full support for her arguments in trying to persuade a mean-minded, parsimonious and apolitical Treasury to be more generous with shire counties in future?

Mrs. Rumbold: I am certain that the Government's overall expenditure plans for the country are right. I am glad that Wiltshire will be a happy beneficiary of my right hon. Friend's guaranteeing the £500 million, but I believe that shire counties, like all other local authorities, should be exhorted to try to contain their expenditure in the interests of the national economy.

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): Will my hon. Friend give the figure for West Sussex? Will she confirm that, because of the scale that she has announced, the fact of West Sussex being the lowest-rating precept authority in the country cannot be taken into account? Will she reaffirm that she looks to fundamental changes in the system to begin to address the problem in the future?

Mrs. Rumbold: The figure for West Sussex is £7·656 million. I hope that that will be of some advantage to the council. The Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" is, we hope, the basis for a completely different way of paying for local government which I hope all hon. Members will consider.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): May I, on behalf of Havering, welcome my hon. Friend's announcement, believing that even the whisper of virtue being its own reward is welcome in the light of recent years' experience? Will she undertake to give the widest publicity to the comments of the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) about the two areas that he mentioned, as the Liberals seem reluctant to see any support going to those areas?

Mrs. Rumbold: My hon. Friend knows that London as a whole has greatly welcomed my right hon. Friend's announcement, because most local authorities are about to make their rates. I note what my hon. Friend said, especially about Cambridgeshire and elsewhere.

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South): The metropolitan authority of Bury, which is by no means a rolling and wealthy shire county, will be extremely grateful for the announcement, which means nearly £1·5 million of additional resources. Does my hon. Friend agree that that Conservative-controlled authority has loyally followed the Government's plans for controlling local government expenditure, and that its ability to go further is now severely limited?

Mrs. Rumbold: I hope my hon. Friend will recognise that this announcement will greatly benefit the prudent and sensible authority in Bury, and I trust that this will serve to show that the Government recognise the difficulties under which the authority may have been labouring until now.

Mr. Robert C. Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): Will the Minister concede that every prudent treasurer, including the city treasurer of Newcastle upon Tyne, will have already anticipated this recycling and built it into a recommendation for the finance committee? Is this not simply a vicious confidence trick on ratepayers up and down the country? Would she care to let the House know what percentage the £2·894 million which Newcastle is supposed to be getting back is of the money that the Government have pinched this year from the ratepayers of Newcastle upon Tyne?

Mrs. Rumbold: I think that that is rather a cheap remark. The treasurer of Newcastle upon Tyne and other treasurers may well have been cautious, but they did not need to be quite as cautious as they have been, because my right hon. Friend told them clearly in January that the money would be available. Although those treasurers may have prayed caution in aid and wanted to maintain their position, it is the councillors who should determine what a rate should be or should not be. It is the councillors who have been fully aware of the sums that have been available to them.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): Does my hon. Friend agree that the £3·665 million which is being given to Cornwall under these arrangements makes nonsense of the pathetic propaganda attempt by the Liberals on that council to put the whole of the blame for an unnecessary 20 per cent. increase in rates on the Government?

Mrs. Rumbold: I support what my hon. Friend has said, and I agree with his sentiments.

Mr. George Gardiner (Reigate): Will my hon. Friend accept that her statement is good news to all those who have always supported prudent spending councils, as in Surrey, and who resented it when they appeared to be penalised for so doing? Is it not obvious that there must be a better system for apportioning central Government funds among local authorities, which avoids taking with one hand and giving back with the other?

Mrs. Rumbold: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and I am glad to know that the authorities which felt that they had not been as well served as they should have been feel much more secure in their position now. I refer my hon. Friend to the proposals which my right hon. Friend has made in his Green Paper, "Paying for Local Government".

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): Will my hon. Friend be able to clarify what this statement means for a low-spending shire county such as Norfolk, which has followed careful budgeting over many years? Will she be able to explain to the leader of Norfolk county council, when she meets him later this week, what he will be able to advise for a change in the rate precept or spending levels?

Mrs. Rumbold: I have been trying to explain to the House that for Norfolk the amount that is now guaranteed as recycled money is £7·2 million. If the leader of Norfolk council is minded to look again at the precept that he is levying, he will see that it is possible for him to make adjustments accordingly to save money for the ratepayers.

Mr. Timothy Wood (Stevenage): I was one of those who were deeply disappointed in the reduction of rate support grant for the home counties in particular, and I am relieved that prudent councils may now get more rate support grant. In Hertfordshire the initial loss of rate support grant was £20 million, and I am not sure whether my hon. Friend is aware that Hertfordshire county council has already set a rate precept increase of 21 per cent. How will the proposals that we have heard today help Hertfordshire?

Mrs. Rumbold: The proposals will help Hertfordshire in that it is now assured of receiving almost £12 million of recycled money. Perhaps that will be of some assistance to it in looking at its rates.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is the Minister aware that when the Conservatives on the Conservative-controlled Cumbria county council were trying to fix a rate some weeks ago and realised the implications of the rate support grant settlement, like a bunch of municipal cowards they ran away because they realised that to set a reasonable rate and maintain services was impossible? Is it not equally fair to say that today's statement will effectively mean no more money? I have just spoken to the treasurer of Cumbria county council, and he says that the proposals will have a negligible effect on the precept. Is that not the truth?

Mrs. Rumbold: I think that it is difficult for someone to say that the proposals will have a negligible effect when it is certain that Cumbria will receive nearly £4 million extra. [Interruption.] Of course, it does have some effect. The treasurers who were being prudent and advising their authorities not to take the extra money into account may well have been able to influence the councillors whose decision it is, I have to reiterate, not the treasurers, to take the money into account. One hopes that now that they have a guarantee from the Secretary of State they will think again.

Bates Colliery (Judicial Review)

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I briefly draw to your attention a matter of which I have given you prior notice? It concerns a difficulty which may occur in relation to the business of the House on Friday, when you have kindly granted me an Adjournment debate on the monstrous decision of the National Coal Board to close Bates colliery. The difficulty has arisen because of a case which is starting in the High Court tomorrow on that matter.

I am instructed that tomorrow morning a High Court judge will begin the substantive hearing of an application for judicial review by the Northumberland area of the National Union of Mineworkers against the National Coal Board. My respectful submission is that on Friday it may arise that the matter will be sub judice because the hearing will still be continuing, the judgment will not have been given or a notice of appeal may have been entered by the party which lost the case. May I draw your attention to your powers in this matter, as set out on page 343 of the current edition of "Erskine May". The relevant portion says that you have a discretion in sub judice matters of this nature and can allow a debate to take place

"provided that there is no real and substantial danger of prejudice to the proceedings."

My respectful submission is that a Friday afternoon Adjournment debate will in no way influence a High Court judge hearing a complicated case for a judicial review on Thursday and Friday.

There are three reasons why the matter is urgent. First, at this colliery—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is this not hypothetical? The hon. Gentleman gave me notice of his point of order, and I have looked up the reference in "Erskine May" which he has quoted. We do not yet know what the position will be. It would save the time of the House and of the hon. Gentleman if I were to say that I have this matter very much in mind and I shall give my ruling at the appropriate time.

Mr. Ryman: I am grateful, Mr. Speaker. I shall be able to shorten my remarks on the matter. I have to anticipate the events that will happen on Friday because it may be that the debate will not take place and I will then be in difficulty.

There are three reasons why the matter is urgent. The first is that preparatory salvage work is now taking place at that colliery — the seams are being heightened. Secondly, Mr. MacGregor, the chairman of the National Coal Board, is about to step down from his office. He spoke to the Prime Minister yesterday, so his departure is imminent. He conducted a personal vendetta against that colliery. The third and important reason is that this egg is impossible to unscramble. If the colliery closes, 29 million tonnes of workable high quality coal will be buried under the sea and lost for ever. It is on those three grounds that I submit that the matter is urgent. One has to anticipate the events which will take place the day after tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: I have nothing to add to what I have already said. I shall bear the matter in mind. The hon. Gentleman has made a strong case.

Lambeth and Liverpool (Surcharge of Councillors)

4.39 pm

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the upholding of the surcharge on Lambeth and Liverpool councillors".

Just over an hour ago, the High Court upheld the surcharge on over 70 councillors in Lambeth and Liverpool; in consequence, subject to appeal, they could be disqualified from holding office. This latest episode in the Rates Act vendetta has been a sort of political St. Valentine's day massacre, with the possibility not only of 70 Lambeth and Liverpool councillors but of many others being disqualified. I hope that it is self-evident that the matter is specific and important. It means that an unacceptable price will be paid for dissent, and the loss of political rights is alien to our traditions.

The matter is very important because, depending upon the accidents of time, it is possible that the disqualification will take place in the middle of the campaign for the May elections, so it is not simply a matter of a penalty being imposed on those councillors; it also affects the conduct of municipal elections due to take place in May this year. Not only will those councillors be affected, but it is possible that hundreds of other councillors in about a dozen local authorities throughout the country will be similarly affected if the district auditor takes a similar view to them as he has taken to those in Lambeth and Liverpool.

If this were a matter that affected Ministers or civil servants, an Act of indemnity would be presented immediately to the House. The effect on individual councillors and on the conduct of the elections in May is such that the matter should take precedence over the Orders of the Day. I submit my application for your consideration, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the upholding of the surcharge on Lambeth and Liverpool councillors".

I listened with care to what the hon. Gentleman said, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter that he raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10. I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House, but I am sure that he will find other parliamentary ways of bringing it into our discussions.

News International (Pensions)

4.42 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the actions of News International in the current industrial dispute, which have resulted in pensions and other benefits not being paid to retired members of SOGAT '82".

This is a specific matter, because it refers to several retired members of SOGAT '82 and others entitled to benefits provided by that trade union, including an 80-year-old constituent of mine. He, like 1,500 pensioners, should receive payments from the London central branch of SOGAT '82. As a result of the court action brought by the American owners of News International, the sequestrator blocked their pension payments and the payments of pensions to SOGAT '82 pensioners from other branches of the union. He has also blocked payments of lump sums to 120 members of the branch who retired recently. The matter is important for them and their families. It is also important because it reveals how the Government's industrial relations policies are being exploited in every possible way by ruthless employers who in their pursuit of profits do not flinch from harming innocent pensioners. In the words used by the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) earlier, it is mean-minded and parsimonious.

The matter is urgent not just because the pensioners need the money but because the sequestrator stopped payments of funeral benefit to 60 widows of SOGAT '82 members. It is an urgent matter that merits consideration.

Therefore I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will see your way to allowing the matter to be debated.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the actions of News International in the current industrial dispute, which have resulted in pensions and other benefits not being paid to retired members of SOGAT '82".

I regret that I have to give the hon. Gentleman the same answer as I gave to the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser). I cannot submit his application to the House, but I hope that he will find other ways of bringing the matter before us.

BALLOT FOR NOTICES OF MOTIONS FOR FRIDAY 21 MARCH

Members successful in the ballot were:

Ordered,

That the draft Professions Supplementary to Medicine (Winding up of Remedial Gymnasts Board) Order of Council 1986 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments &c.

That the Legal Advice and Assistance (Financial Conditions) Regulations 1986 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments &c.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Right to Co-operate

4.45 pm

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to give tenants in the public and private sectors the guaranteed right to establish housing co-operatives.

The House may be tempted to wonder why such a Bill is necessary at all, but, as I described in an Adjournment debate on 20 December, council tenants in my city of Liverpool have been the victim of an interminable offensive calculated to destroy local housing co-operatives initiated there.

Vindictive and spiteful retaliatory measures have been taken against the leaders of the Eldonian co-operative in the Vauxhall area of the city and against other co-operatives. The city council was even prepared to turn away £6 million of public money, and the building jobs and new homes that were part and parcel of the Eldonians' plan for new dream homes on the site of the old Tate and Lyle factory, to support their own brand of dogma, became a nightmare as Labour Militants and fellow travellers such as councillor Tony Byrne set out to crush that group of mainly unemployed council tenants.

Sheer guts and tenacity saw the Eldonians through their fight, but other co-operatives without the determination and the inner strength of that group were ruthlessly smashed. Only today those Labour councillors have been disqualified from public office. For many people in Liverpool it is two years too late. The tragedy is that it has taken so long for the Labour leadership to wake up to the menace of the Militant Tendency. If Labour leaders had listened to the moderates in the Vauxhall ward Labour party, to the Liberals and to the housing co-operative movement, two years of tragedy for Liverpool could have been averted.

If we are to ensure that such things do not happen again, we must have a Bill to give tenants in the public sector the right to form housing co-operatives, a right guaranteed at law. It would also represent a realistic hope for ordinary people of becoming home owners, in a way that the Conservatives' right-to-buy legislation cannot, especially for the unemployed or less well off. The right to buy will never bring the most powerless people into a property-owning democracy, but the right to co-operate will. A Bill giving people the right to co-operate would break asunder the feudal vassal or serf-like status that so many tenants endure today.

However, this is a Bill for private tenants, too. For the Government, the right to become a home owner seems always to be reserved for the buyers' market, and for the sitting council tenant who can afford to buy, yet no such right to buy is given to sitting tenants in private accommodation. My Bill would give tenants in the private sector the right to take control over their homes, too. Far too often, the battle lines in the housing debate are drawn between the tenants' and the owners' camp. My Bill is based on a partnership between the two. It represents a genuine third choice for housing.

The Bill aims to give council and private tenants the automatic right to serve notice on their landlords that they wish to form housing co-operatives. The Bill will define clearly what constitutes a co-operative and what types of dwelling are suitable. It will ensure that landlords cannot unreasonably withhold from tenants permission to form co-operatives where two thirds of the occupants wish to do so.

My Bill will do six specific things. First, it will define the types of tenancy to which the right to co-operate will apply. Secondly, it will identify the dwellings that the right to co-operate will embrace. Thirdly, it will set out the circumstances in which the right to co-operate may arise and certain tests that will have to be satisfied. Fourthly, it will set out the circumstances in which the right to co-operate may be refused by a landlord, but will state that consent to the right to co-operate may not be unreasonably withheld; there might be an appeal mechanism to the Secretary of State for the Environment. Fifthly, the Bill will set out an economic incentive or restrictions that would go hand in hand with the right to co-operate. Lastly, it will establish the means by which the right to co-operate may be promoted. That might take the form of enabling legislation, possibly extending or reinforcing the powers of the Housing Corporation with associated funding or it might establish a new mechanism to promote co-operatives. Present funding for co-operatives is inadequate—in fact, it is derisory—and must be re-examined in the context of the Bill.

My Bill recognises the desire of many ordinary people to take control of their own homes from the planners and from the "we know best" politicians who have maintained a vice-like grip on entire communities. The Bill will encourage and protect those who want to form housing co-operatives from recalcitrant local authorities and unco-operative private landlords alike. It is high time the House recognised that the existing monolithic housing structures no longer meet people's needs and that an entirely new approach is needed. All over Britain council tenants are getting a shocking repairs service. Estates are disintegrating, and public money is being poured away as an Elastoplast solution is administered to the ailing patient.

Commenting on the growth of housing co-operatives in Liverpool, the Architects' Journal said that the greatest housing revolution in 60 years had been taking place quietly and unnoticed. The real testimony to the spectacular success of schemes such as Hesketh street housing co-operative in my constituency, which Prince Charles visited last year, and others at Leta street, Claudia street, Prince Alfred gardens and Southern crescent, is that council tenants who moved into those housing co-operatives say that they would never go back to being council tenants. These oases in the middle of so much dereliction, decay and neglect exude pride and confidence.

The story does not end there. Liverpool city council spent over £250,000 last year on a team of glaziers whose entire time was taken up in replacing broken windows in council owned properties. Those windows did not wear out; they were vandalised. In housing co-operatives we do not find broken windows, because people care about the homes they are living in. They have a stake in the community and feel a real sense of responsibility for those areas. Nor would one find the £11 million of rent arrears currently owed on council properties in the city. Nor would one find empty properties, unlike the 6,000 vacant council properties which are boarded up and which are an affront to the thousands on the housing waiting list in Liverpool.

Liverpool tenants get a second-rate service in dreadfully managed estates. That will not improve until the tenants are given responsibility for the ownership and management of their own estates and homes. Far too often the housing department behaves as if it is the master of the people instead of their servant. My Bill sets out to challenge that.

Liberalism is an enabling philosophy. That is why we do not see housing policy as simply a question of bricks and mortar or house building figures. The provision of homes is about so much more. It is the key to many people's aspirations. It is the solid result of years of effort. To have control of their homes rather than being beholden to municipal or private landlords can give people a tremendous boost in self-confidence and can lead to the removal of nagging fears about security. It can be the key to the successful creation of dynamic communities where people care about their neighbours and share in the decision making.

Housing co-operatives based on devolution of power, the creation of self-reliance and common concern and the widest possible extension of ownership are the epitome of all that my party stands for. Conservatives, too, should recognise in housing co-operatives the qualities of self-help which they admire. Socialists should rekindle the sharing spirit of the Rochdale pioneers. Housing co-operatives will enable communities to take power for themselves and to pull themselves up by their bootstraps. That is why I commend my Bill to the whole House and hope that I shall be given leave to bring it in.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. David Alton, Mr. John Cartwright, Mr. Simon Hughes, Mr. A. J. Beith, Mr. David Penhaligon, Mr. Geraint Howells, Mr. Clement Freud and Mr. Archy Kirkwood.

RIGHT TO CO-OPERATE

Mr. David Alton accordingly presented a Bill to give tenants in the public and private sectors the guaranteed right to establish housing co-operatives: And the same was read the First time: and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 2 May and to be printed. [Bill 101.]

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek your guidance because the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) several times mentioned the people in the Vauxhall area of my constituency and also the Eldonians, whom I represent. I support housing co-operatives in principle. The hon. Member is always creeping around other constituencies and breaking the conventions of the House. He has even been to co-operatives in my constituency without giving me advance notice. As the hon. Member is recognised by all hon. Members as a political weasel and a guttersnipe, I seek your advice.

Mr. Alton: Withdraw that.

Mr. Parry: I will not. The hon. Member is a guttersnipe.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I very much doubt whether I can give the hon. Gentleman the guidance he seeks. I hope that at all times hon. Members will observe the courtesies and conventions of the House.

Mr. Alton: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should like to know what protection hon. Members can be given from such unparliamentary comments.

Mr. Parry: The hon. Member is a guttersnipe. He admitted that he had been to my constituency.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Discourteous words may have been used, but I have not heard anything that was out of order.

European Community

4.57 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of the White Paper on Developments in the European Community January to June 1985 (Cmnd. 9627) and of European Community Document No. 8616/85, the Commission's opinion on the Proposal for Amendments to the EEC Treaty.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I have to inform the House that Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mrs. Chalker: The period covered by the report saw the conclusion of the accession negotiations with Spain and Portugal, culminating in the signing of the treaty of accession and the start of the process which led to the signing of the Single European Act, whose provisions the House will soon have an opportunity to debate and approve.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Hon. Members, including some Government Back Benchers, are anxious to know exactly when the House will be given an opportunity to debate the Single European Act. It is important that we have an indication of the time scale.

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman knows that the timing of the debate is a matter for discussion within the usual channels, but it will take place as soon as we can bring it forward. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman as soon as I have an indication of the timing. I hope that it will be within the next three months.

It is on the intergovernmental conference, and the changes to which it will lead, that the House will wish to focus this afternoon. Hon. Members will have seen the special report prepared by the Select Committee on European Legislation. The House will be most grateful to the Chairman, the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), and his Committee for the thoughtful and constructive report. The hon. Gentleman kindly wrote to me to explain that he is chairing a Committee upstairs and that he will join us as soon as he can.

The report of the Select Committee on European Legislation draws some preliminary conclusions about the scrutiny arrangements, which are of great importance to hon. Members. I assure the hon. Member for Newham, South that we shall consider carefully and positively the suggestions made by his Committee. I am glad to tell the House that I am happy, too, to accept the Opposition amendment which will be moved shortly.

The desire for reform which led to the intergovernmental conference set up last June was commonly felt throughout the Community. At Fontainebleau in 1984, we achieved a settlement of the long-standing issue of our contributions to the EC budget. We also set in hand the imposition of budgetary discipline, particularly over the common agricultural policy. After years in which price rises were the norm, we secured two price fixings in a row in which prices fell in real terms.

It was against that background that the Community turned its attention from problems to opportunities: to such pressing questions as how to make Europe competitive in the new technologies; how to create the large market that would give us economies of scale, prosperity and jobs; and how to ensure that decisions were taken more quickly.

As the House will know, we believed that those objectives could be achieved by political agreement. But many other member states argued that it was essential to entrench reforms in amendments to the treaty, both to give them binding effect and as a symbol of the Community's determination to tackle its problems.

In the period covered by the report that we are debating this afternoon, there was intensive discussion of a wide range of proposals which were put forward, including some that would have radically altered the balance of the Community institutions. We tabled ideas of our own, particularly on decision-making procedures, and how the European Parliament might be enabled to contribute more effectively. Our proposals were notable for their severely practical focus, which contrasted sharply with the severely impractical — though no doubt visionary — flavour of some of the other ideas in the field.

Yet as member states focused more and more closely on the implications of the various proposals under discussion, it became clear that there was no widespread support for sweeping changes. There was, however, support for measures which would deal with the Community's most pressing needs.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): When the Minister refers to impractical and visionary proposals, is she suggesting that the Italians—who were reluctant to sign the Luxembourg agreement unless it was approved by the European Parliament — were being impractical and visionary?

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman knows that I meant nothing of the sort. He also knows that at certain stages a number of quite strange ideas appeared. I am glad to say that the view was taken that they would not be right in respect of the writing of the Single European Act.

It was on that basis that the intergovernmental conference, which is dealing with the Community's most pressing needs, was established, and it conducted and completed its work. That is now embodied in the Single European Act which incorporates the changes to the EEC treaty and the new treaty provisions on European co-operation in foreign policy.

The House will have a full opportunity to debate the treaty changes that were agreed at Luxembourg when it considers the forthcoming Bill to incorporate them into the European Communities Act, but it may be helpful if I describe the main features now.

It should be said, by way of preface, that the treaty changes agreed are modest in their legal scope, but they embody a political commitment which is practically significant.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): Why is it called the Single European Act?

Mrs. Chalker: That is a very good question. I do not think that my colleagues have given me any good reason as to why it is called that, but I shall consult and see whether I can come up with the real reason. I think that the hon. Gentleman is having fun at my expense.

The first noteworthy feature of the Single European Act is that it contains a new commitment to create, by 31 December 1992 a genuinely free internal market, which is vital. Britain has long championed the achievement of the freedoms set out in the treaty of Rome: the free movement of goods, persons, services and capital. We now have an important commitment to accelerate progress to that end; and to the extent that barriers have not been overcome by 1992, the Council may decide before the end of that year on the mutual recognition of national measures.

To enable progress to be made as quickly as this, the Single European Act introduces improved decision-making procedures. Qualified majority voting replaces unanimity for most internal market directives establishing common standards and procedures; for consideration of whether there should be policies for sea and air transport and how those policies should operate; for directives on co-ordination of policy on capital movements between member states and third countries; and for measures to remove obstacles to freedom of provision of services by nationals of third countries.

This extension of majority voting should make it harder for a few member states to block the adoption of measures liberalising air and sea transport, or the common standards for industrial products which help British firms export to Europe.

I should assure the House, however, that our special interests are fully safeguarded. Unanimity will still be required for tax measures; for the movement of persons across national frontiers, for example; and for the rights and interests of employees. We will also continue to be able to protect our high standards of animal and plant health. There has been no change whatsoever in the so-called Luxembourg compromise. It remains open to us, where necessary, to invoke that compromise to protect a very important national interest.

Mr. Foulkes: Why have the British Government insisted that unanimity should remain in respect of the rights and interests of employed persons? The hon. Lady will know that the British Government are blocking any agreement on parental leave, which would be of great help to people in this country and which the House of Lords Committee has indicated would cost nothing extra. Why are the Government blocking that? Why have we not moved towards majority agreement on this item?

Mrs. Chalker: When we talk of unanimity, we refer to the rights and interests of employees as a whole. So far as I am aware, parental leave is not at present being considered on that basis. That cannot be so, because we do not have the ratification by each of the 12 member states of the Single European Act. The matter may be resolved in the meantime, but we shall face it as it arises. At present, the unanimity rules will remain for all the matters to which I have referred because the Act will not have been ratified during the coming discussion on that issue. If I am in error, I shall come back to this when I reply to the debate.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Where majority voting takes place, can the veto still be applied?

Mrs. Chalker: That was the point of my last remark before I gave way to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes). Of course, it remains open to us, where necessary, to invoke the compromise. That is exactly what I said.

The second important area covered by the Single European Act is research and technological development. The Community has long been concerned with research and development. The existing programme includes the exciting ESPRIT programme, in which more than 60 British companies are successfully participating, and which is playing a major role in helping to make our companies competitive in information technology. Up to now, the Community's R and D programme has lacked a sense of direction and purpose. It grew up in the 1970s, when energy needs dominated our thinking, and it has failed to adjust to Europe's industrial needs for the 1980s and 1990s. That will now change.

The purposes of Community research and development are clearly defined in the new Act in terms of practical application and the needs of industry. The Community will encourage research and technological development activities by companies, including small firms, as well as by research centres and universities. This will be supported by exploiting the potential of the internal market to the full, opening up public contracts and removing legal and fiscal barriers to co-operation.

The framework programme, which establishes the financial envelope for Community R and D over each five-year period, will in future define much more clearly the content, objectives and priorities of research and development programmes. That overall framework will remain subject to unanimity. The specific programmes to take place within it will subsequently be decided by qualified majority. In the early discussions on the next research and development framework programme we are already starting to see the benefits of the more industry-oriented approach which the Community is now adopting. There is much more emphasis on projects which will strengthen the foundations of European industry, such as RACE—research in advance communications in Europe—and BRITE—research to help modernise traditional industries, for example, through computer-aided design and manufacture. Those are the areas in which the Community needs to catch up in order to be able to compete. Those are the areas in which we shall now have the necessary legal framework in which to set Community activity.

The third major area covered by the new treaty amendments is the environment. Here, too, the Community has a long-standing involvement, as of necessity it must. Pollution knows no boundaries. Effective conservation requires an international effort. The Community has already taken many useful environmental initiatives, such as improving water quality, reducing pollution from motor vehicles, handling dangerous substances in industry and protecting the agricultural environment.

What we have now done is to establish the criteria for those activities. The criteria stipulate that the Community should take action relating to the environment only to the extent that environmental objectives can be better attained at Community level than at the level of individual member states; that the Community should weigh the potential benefits and costs of action before taking it; and that it should weigh the environmental conditions in the various regions of the Community. What is necessary in the Mediterranean may not be necessary in the North sea. We will be able to ensure that, where we wish, decisions continue to be taken by unanimity.

In reaching these decisions, the Heads of Government had to consider carefully the institutional balance within the Community. The European Parliament, directly representing an electorate of 320 million people, has an important role to play in decision taking. As we said in our manifesto for the European elections last year, on a growing number of issues, the Community is regarded as the voice of Europe. Yet the existing institutional arrangements have not enabled the European Parliament to play the positive role that it could and should. What we have therefore sought is a means of maximising the European Parliament's contribution and influence without, however, any change in its formal powers.

That is the effect of the new co-operation procedure which is most usefully and clearly analysed in the Scrutiny Committee's report. The procedure provides that, in certain areas where qualified majority voting applies in the Council, the European Parliament will be able to propose amendments if a majority of its members agree. If the Parliament proposes amendments, the Commission has to decide whether or not to amend its proposal accordingly. But it should be emphasised — in the words of the Scrutiny Committee report—that

"at end of the day the European Parliament still has no power to insist and the last word remains with the Council."

Nor could any intervention by the Parliament lead to a vote which would normally be taken by unanimity in the Council being taken by qualified majority instead. That could not happen.

What we hope and expect, however, is that the potential of the European Parliament for constructive involvement in the development of Community policy can now be more fully realised. Too often in the past the European Parliament has used its negative powers to block proposals and delay decision-making when it has not — perhaps because it has not—been properly consulted, and when full weight has not been given to its opinions.

Sir Russell Johnston: I appreciate that the Minister has given way generously. It is not fair for her to attack the European Parliament on the ground of delaying decision-making when delaying decision-making lies firmly at the door of the Council.

Mrs. Chalker: I am sorry if the hon. Gentleman thought that I was making an unjustified attack on the European Parliament. There are times when there are delays in decision-making, as the hon. Gentleman knows. The point is that the whole of the Community has been bedevilled in much of the progress that it has sought to make by all sorts of delays. I was referring to a way of consultation through which we may minimise future delays.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Chalker: I will give way for the last time.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: The European Parliament frequently introduces reports on minor subjects which may be of interest to a limited number of people but which clog up the works. If the minor reports were not introduced, the major crucial reports could go through faster and delay would be obviated.

Mrs. Chalker: I have a great deal of sympathy with what my hon. Friend says. She is referring to the whole of the management of Community business, not just in the European Parliament but in the Community institutions. I hope that it will be possible to improve the management so that the major issues can get the attention that they rightly deserve.

In discussing the Single European Act, in the sphere of foreign policy, an increasingly potent symbol of unity in European policy was vividly demonstrated last week in the Philippines. It was a major goal of the Government throughout the negotiations to secure treaty provision for such co-operation, and it was finally agreed in very much the form that we originally proposed before Milan. The new provisions consolidate for the first time in legal form the existing commitments of European political co-operation to consult and co-operate, although they remain juridically separate from the treaties establishing the Communities. The Twelve undertake to consult before adopting a position on foreign policy issues of general interest and to avoid any action particularly in international fora, such as the United Nations, which could undermine their cohesiveness and ability to act as a force internationally. The treaty also strengthens the commitment to consultation on certain aspects of security questions.

The treaty enshrines the general feeling that the time has come after 15 years to give formal recognition to political co-operation as an important component of the policies of the Community of Twelve. We do not expect dramatic overnight improvements in cohesion on foreign policy issues. But there is now a more serious commitment to move foward together, while the creation of a small secretariat will provide permanent small machinery to enable the Twelve to react to events with greater facility than hitherto. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the House on 5 December, we expect that there will continue to be differences between us, but the Twelve will in future try to work together as far as possible to ensure that their voice is more generally heard and better respected. That has already begun to happen.

I have discussed how, in the period covered by the report, we prepared the way for the changes which are being introduced into the treaty. I have discussed the main features of the Single European Act by which they are to be accomplished. We warmly welcome the outcome of the Danish referendum last week, and the signing of the Single European Act by Denmark, Italy and Greece. The way is now clear for national ratification procedures, and, as the House knows, we plan to introduce a Bill as soon as practicable to carry that through. From now on our focus must be on the implications of the Act.

Mr. Marlow: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Chalker: I have already given way a considerable number of times, and I understand that many hon. Members wish to speak, so I must finish my remarks.

The excellent Scrutiny Committee report discusses the particular implications for scrutiny by the House. That is one important aspect at which we wish to look carefully.

However, there are also implications for the development of the Community, and for Britain within the Community. During the second half of this year, Britain will assume the presidency of the EC. It is my earnest hope that, before the end of the year, the Single European Act will take effect. The Community will then have a good opportunity to build for the future, and Britain, in the presidency, will have a special responsibility to direct that process.

I want a Community that is relevant and is seen to be relevant by its people, especially the British people. The completion of the Common Market is the most important single step that we can take to achieve that aim. The treaty changes and other new procedures agreed in Europe will help us in taking that step. It is an important step for the future not only for Britain but for peace in the Western world. I commend the motion to the House.

5.20 pm

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): I beg to move, at the end of the Question to add,

'and, noting the First Special Report of the Select Committee on European Legislation (Session 1985-86), calls on the Government to undertake to co-operate in improved procedures so that the House can effectively scrutinise proposals under the Treaties as they would be amended by the Single European Act.'.

The Minister properly avoided the vast bulk of the White Paper that we are supposed to be debating and concentrated more on the future than on the past. Her peroration included memorable words about the importance of the EC being relevant to the people, and then invoked the internal market as the method by which the people should judge the effectiveness of the EC. If the people outside were consulted, they would consider the internal market, or the creation of Lord Cockfield's dream world, a most remarkable method of judging a Community of 12 nations in such a deep recession.

Such debates are, by definition, retrospective, but they are also an opportunity carefully to consider developments in the European Community and to look forward to what the Community could or should do for the people of Europe and for the people of Britain. All too often, our debates on the EC are dominated by its chronic budget problems. The Minister of State, Treasury, is here as an observer of the debate. No doubt he is relieved that the massed ranks of the Tory anti-marketeers are, surprisingly, absent today, leaving the Floor free — [Interruption.] The massed ranks are absent; only the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) is here to speak on their behalf. The Minister of State, Treasury, must wish that he could stand at the Dispatch Box today instead of on a later occasion, when his hon. Friends will be ready, knives in hand, to scalp him.

Our debates on the EEC budget usually degenerate into unintelligible, fairly negative and introspective seminars that do not enlighten the outside world about the potential of a 12-nation Community to contribute to solving Britain's and the European Community's problems.

As the Minister said, we are fortunate to have the first special report of the Select Committee on European Legislation. I am sorry that bad scheduling has meant that the Chairman and members of the Committee cannot be here for the beginning of the debate. The report includes an excellent analysis of the practical problems that we shall face because of the process of so-called reform, which started at the beginning of last year and therefore during the period that we are considering. The process has culminated in what is called the Single European Act. I look forward with interest to the Minister's explanation of that peculiar translation of a French phrase.

Mrs. Chalker: It seemed to be such an obvious phrase that I did not question how the Act came to have that name. However, I have thought about it and obtained a little help from my friends, and I can say that the changes to the European treaty and the new treaty on co-operation on foreign policy are brought together in a single Act. It is European and it is an Act. Indeed, it is a surprisingly logical name to come from the EC stable.

Mr. Robertson: But the hon. Lady's friends had to explain it to her. We accept, with gratitude, that information, which makes the Single European Act seem all the brighter. No doubt the practical problems that will be thrown at us will be greater than the interpretation of the name.

Our scrutiny of European legislation should worry us greatly. In 1984, the Select Committee published a report which damned the Government's attitude to scrutiny in general and cited examples of major changes that went through the Council of Ministers before debate or discussion took place in the House. It gave the examples of the ESPRIT programme and the new arrangements for the regional development fund. Those examples and the report came long before the increase in majority voting, which has made the problem much more severe and which will increase when the Act comes into force.

The latest report of the Select Committee shows how much worse the position will be if the new Luxembourg system comes into effect. Of course, that depends upon the House and 11 other Parliaments ratifying it. It will pose a genuine dilemma to the House of Commons. We have tabled this amendment because of the complex problems of the scrutiny of European legislation and the likely increase in workload. We are grateful that the Government have taken on board our point and have accepted the amendment. I am probably the only Opposition Front-Bench spokesman who has managed to get not just one but two amendments accepted by the Government. No doubt the "Guinness Book of Parliamentary Records" will note that.

Sir Anthony Kershaw (Stroud): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is not the Government who accept amendments, but Mr. Speaker or the Chairman of Ways and Means.

Mr. Robertson: I must correct the hon. Gentleman. Mr. Speaker simply selects an amendment. It is for the Government — the parent of the original "take note" motion—to accept the Opposition's amendment. I hate to dance round on a pedantic pinhead, but, uncharacteristically, the hon. Gentleman is wrong in this case.

We must consider how best we can effectively monitor, supervise and scrutinise the mass of important detailed legislation affecting our people which is being enacted by the Community and as a consequence of section 2 of the European Communities Act 1972. It is not enough for the House to have debates such as this — considering a period that started 12 months ago—and pretend that we get to the heart of keeping tabs on developments in the EC.

Mr. Marlow: The hon. Gentleman knows that the House of Lords Select Committee is allowed to comment, and quite properly comments, on the merits of the proposals put before us, but the House of Commons Scrutiny Committee is allowed only to decide whether a matter should be put for debate either in Committee or before the House. Would the hon. Gentleman like to see the Scrutiny Committee have the powers to comment on the merits of a particular proposal with regard to the United Kingdom interest?

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman makes a valuable point. I have not put forward any conclusions, but my hon.

Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) will deal with a number of positive suggestions that are available to us about the way in which we deal with such scrutiny. The House continually turns for advice to the House of Lords Select Committee and it is an example at which we should be looking carefully, especially given the fact that the bulk of scrutiny will increase substantially should Parliament choose to ratify the Single European Act.

The debate concerns a six-month period a year ago. We are now only a few months away from this country's tenure of the Presidency of the Community, and the debate would have been an opportunity for the Minister to set out an agenda for that period. She could have inspired us with the vision of reform and revitalisation that will motivate the Government when they hold the steering wheel of Europe in July this year. We might have expected her to tell us how they will take on the challenge of fighting for jobs in a recession-hit Community, with over 14 million of its citizens out of work.

The Minister might also have enlightened us as to how the Government see Europe grasping the opportunities for technological and industrial co-operation across the Community. We might even have expected to hear how they intended to deal with the recurring problems of the European budget, and what they intend to do with the common agricultural policy, whose faults threaten not just budget discipline—that has gone out of the window—but the whole of the Community. We might have expected to hear all that, but we waited in vain, and we can reasonably conclude that, not surprisingly, the Government have as little idea of what to do in the European Presidency as they have of what to do with the economy of Britain. The economy of Europe and our country are at the heart of politics today.

Mrs. Chalker: It is not true.

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Lady may say that, and she may tell us that the litany of clichés that she brought out was a substitute for the agenda for the Presidency. The idea that reform of the internal market will inspire confidence among the 4 million unemployed in this country, never mind the 10 million others out of work across the Community, leaves me in mystification, and will give no hope to the people of Europe.

The European Commission, in its annual economic report and programme for 1986, has elevated the strengths and potential of a co-operative strategy for growth. In its opinion, there is now a unique opportunity to boost wealth and reduce unemployment by 30 to 40 per cent. over five years. Even without Spain and Portugal, there are 14 million unemployed in the European Community, and 45 per cent. of them are young people, a growing proportion of whom are now chronic long-term unemployed.

The President of the Commission, Mr. Jacques Delors, said at the beginning of 1985, when he presented the Commission's first programme:

> "Faced with the uncertainties and worries of the future, what people are looking for above all else is not freedom of movement (of peoples and goods) . . . Pulling down the frontiers will not convince them of our resolve to do away with massive unemployment. Economic convergence will be meaningless to people if we have not reversed the tide of unemployment within the next 2 years."

We might reasonably have expected the British Government, who will take over the Presidency, at least to echo some of those heavily weighted sentiments.

Will the Government, during the Presidency, initiate talks to achieve a co-operative growth strategy to reduce unemployment by 1 million in the United Kingdom alone, as all the economic experts and the European Commission believe possible?

The Commission stressed in its 1986 programme that one of its strategic objectives will be

> "the adoption of a framework programme for research and technological development . . . clear in form and content and attractive to firm and research centres encouraging them to co-operate."

The Minister touched on this matter in her speech, but the Government must give an answer both in the House and beyond it, because the Presidency has a wider responsibility. Are the Government willing to increase the funds for ESPRIT and meet the challenges that it faces, and will they commit themselves to future financing of EUREKA projects? We have had many fine words about technological co-operation, but will they be accompanied by the standard public parsimony that the Government inflict on every programme that could make a contribution?

How can a clear European framework conducive to co-operation develop, when the Government have agreed to participate in the strategic defence initiative research programme in the United States, and when they have not laid down any guidelines regarding intellectual property rights and the ability of British scientists to use their work in Europe? How can Europe hope to establish some kind of technological superiority if it allows the technology to flow to the United States?

What is most disturbing of all—the Minister's speech highlighted this only too well—is that the Government have now adopted, as the flavour of the month, the crusading zeal of Lord Cockfield in his drive to create a true common market by improving the internal market. The internal market—in this Eurospeak which reduces the meaning of everything that we say in these debates—is a more clear-cut free trade area, which will involve wide and sweeping changes. This will have fundamental and dramatic implications for Britain, and there is no sign that the Government have grasped any of the issues thrown up by what they are saying.

For example, do the Government know what the effect of these changes will be on the structure of British industry, on employment, on our balance of trade in manufacturing policy or our invisible earnings through the free exchange of services about which we so often hear? From the answer that the Minister for Trade gave my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley, it would seem that they do not have the slightest clue as to the implications.

Either the Government have carried out detailed studies of the effects, in which case they have an obligation to present them to Parliament in the form of a White Paper so that we can all judge their merits, or we can conclude that they have no real idea of the effects of the changes, and are simply gambling with Britain's future for the sake of a free market ideology. A free market ideology is just as valid in the internal market of the United Kingdom as it is in the internal market of the European Community. As the Minister for Trade, who gave such a characteristically vague, almost useless and optimistic reply to my hon. Friend, is one of the high priests of the free market, one can only conclude that the Government do not have the slightest clue about the implications of Lord Cockfield's dream on the structure of industry.

The evidence is clear. The Government's view of the internal market differs sharply from that of other European Community countries and from the view of the Commisson. The Government believe that the internal market will require the harmonisation of value added tax, which has been repeatedly stressed by both the President of the Commission, Jacques Delors, and by Lord Cockfield, but nobody except the Conservative party believes that on its own a free trade area will do anything for Europe and its problems. The Commission's programme for 1986 makes it clear that "Completion of the internal market must not be allowed to compromise the Community's social priorities."

However, the British Government have expressed no view about that.

When he presented the Commission's programme in January, Jacques Delors said:

"The creation of a vast economic area based on the market and business co-operation is inconceivable, I would say unattainable, without some harmonisation of social legislation."

That criterion, which was quite right and proper, was laid down by the President of the Commission. There is no possibility of creating an internal market if the social obligations that accompany it are not recognised. However, this Government have not only stopped the people of Britain and the rest of the European Community from enjoying the benefits of directives on employee consultation and information, parental leave and worker participation by vetoing them every time they have been raised, but Lord Young of Graffham has presented a new programme of deregulation under which many of the benefits that are enjoyed in this country and in the European Community — for example, the benefit of equal opportunities—would be withdrawn.

In the letter last month of the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley — in his intervention the hon. Member for Northampton, North was getting, in his probing style, to the heart of the matter, although from a different direction from mine—she said that, despite the treaty changes which allow for majority voting in a number of other areas,

"Directives affecting the rights and interests of employed persons will remain subject to unanimity."

What is the point of majority voting if British industrial employees are still to be denied the best that the European social structures have been able to offer to European employees for some time?

The prime example is the draft directive on parental leave, which the Government are opposing on the simple ground that it would impose costs on industry. The report of the Select Committee of the House of Lords has already been mentioned. It favoured the directive and declared that it could find no reason to believe that industry would suffer from the introduction of that directive.

The Government talk about a "people's Europe". They go along with the idea of a common stamp, a common flag, a common passport and a European anthem. If, however, the European Community is to be credible, as the Minister of State has said that it should be, and is to benefit the people of the Community, surely it must be allowed to be used in these areas where it can be of use.

In recent months we have heard much about multinational companies that have the freedom to play off against each other the workers in their various subsidiaries, but many of these abuses can be curbed only by measures that can be applied on a European basis, such as those that are proposed in the directive on worker information. However, they have all been vetoed by this Government.

Mr. Marlow: If the hon. Gentleman wants more of these policies to be decided at the European level, does he consider that more powers should be given to the European Community? If so, will he say which powers he would give the Community?

Mr. Robertson: My point is that there are aspects of the European Community which would benefit the people of this country but that this Government, who pretend to be enthusiastic about Europe, choose to deny to the British people the opportunity to raise the level of benefits and increase the social infrastructure. They concentrate instead upon mealy-mouthed platitudes and upon reducing the standards that apply to British industrial workers.

The internal market will lead to a greater concentration of wealth and production. Even its advocates admit that any benefits will have to come through economies of large-scale production, in which case there is an even greater need for a European Community regional policy which is effective and which has sufficient resources to fulfil the demands that are caused by inequality in the European Community, especially on account of the greater disparities that accession have created. This will require a fundamental reform of the European Community's budget and, as a prerequisite, reform of the common agricultural policy. That is of major importance, in view of Britain's future Presidency of the European Community. The Minister of State chose not to deal with that point in her speech. My hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley will deal with it at some length and in devastating detail if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, at the end of the debate. Its importance should not be under-estimated.

Almost inevitably, our European Community debates tend to be over-critical—sometimes justifiably critical—and almost always pessimistic. The problems facing the Community always seem, to our eyes, never to exploit the opportunities that a huge community of nations provides for us. That is unfortunate. The House and the Community have a duty to offer the population of Europe and the British people more than just an eternal wrangle over incomprehensible details, or an endless financial crisis, or an agricultural policy which goes from the absurd to the obscene. Politicians, like our Government, who continually dodge all the real challenges and prefer playing with the sideshows of European politics are simply squandering the future of our continent.

Sir Anthony Kershaw (Stroud): A measure of the way in which European debates have almost become a part of our domestic scene can be gathered from the attendance this afternoon in the House of Commons. They rate slightly below Scottish housing debates.

The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) made a very good and typical Opposition Front Bench speech. He railed against the Government. He criticised every kind of point and, luckily for him, he avoided making any positive statement. He complained that in these debates we spend our time wrangling over details. Every debate about Europe cannot turn into a Second Reading debate on whether or not Britain ought to be in the European Community. Of course we are wrangling over details, in a sense, but we are addressing the points that are of importance to our electors and to this country.

The hon. Member for Hamilton slightly puzzled me when he said that a free trade area in Europe would be useless. I thought that that was the policy of the Labour party.

Mr. George Robertson: I did not say that.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: The hon. Gentleman went on to amend that statement by saying that there must be more use of the European dimension. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) intervened on that point. However, the hon. Gentleman should be careful. Although his party is in favour of free trade in Europe, it is against the extension of the European dimension.

Mr. George Robertson: I do not want to take up the time of the House, but I must correct the hon. Gentleman. I did not say any of those things. I criticised the Government's lack of precision in measuring the effect that the changes in the internal market will have upon the British economy. A better internal market would create a more common market for Britain, but we must consider its effects upon industry and upon employment in Britain before we embark upon it.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: I regret that I did not understand that to be what the hon. Gentleman said. I am grateful to him for having given us another explanation.

We must choose only a few of the tasks in the White Paper with which the presidency will give us an opportunity to deal. The first that I want to mention is European political co-operation. Not since Roman times has Europe spoken with one voice, and more is the pity. If it were able to do so, its influence——

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): Charlemagne, Napoleon, Hitler.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: It depends on who is in charge. If the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) or I were in charge, that would be all right.

The influence that Europe could exert would surely be beneficent in the world, because Europe, considered as a whole, is a satisfied power. We have no claims on other continents or countries; none of the sorts of claims which so disturbed the world before 1939 and brought us nearly to ruin. Therefore, our political experience and weight applied together would be a beneficent influence for the peace of the world.

In trade, there can be no doubt whatever that unless Europe stands together we cannot possibly have any influence in the Western industrial and economic scene. As individual countries we are incapable of facing the might of Japan and the United States, so it is necessary for us to act together. Some problems obviously cannot be settled without Europe working together. The world debt problem is one. The problem of aid to developing countries can surely not even approach a solution, let alone have one, except by European co-operation.

In the White Paper mention is made of the European attitude towards South Africa. The weight which a combined opinion in Europe can bring to bear upon the South African Government could be a great deal more useful than the specific sanctions that are urged by some. The influence that Europe has already exerted has caused the South African Government to shift their ground to some extent, and the attitude which the Foreign Ministers of the Twelve took at Lusaka was considerably more helpful to the South African scene than that which was taken at the Commonwealth conference in Bermuda.

We shall have to wait to see whether the recent speech of President Botha is implemented. On the face of it, he said that a great deal would change, but those who are close to him say that his words should not be so interpreted. It is a fact, and I am glad that it appears in the White Paper, that the Ministers were agreed that, unless desegregation is the objective at which the South African Government are ultimately aiming, no cosmetics short of that will cure the situation. I hope that the Foreign Ministers and the Prime Ministers of Europe will be able to continue to make that view clearly known to the South Africans.

Another matter which was discussed last year and which is in the White Paper is terrorism, on which the Government have taken a lead in putting the issue before the Ministers. Clearly that is another sphere which cannot be tackled usefully without general co-operation. I ask the Government to consider one thing, which I am sure they have done, but nevertheless I hope that they will consider it again if they have rejected it or been unable to persuade our allies—that to break off diplomatic relations is a weapon to use against states which harbour or encourage terrorists. If diplomatic relations are broken the diplomatic bag does not travel to and fro, and we all know that grave infractions of the law about diplomatic bags have occurred. It would be useful if we could make that easy transit of weapons, and apparently of people sometimes, more difficult. The more difficult terrorists find it to get weapons, and the more difficult they find it to move, the more difficult they will find their terrible tasks.

The White Paper also mentions the problem of overseas aid, and I want to single out one particular case where European co-operation could effect useful changes. Ethiopia is the largest recipient of European aid, mostly food aid. The amount of food aid that is promised, and doubtless will be delivered, at least to the ports of Ethiopia during the coming season will be enough to feed the people who need it to the extent that is considered essential. Unfortunately, whether it will reach them is another question. However, no doubt a lot of it will, and so the arrangements that have so far been made to feed the starving Ethiopians are satisfactory.

What goes on inside Ethiopia is not satisfactory at all. The resettlement programme is a scandal. No doubt it is necessary, because it is impossible, especially during the late season before the rains start, for people to live in the arid regions from which they are being moved, but it is the way in which that is being done that is so reprehensible. It is said that the camps to which the people are moved have more casualties than the camps or areas from which they came. That is an unsatisfactory state of affairs which could be remedied by example and by our assistance.

The leadership of the Ethiopian Government is at fault. Mr. Mengistu seems to be a most unsatisfactory person. He has done his best to reduce his country to misery, and he does not stop intervening in the affairs of those round him. He sustains a civil war in the Sudan. He was active in Aden when that civil war broke out, and he keeps his own civil war on the boil all the time. He has reduced his country to misery and seems to want to do it to his neighbours as well. We should get together with our allies. I know that Italy has a soft spot for, or a guilty conscience about, Ethiopia — I do not know which — but nevertheless something should be done to try to alter that Government's policies, and Europe working together could do so.

Mr. Colin Moynihan (Lewisham, East): Does my hon. Friend agree that the steps that have been taken by the international community in Ethiopia to encourage major reforms in the handling of the resettlement programme and the agreement by the Ethiopian Government to put an embargo on further resettlement as from 1 January this year are important moves and that we should monitor closely the success or otherwise of those proposals in assessing the effectiveness of the programme?

Sir Anthony Kershaw: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that, because he has just come back from Ethiopia, having seen those camps. I am sure that what he says is wise and I hope that it is followed by the countries concerned and by ourselves.

Inside the EEC there is a long list of what at first sight may be thought comparative trivialities, although certainly the common agricultural policy cannot be classed as a triviality. I hope that it will be possible during our presidency to edge that policy along in the right direction. There are, however, one or two bad signs. For example, I notice that we are increasing the price of beet, which takes the place of cane sugar. Europe does not have to grow beet; it is unnecessary. I have a sneaking suspicion that most of the beet in northern Europe is grown only for the partridge shooting. If that were stopped, we would be able to take a great deal more cane sugar from countries which can export nothing else.

I notice also in the introduction to the White Paper that Portugal is being given an exemption to import 75,000 tonnes of cane sugar, but for only five years. What will happen after that? Will the Portuguese be condemned to buy French sugar or German sugar? It is absurd to increase the price of beet, which we do not want, at the expense of people who have nothing else to sell and are in dire straits.

I know that my hon. Friend the Minister of State, as a former Minister of State, Department of Transport, is very much aware of the ridiculous restrictions imposed at frontiers in the European Community. I am told—I may be a little out of date, but I am sure that my hon. Friend will correct me if I am—that it does not take a long time for a lorry to cross the German frontier. It takes about an hour of formality, but the driver must pay 45 deutschmarks—no one knows why.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): The Germans want it.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: Yes, but to what end?

The average lorry crossing the French frontier takes one and a half hours to go through the formalities and the driver has to pay a contribution towards the new computer which the French Customs has bought. I should have thought that the French could afford their own computer. I do not understand why each lorry should pay. Occasionally it becomes a tremendous business, with a French Customs officer deciding that goods inside a sealed container are liable to VAT. How does one open a sealed container without destroying it? This causes delays.

The other day one of my constituents took two large lorries to France. A trivial part of the form filling had not been done correctly—a signature or some such detail was omitted—and the driver was allowed, by mistake, to go through the checkpoint at Le Havre. He was pursued by the gendarmerie, arrested and brought back to Le Havre police station. The trucks remained at the side of the road and, in the end, £150,000 worth of machinery was dumped in a wood and he returned to Gloucestershire. That is absurd and should not be allowed.

Getting into Italy is virtually impossible if one is a truck driver. If, by chance, the driver does get in, he has to pay a thumping tax, which is levied, believe it or not, by the local province to pay for the paperwork.

We all know about sheepmeat. We are not entirely without fault in these matters. Of course, we have to certify that French milk coming into Britain is fit to drink. Unfortunately, we take such a long time making up our minds about sending someone to see what is happening that by the time he gets there the milk is indeed not fit to drink. We should, of course, look at our own actions.

Paragraph 6.6 of the White Paper seems to show that there are now or will be opportunities for British coastal shipping to enter continental ports hitherto banned. I am glad to note from paragraph 5.19 that the European Court is considering insurance law, especially in Germany. We expect the decision to be made by the summer. This is a blatant example of discrimination. It is a bit of a cheek for the Germans to buy our insurance companies, yet we cannot buy theirs.

Paragraph 5 is full of points which I hope will be cleared from the agenda during our presidency. Taken one by one they may not look important, but, taken together, they will make Europe a much more economic area. This will enable us to tackle the unemployment problem, to which the hon. Member for Hamilton referred, and the many other difficulties in Europe.

6.3 pm

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): In this rather desultory and at times, it appeared, desolate debate, there were signs early on that discussion might centre on the results of the Luxembourg conference and that peculiarly named—it is still peculiar after the Minister's attempted explanation—Single European Act.

We have been assured by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in its explanation memorandum on the second of the documents before the House:

> "In the United Kingdom any such amendments"— that is, such amendments as the proposed amendments to the treaty by means of the Single European Act——

> "would be submitted to the house for approval."

It is important at this stage that the Government should make it clear what sort of legislative approval this will be. The Minister used different and contradictory adjectives in different parts of her speech. She referred to it first as a "formal opportunity" and then referred to it as a "full opportunity". The difference between the two is crucial.

In 1972 the House made a comprehensive renunciation of its powers—legislative and financial—and of British judicial authority and of the control of the House over policy. It did it on the then basis of the treaty to which we were acceding, but did it only after a most exhaustive examination of a Bill occupying some six months of a parliamentary Session. That Bill itself was limited because it presupposed the terms of the treaty and did not propound them to the House for examination. Nevertheless, the nature of the Bill was such — because of the comprehensive renunciation which it embodied — that during those debates the House was able to examine—or would have been able to examine but for the guillotine which the Liberal party enabled to be imposed — the major features and consequences of the treaty to which we were acceding.

That treaty is being profoundly altered by the proposed new treaty. Many of the aspects of that treaty which were taken for granted as the basis on which the House passed the legislation of 1972 are altered by the proposed Single European Act. It would be wrong if the House of Commons were to give its approval to the new treaty—that is what in effect it is—with a less comprehensive parliamentary procedure than that which was available to it in 1972.

I believe we should insist that the Government make clear in advance what kind of legislation they envisage, whether they are sincere in claiming that it is legislation that will give the House a "full opportunity" of addressing itself to the respects in which the treaty to which we acceded in 1972 is being altered by the Single European Act in matters which affect the House and Britain. I hope that, if we obtain nothing else either in, or as a result of, this debate, we shall bring home to the Government the necessity of being candid well in advance with the House about the nature of the legislative progress to which they will look before the new treaty can be ratified.

Every alteration proposed in the new treaty is an alteration which diminishes the powers of the House. The powers of the House were drastically diminished by the original treaty — that was why we had to have the renunciation embodied in the 1972 Act — but if we examine the changes which would be introduced by the Luxembourg conference, we shall find that in almost every case we confront a further erosion of the powers of the House, which means a further erosion of the opportunity for the British people to influence the policy and the laws under which they live.

Sir Russell Johnston: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that if powers are eroded one's judgment of the consequences must rest on what the effect is? Does he agree that there is an argument for saying that as a consequence of our membership of the Community we have access to greater powers than if we were not in it?

Mr. Powell: That is the old trick of substituting one meaning of the word "we" for another meaning in successive sentences. I do not dispute that there are those, including the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) — the hon. Gentleman has made no secret of this—who believe that we would take better decisions and be better off in this country if we in the House had less control and discretion over legislation and Government policies. That is a point of view which can be argued. It is not a point of view that I share, which is why I would like to draw the attention of the House to two specific areas in which the proposed treaty changes will limit in effect the legislative power and authority of the House.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way on a second occasion.

The right hon. Gentleman always uses the phrase "the powers of this House." Would it not be more accurate and more helpful to the nation to describe them as the powers of the Executive within the House? Is this not, in all international comparisons, a parliamentary system in which Parliament is at its weakest in many respects, in comparison with the overriding powers of the Executive, which, in our system, is based on a simple majority system on a minority vote?

Mr. Powell: I am old-fashioned enough to think that one of the functions of this House is to criticise the manner in which the Executive exercises its powers and, by criticising, effectively to limit and control those powers. If the House does not do that, it is not exercising one at any rate of the functions for which it exists.

Another function of the House, which the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) may have had in mind, is to entrust the Executive with powers: part of the activity of hon. Members consists in defining the powers which we will concede for use by the Executive. Indeed, in the greatest periods of the power of this House—when it had real power—it was used by the Executive as an arm for creating law which the Executive would be able to use.

In both the respects to which I want to draw the attention of the House, the treaty which is by implication before us will limit the influence, the authority and the opportunities of the House.

The first is the legislative respect. Even with the assistance of the Select Committee on European Legislation chaired by the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), whose presence we are glad to welcome at a late stage—not as a result of his fault, but because of an unhappy rearrangement of business—it is not easy to be certain as to the consequences of the change in the legislative process which the new treaty will embody. If I have understood it correctly—and there are those who will correct me if I have not—I believe that when the European Parliament—as we are to authorise it in future to be called — proposes amendments and those amendments are adopted by the Commission in a revised proposal submitted to the Council of Ministers, the proposal so submitted ceases to be a proposal requiring unanimity and becomes a proposal that can be dealt with by qualified majority.

Mr. Dykes indicated assent.

Mr. Powell: I am obliged to have the assurances of the hon. Member for Harrow, East, a careful student of these matters. I seem at any rate to have got it right so far.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Powell: I would like to continue without assistance from Northampton at this stage.

If that is so, the opportunity of this House through the Government as represented in the Council to influence and affect legislation is automatically diminished. That must be so as a consequence of the substitution of a qualified majority for unanimity as a result of the adoption by the Commission of amendments initiated by the European Parliament.

That is one of the consequences which were portended when we decided—mistakenly in my view and in the view of a considerable proportion of the House at the time —to agree to a directly elected European Assembly. One could not in the end deny to that Assembly control over both finance and legislation. Of course a rearguard action is being fought, and the so-called co-operation mechanism embodied in the Luxembourg agreement is part of that rearguard action. However, the rearguard action has been lost to the extent that the European Parliament has gained an effective input into Community legislation which automatically reduces the extent to which the House through its scrutiny and other procedures can influence Community legislation.

[Mr. Powell]

Mr. Marlow: The right hon. Gentleman will agree with me that he heard the Minister of State say that even in circumstances where unanimity is no longer required Her Majesty's Government will still have a veto in the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Powell: It is true that the Luxembourg compromise is, if I understand it correctly, comprehensive in its application. Nevertheless—and this is relevant to the amendment which has been proposed and which the Government have said they will accept—the powers of scrutiny, of influence and of intervention by this House are necessarily diminished by the procedure which will be followed wherever the Commission accepts amendments put forward by the Parliament. A kind of co-operation is established between the Parliament and the Commission which to that extent aborts the input from this House. Therefore, in legislation, as in other matters, the new treaty will curtail the control of the House.

Mr. Dykes: Is the right hon. Gentleman not really indulging in monumental fantasies in his continuing reiteration of absurd theoretical arguments that have no relevance or reality to modern-day constitutional parliamentary practice? The right hon. Gentleman objects to the real majority, which has to come from a qualified majority system which is developing in the Community, but he accepts a minority — majority system which appears to obtain here. What does the right hon. Gentleman mean when he refers to the House making policy and inputs into the Government? The Executive decides policy, whichever Government are elected. The Executive then bestows that on the House and the Whipping system ensures that it gets through.

Mr. Powell: That is an interesting insight into the mind of one of the most vigorous supporters of the European Economic Community. The hon. Gentleman thinks that the Executive "bestows" on the House the fruits of the exercise of its authority. I believe that the processes of debate, backed by the processes of voting in the House, do influence the information and behaviour of Governments. We do not have to exercise our memories very severely in March 1986 to recall recent examples where the House has, by its reaction and criticism of Government behaviour, brought about alterations in the way in which the Executive behaves. No doubt the hon. Member for Harrow, East regrets that — the hon. Gentleman, after all, wants our Executive to be absorbed into a larger Executive which would be beyond even what he calls the nominal control of this House. However, I will not weary the House further by demonstrating, as I am afraid he enables me progressively to do, how much I dislike and reject his view of the House of Commons and its function.

Another area in which authority—I shall continue to use that notion in the face of the hon. Member for Harrow, East—is effectively withdrawn from this House is that termed political co-operation. One can easily be mistaken about this because if one looks at the terminology it appears to be concerned with a desire for unanimity through consultation. For example, one of the subsections of a proposed clause says:

> "In order to ensure the swift adoption of common positions and the implementation of joint action, the High Contracting Parties shall, as far as possible, refrain from impeding the formation of a consensus and the joint action which this could produce."

Of course, under that terminology one is still allowed to dissent; but by an international instrument we shall have bound ourselves as a nation to make every possible endeavour to arrive at common positions and to arrive at them by "swift adoption."

"Common positions" and "swift adoption" are significant terms. In the past 10 years we have had much experience of the operation of political co-operation. It means that the Foreign Secretary has joined his colleagues from the other member states of the European Community and produced a European policy which is promulgated as such and as subsuming the assent of all the member states. Precisely through this process of political co-operation, the Foreign Secretary's and the Government's relationship with the House is profoundly altered in reality. The Foreign Secretary comes to the House after the event and says, "As in duty bound to attempt, I have concurred with my colleagues in the rest of the Community to achieve a European consensus and here is the European policy that we have produced." It is far more difficult for Members of this House to criticise a foreign policy decision when it can be presented as part of a collective European decision.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: A short time ago the Danish Parliament did exactly that which the right hon. Gentleman says is impossible here.

Mr. Powell: The Danes have a different arrangement, which I do not necessarily commend, in relation to European legislation and policy. In any case, they recently found themselves overruled by a popular vote into compliance with the very procedures that I am criticising.

The mere fact that the process is consultative and voluntary rather than binding in form does not deprive it of the power to diminish the input of this Assembly and of public opinion in this country into the formation of our foreign policy. The foreign policy of the United Kingdom, adopted by the United Kingdom as such, has to rest, and be seen to rest, upon the consent of the House of Commons —if necessary emerging out of debate. When it is part of a European foreign policy under the political co-operation arrangements to which we are binding ourselves by treaty, it is possible for a Government effectively to escape from all those pressures and from the necessity to stand upon the common will of this House as representing the electorate of this country.

I therefore stress the necessity not to be distracted by the apparently voluntary and optional form of the wording. To bind oneself by international agreement to arrive if possible at a consensus with 11 or 12 other states is a major derogation from the responsibility of the Executive to this House. In this context, it is right to draw attention to a fact to which the Select Committee referred in the context of the effect of this enlargement of the community on the relative position of the United Kingdom within the Community. On page 10 of its first special report the Select Committee made three points:

"(i) the position of the Big Four (France, Germany, Italy and the United Kingdom) has been reduced;
(ii) two members of the Big Four do not have, by themselves, a blocking power;
(iii) the new Mediterranean block (Greece, Italy, Portugal and Spain) can exercise a major influence."

In the past 12 months there has been a real shift of power inside the institutions of the European Economic Community. When deciding, as I hope that we shall be able to decide in due course in due legislative form, whether the House accepts the new treaty for a Single European Act, we must bear in mind the real invasion that it represents into the existing relationship between Parliament, the Executive and the institutions of the European Economic Community. I hope, at any rate, that this debate will not conclude until we have secured from the Government a specific undertaking that the legislative process will enable these matters to be separately explored, separately debated and separately decided.

Mr. Michael Knowles (Nottingham, East): I was heartened—as, I suspect, were others although I doubt whether they included the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell)—to read the comment of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary that the Community is not just a forum in which to defend national interests but a forge in which to fashion the means of achieving common objectives. Those of us who support the Community will endorse that. Our only question is why we were not there 20 years ago saying exactly that and fashioning the means to carry out that policy.

I wish to address much the same problems as the right hon. Member for South Down addressed, although my views differ somewhat from his. The White Paper on developments in the European Community, like others before it, suggests that we are groping towards agreement but that there is no positive means of getting action. One can see both opportunities and dangers ahead for parliamentary scrutiny, particularly with the Single European Act. One of our problems as a national Parliament was created quite deliberately in a way that marks us out from, I believe, all other members of the Community, in that we have no institutional link between this House and the European Parliament. Whenever such a link is suggested, it is opposed in all parts of the House. Labour Members are always very much against it, but I suspect that many Conservatives who take the same view are content to hide behind the opposition put up by the Labour party.

There is no institutional link but we kid ourselves if we suppose that the process that we use in this House gives us any real influence. I am honoured to be a member of the Select Committee on European Legislation. The Chairman, too, is present in the Chamber. In fact, however, because we cannot consider anything until we actually receive a piece of paper, by the time we discuss an issue and it is debated in the House things have gone so far down the road that we cannot influence them. If we wish to influence matters in the European Community, we must get in at an earlier stage, as a House and as a democratic institution. The bureaucratic link between the Commission and Whitehall is well built in, with constant contacts and plane flights, but if any Member of this House wishes to ring a Member of the European Parliament he has to pay for the call himself.

This House is effectively chopped off from the European Parliament, and that is no accident. The Select Committee therefore cannot act effectively. Indeed, it is designed not to act effectively. Yet any suggestion that its mandate should be widened is constantly resisted by the Executive because that would shrink the power of the Executive. That is the normal interplay of forces. We have a powerful bureaucratic link, but a democratic deficit between this Parliament and the European Parliament. We have been so jealous of our rights and prerogatives that democratic control of any kind over these decisions is being lost. This is a problem to which we must address ourselves—we need to be informed much earlier. The House of Lords is of more use to Parliament than are its Select Committees.

On 27 January, the House of Lords had an interesting debate on its report on the external competence of the European Communities. The debate contained serious implications which the House has not picked up. The fact that the Community can sign an external treaty means that, within the Community, the process, in terms of law, operates backwards. It overrides laws passed by this House or any other national legislature. The attention of the House was not drawn to that. There is no way in which this House can pick that fact up from the Select Committee procedure, and indeed it is not designed to pick it up. In this case the House of Lords is doing the job that we should be doing.

There is no point in our being jealous and moaning continuously about the European Parliament if we will not do the democratic job. It is my view that someone must do the job. If we fudge the job, then let the European Parliament do it. However, I think we could and should do the job.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I think there is a slight misunderstanding. Although I agree that the reports from another place are often informative, surely there is nothing to prevent the appropriate Committee—the Select Committee or departmental Committee—in the House from fulfilling that parallel objective on merit if it so wishes. For instance, the hon. Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) and his Committee could if they wished look at the merits of the Single European Act that we are discussing. Any hon. Member may take part in the debates of the Select Committee on European Legislation and Standing Committees considering European documents.

Mr. Knowles: We know that that does not happen. That is the theory, not the practice.

I believe we need a better system. Some people have suggested a Grand Committee system. I am not enough of a parliamentary expert to know whether that is the answer, but the present system does not work and certainly a job which needs to be done is not being done. We must find a way of doing it. If this is not done, the House will lose power not to the European Parliament but to the Executive—somewhere between Whitehall and the Commission. That is the reality and that is what I oppose.

We shall soon assume the Presidency and I suspect that it will pose certain problems for Ministers. With the collapse of the dollar, there will be a great pressure on the CAP, to which an enormous part of the budget is still devoted. I suspect—I hope that I have to eat my words—that before the end of the year requests will be put before us for more money. It will be in some disguise, but it will be a request for money. The VAT increase of 1·4 per cent. will not take the strain.

We must address ourselves to the central problems and avoid fudging the issue. Is there a proper system of control? How is the Council of Ministers supposed to operate? The Council is sometimes treated as an intergovernmental conference or just as a sounding board for national disputes. At other times it is seen as the engine of the Community, which will push things along. It is sometimes viewed as a legislative body, but if it is I think it is the only one in the democratic world that meets in secret the whole time.

As we are debating the Single European Act, this is the right time to consider how the system operates. We are a member of the Community and we should stay a member and make it work effectively. That means that there must be great changes. There must be changes to the Council, to the Commission, and to the European Parliament. This House has to examine how it is carrying out its mandate of democratic control in this area. I do not believe that we are fulfilling that function.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): The importance of a parliamentary debate must not be measured by attendance at the debate. There have been many occasions in parliamentary history when there has been a low attendance at debates on matters of great importance.

I agree with a number of the comments made by the hon. Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles). Although we disagree fundamentally about progress in the EEC and Britain's role in it, I agree about the legislative role of the House. I applaud his work and the work of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) in the Select Committee on European Legislation.

This is an all-embracing debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) mentioned unemployment, social policy, and so on. The hon. Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) raised a number of issues which are mentioned in the six-monthly report. There is a danger that we shall ramble on from one subject to another without a coherent theme. I think that the theme pursued by the hon. Member for Nottingham, East is important, and I shall return to it later. However, I wish to concentrate on three areas where things are going wrong and which carry serious future implications for the House and the country. Those issues are mentioned in the six-monthly report. The first issue is the common agricultural policy, the second is the Single European Act and the third is the continuing dispute over finance between the Assembly and the Council.

With regard to the CAP, I draw the attention of the House to paragraph 1.10 of the six-monthly report. That paragraph relates to what was said by the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in a written answer last year but which was never followed up. Last year, the House will recall that in the price fixing for agricultural commodities, in particular cereals, the Germans used the veto in the Council of Ministers to prevent cereal prices to farmers being reduced. That veto stood. However, the Commission, in its wisdom, subsequently managing the market in the absence of the Council's agreement, reduced cereal prices to the level to which they would have been reduced had the veto not been applied. That is mentioned in paragraphs 1.10 and 4.1 of the report.

Thus, the Commission has allocated to itself powers which are only for the Council. The Commission has no authority to change agricultural prices once they have been agreed by the Council. In the absence of the Council's agreement to change the previous year's agricultural prices for a particular commodity, the previous year's prices apply. Therefore, the cereal prices should not have been reduced. I believe they should have been reduced, but that is a separate issue. It is a matter of principle as to which body has the power to reduce the prices. I am surprised that hon. Members have not pursued the Minister and the Government on this issue. We have agreed, in default, to give extra powers to the Commission which are not laid down in the treaty of Rome, nor are they to be laid down in the Single European Act or in any other legislative provision.

It is a fact, within the memories of all hon. Members, that in the past year the argument for increasing the VAT contribution to 1·4 per cent. and subsequently 1·6 per cent. rested on an assurance and undertaking by the Government that that was all very well, but as a quid pro quo there would be strict control over Community expenditure on the CAP by the budget mechanism of financial guidelines. That has gone ahead and everyone has accepted it. Some of us had doubts about the validity of the financial guidelines, but at least we were prepared to give them a chance. The Minister may not read every written answer in Hansard, but I do every weekend, and it is amazing what one learns. I have to inform the House that the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, in a written answer on 26 February, when talking about the agricultural price proposals put forward for the current year by the European Commission and the Council, said:

> "I commended the Commission's determination to place the main emphasis on action through price, but I expressed concern about the proposal to exceed the financial guideline for agricultural expenditure. I made clear my very strong objections in particular to those aspects of the proposals." — [Official Report, 26 February 1986; Vol. 92, c. 549.]

I shall not bore the House with those proposals, but I draw attention to the significance of the financial guideline. The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is now telling the House that, although he disagrees with it, the Commission, which was supposed to have agreed to be the guardian of the financial guidelines, has now put forward price proposals for agricultural products for the current year which "exceed" — his own word — the financial guideline. If that is not a devastating admission on the part of the Government, I do not know what is. It should give us all cause for concern, whatever our views on the EEC.

The Minister "expressed concern" about the financial guideline being exceeded, but he used stronger language when talking about the possibility of income support for some small farmers—he strongly objected. Why did the Minister not object to the major issue of exceeding the financial guideline? He could have objected to other things — one has no objection to that — but he, or his civil servants, must have chosen the words of his answer very carefully. I hope that the answer does not mean that the Government are now backtracking on their commitment to ensure that the Council of Ministers observes the financial guideline.

Paragraph 3.10 of the White Paper refers to the intergovernmental agreement which gave the Community extra money by way of non-repayable advances, which are outside the scope of the treaties. Those advances are not included in the treaty mechanism procedure; they are agreed by a special Council meeting.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) will stress in his winding-up speech that more intergovernmental agreements will come this year. I challenge the Minister to deny that. My concern is not merely that more money will be allocated to the Community than was put forward in the budget discussion, but that it will weaken our case before the European Court later this year in the dispute between the Assembly and the Council. The prospect of further intergovernmental agreements to raise extra money to meet commitments and appropriations under the EEC budget will undermine our case.

If the Minister feels that there is some doubt about that, I refer her to the legal submission on behalf of the United Kingdom Government to the European Court, which was put in the Library at the end of January. It is an entirely legal submission. Paragraph 21 and following paragraphs give the view of the Assembly and say why it disagrees with the Council. One of the Assembly's arguments against the Council's budget and in favour of its own illegal budget is that the draft budget as adopted by the Council does not make adequate provision for existing commitments.

The Assembly's case for an illegal budget is likely to be supported by the Government having to come to the House later this year for extra money in 1986. I beg the Minister to take that point on board. I am glad to see the Minister of State, Treasury present as this matter is important for our future relations with the Community and for relations between the Assembly and the Council, which have a spin-off for the House.

The Single European Act represents a defeat for the Government. That is admitted in the White Paper, paragraph 2.7 of which says:

"[On the second and third points the European council decided by unprecedented majority vote to convene an intergovernmental conference to draw up a treaty]".

We know from what the Prime Minister has said that she did not want any treaty amendments or a Single European Act, and we must assume that she was speaking for the Government as a whole. The Act was therefore a defeat for the Government. Since June, the Government have been involved in a part public relations and part damage limitation exercise. Once the intergovernmental conference was convened, the federalists in Italy, Holland and elsewhere, the Commission and the Assembly tried to get real amendments to the basic treaties which moved in a federalist direction. The Select Committee has done the House a service by drawing attention to the fact that, although we have limited the damage, as the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) said, there have been incursions into the sovereignty of the House as a result of that relatively modest—so its supporters would claim—Single European Act.

The conflict between the Assembly and the House about the Assembly's legislative powers is merely postponed, but the Assembly has been encouraged by the Single European Act. The Assembly, thinking itself even more democratic than national Parliaments, will, given an inch, try to take much more. In due course, there will be further incursions into national sovereignty. The Assembly is being backed by the Commission. One of the safeguards mentioned in the final Act is removed by the fact that the Commission may accept amendments to a Council legislative proposal pushed through by the Assembly.

Of course, the Commission wants the Assembly to have more power and national Parliaments to have less, so it will always accept the Assembly's amendments. That will pose the dilemma, which the right hon. Member for South Down mentioned, about the powers of the House and those of the Council when it comes to rejecting, by qualified majority, the amended proposals put forward by the Assembly and the Commission. This is an additional power to the Assembly, courtesy of the Commission and of the Council having to work by qualified majority.

The major battle between the Assembly and this Parliament is still to be fought. These are preliminary skirmishes, but they are significant. If we do not stop the rot now, when considering the Single European Act, we shall have more incursions.

That brings me to the budget dispute, which has not received much publicity in the House or outside. I assure the House that, as far as I can see, it is of the utmost significance in terms of relations between Community institutions and the House of Commons and the Government. The pretensions of the Assembly for financial control may not be all that well known. If not, I recommend hon. Members to read a publication of the European Assembly entitled "Effective Parliamentary Control of European Finances," which is basically a foreword from the President and an introduction by the Chairman of the Committee on Budgetary Control. There are many suggestions in it. From the foreword of this year's report—which may be an annual report, I do not know—the President, Pierre Pflimlin, says:

"The need for democratic control of Community revenue and expenditure underlies the increase in the European Parliament's budgetary powers brought about by the revisions of the Treaties of Paris and Rome in 1970 and 1975."

Therefore, it is quite clear that the Assembly is using this dispute over the 1986 budget as a test case for its powers. That is why we in this House must take it very seriously.

Sir Russell Johnston: Does the hon. Gentleman find it interesting that this view is expressed by the President of the Parliament, not as a party politician but as someone speaking for the whole Parliament? That is something we seldom get in the same way in this House.

Mr. Deakins: I accept that the President was purporting to speak, and may well have been speaking for all I know, on behalf of 100 per cent. of the members of the European Assembly. That does not surprise me in the least, as, with the possible exception of a few British Labour members—I am not making a party political point—the vast majority of members of the European Assembly are federalist at heart. They want to see the European Assembly in complete control of the legislative procedures in the Community and of the budgetary procedures and so on. It is their right to demand that and it is our right to resist—certainly those of us who have the interests of the House at heart.

[Mr. Deakins]

I have quoted the President, but I now wish to point out two features of the 1986 budget dispute which have perhaps gone relatively unnoticed. The first is on expenditure. Fortunately, that is mentioned in the legal submission against the illegal budget made by this country to the European Court. On expenditure, the Assembly is now ignoring the maximum rate of increase on non-obligatory expenditure and, for the first time, it is also trying to increase obligatory expenditure. I ask hon. Members to think seriously about the implications of the second point, if it is upheld by the European Court. It will give the European Assembly the right to increase expenditure on the common agricultural policy. In the past year the Assembly has passed at least one resolution saying that not enough money was being spent on the common agricultural policy.

That is bad enough, but worse is to come. There is an issue that has gone unnoticed in the legal submission, and I should be grateful if the Minister would give us some assurance that it will at least be looked at. I cannot expect her to answer it in the space of a few hours because it may need to be looked at by legal experts. The Assembly has put forward a balanced budget for 1986. The budget which it had rejected by the Council, the November budget, was also a balanced budget. As the Assembly had increased expenditure in its illegal budget, I was at a loss to know what happened on the income side. Therefore, I tabled a question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The reply came from the Minister of State, Treasury, who is present. I will not bore the House by reading the details, but he was referring to the Assembly's budget. He said:

"Within the 1·4 per cent. VAT ceiling, the amount of VAT own resources at the uniform rate was increased in the adopted budget". —[Official Report, 27 February 1986; Vol. 92, c. 691.]

For the first time, the Assembly has sought to arrogate to itself the power to increase taxation. That has not happened before. I know that we are opposed to the illegal budget, and if it is thrown out by the European Court, as we hope, the issue will not arise. However, I want to put down a marker, and I think that the House would also want to do so, because until now the Assembly has been trying to increase expenditure but has done nothing about taxation. In the illegal budget — as we claim in the House — it has tried to increase, and has increased, expenditure. That expenditure will be financed by a revenue increase which will not have been approved by the Council of Ministers. I need hardly say what the implications of that will be if the illegal budget is upheld by the European Court towards the end of this year.

Mr. Spearing: I have been following what my hon. Friend says with great interest, particularly in relation to the question he asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer because it had escaped my attention. Is he saying that, irrespective of the court's judgment on the legality or otherwise of the Assembly's budget, the Assembly's motion will increase revenue? Surely in terms of the treaty of Rome, that was not within its competence. Had there been a Table Office, such a motion would have been ruled ultra vires.

Mr. Deakins: I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me. I agree with his point and will come back to it.

On the national legal action which is now being taken by the Government against the Assembly—the Council of Ministers is also taking action and the two actions are running in parallel—one has to accept that there is no machinery in the treaty of Rome to curb the actions or the pretensions of the Assembly. That is the fault of the founders of the treaty of Rome. I think that there is such machinery in article 37 of the European Coal and Steel Community treaty, which is now merged with the other two basic treaties into a single uniform treaty for the Community. The Assembly is trying something on. I am not convinced that the court will not try to help it along that particular path.

The Assembly is claiming increased budgetary powers, but in the treaty of Rome there does not seem to be any direct provision for the Court of Justice to get at the Assembly for exceeding powers which are granted to it in the treaty of Rome. I believe that that was a mistake by the EEC states in 1957 and that mistake has been repeated in the latest treaty amendments in the Single European Act. There is nothing in the Act which would give the Council a proper power to take the Assembly to the European Court for abusing or trying to exceed the new powers which have been given to it in the Single European Act.

I read with great interest the United Kingdom submission to the court. I think that it put a strong case. It is obviously cogent and well argued. However, I have two questions, if not for the Minister who will reply, to be taken on board by the appropriate Ministers. I have had correspondence with the Prime Minister about these issues. First, why are we not taking action, in addition to article 173 of the treaty of Rome—it does not directly mention the Assembly but there is at least a legal argument for saying that by analogy the Assembly is caught by that provision—under article 177, paragraphs (a) and (b)?

It might help the House if I quote briefly from article 177:

"The Court of Justice shall have jurisdiction to give preliminary rulings concerning:

(a) the interpretation of this Treaty;

(b) the validity and interpretation of Acts of the institutions of the Community".

Surely, an illegal budget by the Assembly is, at least in part, a matter of interpretation of the treaty. I am astonished that the Law Officers, the Government in their wisdom, and the legal advisers of the Foreign Office have not thought fit to ensure that our case runs on two lines, one under article 173 and the other under article 177. It is still not too late to put in a separate submission and I hope that the Government will consider that.

Why have we not put anything in the legal submission on the Assembly claim, which I mentioned earlier, to have tax-gathering powers — powers over increasing the revenue of the Communities by increasing the VAT contributions within the 1·4 per cent. ceiling? The Assembly has no such powers under any of the basic treaties, so where does it get the power from? As it does not have the power, it should be possible to undermine its position by an appropriate reference to the court.

I am not a legal expert, but in my view, if the Assembly had wanted to increase expenditure and there had been a disagreement, the illegal budget should have been returned to the Council, and if the Council agreed with the extra expenditure that the Assembly wanted, it would have had the right to say, "We shall increase the revenue to make sure that we have a balanced budget, which we have to do." That has not happened. The Council is at fault. I have not seen its submission to the court yet, but I hope that it will also be made available to hon. Members. We might be able to offer some useful suggestions through our own Government as to the line that the Council might take, because, on the issue of authorising extra taxation, there cannot be any two ways about it. Either the Assembly or the Council will have that power. It cannot be shared between two institutions of the Community, both of which have democratic pretensions. I know which one most hon. Members will support—the Council.

We must shoot down the Assembly's case on that point by the end of the year. I am emphasising this point so much because I am not yet convinced that we have taken it on board in our legal submission. I do not expect a reply now on such an important matter, but I hope that the Minister will take it away and come back to the House with an answer in due course.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): I shall return to budgetary discipline, which was so exhaustively dealt with by the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins). It well illustrates the difficulty that the Government will find themselves in through rash boasts of their ability to contain increases in budgetary expenditure.

Like every speech that the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) makes in debates on these matters, his speech today was brilliant and lucid. It was, at every stage, introvertible. At the end he had succeeded in creating an impossible object, which one sometimes sees in ingenious drawings. It was an impossible object of great terror to him and to those who feel like him, an impossible object that I and those who feel like me may marvel at; it was an impossible object none the less. It was the impossible object of a Community that was so organised that it could control its own destiny, sweep aside the will of the House and vote itself the money that it wanted to create the things that it wanted. Alas, it does not exist. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman, in his heart of hearts, knows that it does not exist and rejoices thereat.

On these occasions, I usually find myself defending the Government against hon. Members on both sides of the House who want to stop the world and get off and who never lack for plausible reasons why we should all do so. I should be particularly glad to be able to do so today, with my hon. Friend the Minister of State at the Dispatch Box, because I know that she, like her predecessor, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) who was sitting in the Chamber a few moments ago, is more aware than almost any other Minister of the vital need for this country to exploit to the full the opportunities that membership of the Community offers.

However, it is [illegible]ways too easy to defend a Government who, apart from four or five Ministers, are so half-hearted, so full of qualifications, reservations and withdrawals in their own defence, and who are so reluctant to proclaim the advantages that may arise for our country through a policy of full-hearted participation in a European Community that really works. The Government are far too ready to make concessions to their adversaries in that matter. So determined are they to avoid any charge of weakening in their defence of the right of national veto that they have, as the report on the activities of the six months in 1985 makes plain, contributed towards a further enfeeblement of the decision-making powers of the Community which, now that it has grown to a Community of 12, urgently needs to strengthen its decision-making capacity if it is not to relapse into total paralysis.

So keen are the Government to parade their zeal for budget-cutting that they are raising a series of hopes of being able to contain increases in the European Community budget. The fall in the value of the dollar and the consequent huge gap, which is becoming wider, between Community food prices and food prices in the rest of the world will impose a colossal strain on the budget of the Community, and it will be increasingly difficult to contain the increases within the ceiling that has been set.

Of course, the merchants of gloom are right. They are nearly always right. It will not be possible to reform the common agricultural policy because those same merchants of gloom refuse to consent to the improvements in decision taking which alone would enable the reforms to be made. Budgetary discipline will break down precisely because the unreformable common agriculture policy will run out of control.

However, I do not want to speak on that matter. I want to talk about developments in industrial policy in Europe in the period under review. There were no developments in industrial policy in the period under review. Here at home there were two tremendous industrial issues. At any rate, they were tremendous in the political sense. Those two issues were Westland and British Leyland. If there is to be such a thing as European industrial policy—that is to say, at its very lowest, a conscious attempt by European Governments to ensure the survival of some part of their manufacturing industry and the jobs that go with it by encouraging closer co-operation among European firms to enable them to withstand United States and far east competition—surely there should have been a credible European alternative to an American takeover of Westland and British Leyland.

Even so, the American solution might very well have been the more attractive choice for workers, shareholders and even the nation. However, despite the efforts of my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), there was no credible European alternative for Westland. The total lack of interest by Her Majesty's Government and the short-sighted greed of the European helicopter manufacturers saw to that.

As for British Leyland, successive Governments of both parties who for years propped it up with large subsidies have systematically neglected to use that leverage to push it into a European partnership of near-equals and have contented themselves with allowing British Leyland to become a broken-winded Trojan horse to smuggle Japanese cars into the Common Market.

I do not go all the way with those of my hon. Friends who say that Land Rover must remain British at all costs, still less the rest of BL. However, if Land Rover is to be used as a sweetener to get General Motors to swallow the other more gristly bits of BL, why on earth was no attempt made to put together a similar dowry to tempt a European bridegroom? Once again, the American solution may well turn out to be the best for all concerned in the end, but why was there no choice? Thus, the last British helicopter facility, and the last British motor manufacturer, are passing out of British hands and straight into American hands, with no attempt by the British Government, or, for that matter, the other Governments in the Community, to devise a short or long-term policy to strengthen European helicopter capacity or consolidate European car manufacturing industry.

If what has happened in helicopters and motor cars has not happened in civil aircraft, it is precious little thanks to British Governments of either party, and no thanks whatever to British Airways. It is due solely to the foresight of Hawker Siddeley, which put its money into European Airbus, a family of aircraft that has been a big success, despite the British Government. Now, here too, continued British participation in further development is at risk because the Treasury is holding back on the launch aid that is necessary to keep British Aerospace in the later stages of the project.

There has been a series of sins of omission, each one excusable and possibly justifiable on its own but adding up to a culpable failure to have any coherent strategy to defend British industry and jobs. Such a strategy must have as its main element—I do not say its sole element because often there will be partnership legitimately with Japanese or American firms — the use of the vast economic potential of the European market.

The Government have two answers to the charges of negligence. The first is that each case should be judged on its merits. I am not saying that each industry needs to find a European solution to its problems. Nor can it make sense to ignore altogether the fact that we are a member of the European Community and that the mechanism of co-operation and the habit of working together on projects are already there, waning though they may be for lack of Government interest. To say that each case must be judged on its merits is another way of saying that we have no policy.

The other answer is to say that things must be left to the play of the free market, the judgment of the stock exchange and so on. That was the answer given in the Westland case. It is manifest piffle. What possible free market can there be in the technologically advanced industries which are defence-related when national Governments are the only purchasers?

Fortunately, the Government do not believe their own nonsense; they use their purchasing power to exert a British preference, very understandably, in arms purchases. All Governments in the European Community are in the same business of using their purchasing power to favour their own industry. In 1982, the last year for which figures are available, the United Kingdom spent no less than 98·3 per cent. of Government cash on equipment made within our own borders. The 1·7 per cent. left over is not much with which to encourage any joint European venture but it is at least better than the 0·3 per cent. left over by the Germans, the 0·09 per cent. left over by the French, or the nil per cent. left over by the Italians, every penny of whose procurement expenditure went on goods made within the Italian frontier.

All the political pressures in this Parliament, as in every other European national Parliament, will be exerted in support by a "buy national" policy. There are no votes in European co-operation; it just happens to be necessary for industrial survival. Not only do Governments vitiate, by blatantly protectionist policies in public procurement, the free markets to which they claim to be attached, but their attitude towards the completion of a single market in Europe, which in itself or by itself could do a lot to sustain a competitive European industrial base, is all too reminiscent of Arthur Clough's version of the sixth commandment:

"Thou shalt not kill; but need'st not strive Officiously to keep alive."

We British complain about German, French and Italian frontier delays, with good reason, but we all know how effectively Her Majesty's Customs manages to hold things up at our sea ports and with what derision it treats the notion of a green customs channel. It looks as if it will shortly be transferring its energies to ensuring that after the Channel tunnel is built it will take longer to get from London to Paris by train than it does at present by ferry.

I hope that the Liberal party will not offer itself as the champion of effective European industrial policy. The only Liberal voices that we heard during the whole Westland affair were those of the two hon. Members who had a direct constituency interest in a quick sell-out to the Americans. I am still waiting to hear proposals from the Liberal party for a thought-out European solution for the future of British Leyland. We know that, with the sole exception of the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston), who is an invariable attender at and participant in debates—he is the European policy of the Liberal party — the party is now giving all its attention to more electorally fashionable topics.

As for the Labour party, it is still officially committed to taking Britain out of the European Community.

Mr. Foulkes: No, we are not.

Sir Anthony Meyer: We are not sure about that. Although there may be legitimate doubts as to whether the Labour party means to take us out of the European Community, and whether it means that more than any of the other things it says, there is no doubt that the Labour party is still the same narrow, insular, suspicious party that it always has been. The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) made a fair fist of something that sounded like a European speech. That was because none of his minders was present apart from the hon. Member for Walthamstow, but he is so amiable that I do not think he would strike fear into anyone's heart.

Only a Conservative Government can give the urgently needed new impulse to the evolution of an industrial policy which will enable Europe to remain an industrial society well into the next century.

Mr. Foulkes: The hon. Gentleman has said that only a Conservative Government can give such impetus. It is on public record that he wants a change in the leadership of the Government. Since we know that the Prime Minister is not the most enthusiastic European, is that one of the reasons why he wants a change in leadership? Does he want to make sure that the initiative he is talking about takes place?

Sir Anthony Meyer: I want to make sure that the policies of my right hon. Friend are successfully defended at the next general election. My right hon. Friend may be the person best qualified to defend her own great European achievements. As to my right hon. Friend's commitment to the European idea, I do not see how any impartial observer could question the depth of her attachment to the concept.

In the effort to ensure that Europe will remain an industrial society, we have a start of sorts in the EUREKA project — not, I fear, a British initiative, although it should have been. It covers only a tiny number of projects in the most advanced area of technology. It will not help us to keep our steel industry, our car industry or our aircraft industry, but we cannot keep those going by our own unaided efforts. We must work more closely with our European partners to create the conditions in which our industries can survive. I look to this Government to get on with it. It would be no use looking to any other.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) whose courageous consistency in defence of the ideals of the European Community through fair weather and foul must attract general respect. I say that despite the somewhat limp slap on the hand which he felt obliged to give to the Liberal party.

It is also a great pleasure to welcome to the six monthly "take note" debates the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker). If it is not an embarrassment to her in her absence, I must say that I have always found her an exceptionally fair-minded Minister, not given to being dogmatic, but willing to listen—which cannot be said of all Ministers. Her arrival on the European scene will enhance the Government's contribution. We could do with more people with her engaging, intelligent frankness. I say that unreservedly.

In these debates we ask ourselves where we are in the Community and where we are going. An optimistic view, which is becoming fashionable, is that not only the Government but the great official structures, such as the Foreign Office, the Treasury and the Department of Trade and Industry, think that we are making progress, that we must make more progress and that there is movement and a more positive attitude.

One gets a taste of this in the first paragraph of the White Paper, which states:

"The enlargement negotiations were completed and the Spanish and Portuguese Accession Treaty signed. Agreement was reached on the new own resources decision embodying the budgetary corrective mechanism for the United Kingdom. With these long-standing issues resolved the Community was able to give greater attention to its future development and in particular to institutional reform and better decision-making."

More than anything else, that changed attitude was enshrined in the paper presented by the Prime Minister to the Fontainebleau European Council in June 1984. Many of us felt that the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes)—I am sorry that he has left the Chamber—had written that document in secret and that its publication was to be the precursor of his meteoric rise to office. Sadly, that did not happen.

It was certainly a positive document. I am surprised at how few hon. Members have read it. I strongly recommend it. It had the most positive tone of any document produced by any United Kingdom Government since the halcyon days of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath). Indeed, it will make an interesting speculation for future political historians whether, had the right hon. Gentleman won the 1974 election, our path into Europe would have been very different and whether we would have ridden the oil crisis that coincided with our entry quite differently. The pro-European mood was certainly there, as the 1975 referendum demonstrated, but thereafter it was steadily dissipated, first by an unenthusiastic Labour party and secondly by a very nationalistic lady.

What is now the status of the Fontainebleau paper? It was quite at variance with the spirit of the Fontainebleau paper — first, on institutions — that we should ally ourselves with Denmark and Greece in making reservations on the Dooge report. That is referred to in paragraph 2.6 of the White Paper, when the present Secretary of State for Scotland had the job of chumming up with Mr. Papandreou and the Danish representatives. It was also at variance with the spirit of Fontainebleau that, in making the argument for budgetary adjustment to take account of the United Kingdom's continuing economic decline and the GNP relative to other members, we should simply make a United Kingdom case without establishing this in a Community frame to take lasting account of the problems of other countries. For example, Portugal was in exactly the same position, but from an even lower economic base.

I also suggest that in our appointments to the Commission we gave no evidence of a wish to promote United Kingdom politicians of the first rank, far less those with enthusiasm for the institution that they were joining. In parenthesis, let me record that I very much regret the departure of Ivor Richard, who was beginning to do a very good job.

I again ask what the status now is of the Fontainebleau document, and I hope that the Minister will say something about it in his reply. I also hope that he has read it, studied it and agreed with it.

The Luxembourg meeting took place after the publication of the White Paper, but, even if the Government went along with the conclusions of the Luxembourg agreement and prised themselves apart from Denmark and Greece, their role was one of brake, not accelerator, and the vision one saw in the Fontainebleau agreement was surpressed.

In passing, I entirely agree with the Minister of State and am pleased with the result of the Danish referendum. I congratulate the various forces in Denmark on their success, particularly my political friends in Venstre.

Over the years, there have been a variety of approaches to reconciling the enthusiastic call of the Six with the others who joined later—who have always been a bit difficult, with the possible exception of Ireland, which has managed to get quite a bit out of it. In 1974, Socialist Willy Brandt coined the idea of a two-speed Community, and the Liberal Ralf Dahrendorf afterwards came up with the idea of an à la carte Community, although that had many federal connotations. The new French President of the Commission, Jacques Delors, was the variable geometry man. They have all been trying to find a way of reconciling those two problems.

Although the decision-making process was approved in Luxembourg, it must still be put to the test of vested interests. I was not terribly encouraged by what the Minister of State said. She said that our special interests were protected, and we all know the result of that. She also said that the Luxembourg compromise holds, but what happens then? The only direct thing that she said was that we will decide things for ourselves. That did not encourage me to think that the Government were of a mood to go in for majority decision making.

Even if all this works, we shall thereafter need stronger mechanisms for regional regeneration and for dealing with changing technology. The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) spoke about this, and he was quite right.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I take it that the hon. Gentleman is speaking on behalf of his party. Does the leader of the SDP agree with him on majority voting in all material respects?

Sir Russell Johnston: The leader of the SDP and myself have a very amicable relationship——

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman answer my question? He will appreciate that this is central to the development of the European Parliament and the Community in the context of the aspirations of the alliance in a couple of years time. Therefore, it is important for the nation to know where the alliance stands on this very important question.

Sir Russell Johnston: If the hon. Gentleman wants me to answer his questions, he should oblige me by not interrupting before I have got through my preamble.

The Liberal and Social Democratic parties produced a joint programme for the European elections that dealt with majority voting. We stated our position quite clearly, and that is the position that I have just enunciated.

The Government's continued obstruction to an increase in the powers of the funding of the regional and social funds is difficult to understand. I have remarked before that I will never forget the enlightened first speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) as President of the European Commission in Luxembourg, to which I listened as a member of the European Parliament. His central theme was the increasing divergence between the magic square of Hamburg, the Ruhr, Paris and London, and the peripheries, which include the highlands of Scotland, which I represent, a great swathe of the United Kingdom almost down to the midlands, and Mediterranean countries and Portugal. Incidentally, I must say to the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) who referred to Portugal as a Mediterranean country that it is Atlantic and quite different in attitude.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Hillhead believed that the trend must be reversed. Because of the Council's resistance, he could not do much about it, and since then the position has worsened. In those days a great deal of hope centred on the enlargement of the non-quota section of the regional fund. Now it has been abolished, which is a bad thing. I am referring to section V, paragraph 5.1 of the White Paper. Did the Government support that, and if so why?

The non-quota section, which at one stage increased to 13 per cent., seemed to hold out the best chance for the neglected peripheries of the Community to obtain help. I greatly deplore that change. Most, if not all, of the peripheries suffer from neglect by their central Governments. The opportunity to involve people from outside, operating on agreed criteria, was immensely helpful. That was certainly the view of Mr. George Thomson, now Lord Thomson of Monifieth, the Commissioner who established the regional fund. Incidentally, we also continue to ignore additionality.

Do the Government accept that economic convergence will not work unless it is balanced by social and political mechanisms? When the hon. Member for Hamilton said that enlarging the market is not likely by itself to inspire the confidence of the unemployed, he was right, especially regarding the peripheries. Nor will economic convergence work unless it is buttressed by an integrated financial system.

It is extraordinary that no hon. Member has yet uttered the three letters EMS. The hon. Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles) referred to the Foreign Secretary's speech which is reported in The Times of today, in which the Foreign Secretary said that perhaps we could not continue saying that the tide was not quite right. Shakespeare said:

"There is a tide in the affairs of men" and in this matter the Government seem to be marooned on a tideless sea, unwilling to take any decision.

Jacques Delors, the President of the European Commission, said at the Luxembourg meeting:

"The Commission's proposal is for keeping on the idea of European Union. This resolve has been asserted by a number of heads of state and government. Now, it is hard to suppose European Union can come about without eventually operating on the basis of unified institutions. I freely admit this it is not feasible now. But we must nurture the feasibility of it in the future, given the close interdependence between foreign policy and security on the one hand and what may be called stewardship — economic, financial and monetary affairs — on the other. Again, stewardship involves the social side, the arts, the will to get along together."

The issue of will is fundamental.

I did not expect to find very much about the European Parliament on page 38 of the White Paper, largely because in the contents it states that the Court of Justice is dealt with on page 39. What a miserable report it is. I accept that the Minister expanded on it. The reports are interesting and useful, and record in careful bureaucratic fashion in the peculiarly neutral language of the Committee Clerk what has happened, but it would be of immense advantage and would give bite to these debates if they included the Government's forward views. They do not. What do the Government think of the European Parliament in the long term?

At Luxembourg Jacques Delors said of the European Parliament:

"I would stress that it is necessary to increase the powers of the European Parliament. Is the European Parliament a parliament of the same standing, and the same nature, as the national parliaments? We shall not settle that question: anyhow, the answer differs from country to country. I would, though, make the point that the heads of state and government decided the Parliament should be elected by universal suffrage; and, however much some of its debates may on occasion be ridiculed, its members are elected by universal suffrage . . .We could help it by making it more responsible and involving it more in Community decision-making."

That is not impractical or visionary, to use the Minister's phrase, but rational and positive. How do the Government respond to that question?

At the next European elections, the Parliament has responsibility for making proposals about a uniform electoral system. The Bocklet report is now before it as the successor to Seitlinger. What is the Government's view on Bocklet? We have not the faintest idea from the White Paper. After the 1979 European elections it was recognised, even by Mr. Angus Maude as was, that it was disgraceful that the Liberal party got 13 per cent. of the vote but no representation. In 1984 the alliance got 20 per cent. of the votes but no representation.

I do not know whether the Minister reads The Scotsman. He nods wisely, but that could mean anything because Ministers have a tendency to nod wisely when anything dangerous is in the offing. The Scots were asked what they thought about proportional representation, and 57 per cent. said that they would like to see it introduced. Even 50 per cent. of the Labour party thought that proportional representation would be more effective than the present system, and only 19 per cent. thought that it would be less effective. Those were the results for our present system of national government, and the argument for European elections is far greater because there is not the problem of direct accountability to constituencies.

If the Community is to move towards greater cohesion, even à la carte cohesion, there must be a democratic oversight, and the Council does not represent that. It is a compromise Council, negotiating inter-state disputes. It has none of the necessary supranational overview of a permanent commission of an elected parliament. What is the Government's view on that?

I began by asking about the Prime Minister's Fontainebleau paper. Since then the big change, or part of the change, is that British interests in the Community are now defined, not just by the Government, but by many other elements in the country, as lying in the reinforcement, rather than the erosion, of existing economic and commercial commitments and the strengthening of political co-operation. At last that is being recognised as the means to exercise greater influence, rather than a component in the reduction of our influence.

Mr. Foulkes: The hon. Gentleman's speech has been helpful and interesting, but he has not mentioned agricultural policy. As he knows, the CAP is a major part of Community expenditure. Recently, the other part of the alliance — the Social Democratic party — agreed that quotas are inevitable for all supported farm production. Does the Liberal party agree that quotas are inevitable in all those areas? Is that the policy of the alliance as a whole?

Sir Russell Johnston: It is true that I have not dealt with agricultural policy. One cannot deal with everything, and I have already spoken at some length. I have discussed the CAP previously. It must be evident to the hon. Gentleman that much discussion is necessary when two different parties work out policies—[Laughter.] It is all very well to laugh, but that is a fact. The same is true of any coalition on the continent. The hon. Gentleman asked what I think about quotas——

Mr. Foulkes: No, the Liberal party.

Sir Russell Johnston: The party is in negotiation. Personally, I accept that quotas are inevitable across the board, and that the SDP is correct.

The anti-Europeans have now mostly fled the Chamber. The only two Opposition Members who spoke before me were anti-Europeans—the right hon. Member for South Down who has a well-established and almost mythical record in this regard, and the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins). Whatever criticisms they may have — I agree with some of them — they must begin to square up to the fact that the Community provides a bedrock of commitment and predictability to the United Kingdom. All of us must ask ourselves how best we can develop that, but they more than others.

The Liberal party and its alliance partners, the Social Democrats, are convinced that the only viable future for Britain — if it does not want to become a nation of hamburger salesmen, as my right hon. Friend the leader of the Liberal party remarked recently — is within the European Community, with all its industrial and technological challenge, in which we play a part. The hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West mentioned that. We must give the citizens of Europe a say in the political future of the world, strung taut as it is between the United States and the Soviet Union.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I warmly welcome my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign Office, who opened this broad-ranging debate so satisfactorily. She began her political career in Kensington, which gave her the background for an informed and penetrating weltanschauung, as she has already shown us in her new post. The debate has ranged widely, and I hope that the House will not think that I am straying too far if I deal with some fundamental issues which it is important to review in the light of Britain's assuming the presidency of the Community during the second half of this year.

We have heard the usual chorus of hon. Members expressing their anxieties — one might almost call them heebie-jeebies — about the way in which the European Parliament appears to be growing in importance and the budget is becoming a slightly heavier burden on our national economies. I could not help but wonder whether, if one turned back to the accounts of the debates in the early years of the state legislatures in the United States of America, one might have found people with an equally timid and provincial outlook in view of the growth in importance of Washington as a force in the development of the United States. We can all be glad that the federal forces in the United States won in the end; the world has been a better place as a result. It would be good if, in time, the federal forces gained the ascendancy over the national parliaments in the EC. However, I also believe in the inevitability of gradualism, which is attractive to Opposition Members. We do not wish to build our constitution too quickly, because trees that grow quickly tend to decay quickly too.

We have not made great progress in the European Community since the striking move forward in the Fontainebleau agreement in June 1984, which can be counted as a special success for my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. Since then, we have been marking time after Europe began to recognise the force of my right hon. Friend's arguments, very persistently put, on the necessity to control the budget, to reform the agricultural policy and to improve the workings of our institutions.

Britain has had the difficulty since its late entry to the EC that it feels some reticence about its membership. We have been members of the Community since 1973, yet to some extent we still regard ourselves as outsiders. That is partly due to the continuing attractions of our Commonwealth links. It is also partly due to the English-speaking link with the United States of America, which gives us hope that we can still build on our special relationship with that country. In dealing with economic matters, we still cling to the idea and the tradition of sterling as a world currency and the most important medium of trade. Unfortunately, it is no longer that, although it is still an important international currency.

That reticence has caused us to cultivate in the House of Commons and elsewhere what one might call the "greater Switzerland" fallacy: that we can have a friendly relationship with the Common Market, but that we will never be completely integrated into it. We think that somehow we can retain our independence and customs, look back on our independent history and never allow ourselves to be completely trapped in the clauses of the treaty of Rome. The difficulty with a "greater Switzerland" relationship with the Common Market, however, is that Britain is too big to become an appendix of a great continental economy, which is what happened to Switzerland. We cannot live in a marsupial relationship with the German economy; but, equally, we are too small to be a world power in our own right. Therefore, the greater Switzerland fallacy fails in both respects: Britain is too small in one way, and too large in another, to fit into that formula. If we are not careful we shall become a greater Iceland, because we shall have drifted away from the continent in business terms. We cannot afford to contemplate that.

The continent sees Britain as a timid child running to and fro at the edge of the swimming pool, but afraid to jump in and join the other children enjoying themselves in the water. We cannot afford to continue looking like timid members of the Common Market. Our half-hearted relationship with the Community has continued for too long.

However, Britain has lately been successful in persuading the other members to make the reforms which we believe are important if we are to participate more fully. That process must continue when Britain assumes the presidency. We must maintain the momentum for control of the budget, and we must continue the policy of agricultural reform while recognising that the agricultural vote is still an important factor affecting the democratic policies of the continental parties.

I hope that there will be some new, positive British initiatives while Britain has the presidency. The most important initiative will be the completion of the internal market. As a London Member, I believe it is vital that London should play the most active possible part in the development of a united European economy. We have set ourselves the target of creating an internal market by 1992, which is what one might call a six-year plan. Socialists usually love six-year plans, but they do not seem to be too enthusiastic about the six-year plan to complete the internal market. It must be the major British interest, since we are a nation that depends on trade. It is no good belonging to a so-called Common Market that maintains ridiculous frontier barriers and obstacles to the free movement of goods and services.

Lord Cockfield's excellent report on the subject is a tribute to what British thinking can offer to the Common Market, and it has been very widely supported on the continent. The British Government owe it to Lord Cockfield to give the maximum possible support now to his campaign for the completion of the internal market. We should also recognise the lead that has been given by Jacques Delors in this respect. He is a man of particular integrity and foresight, and the type of Frenchman upon whom one can rely to act in the interests of the Community and not just in the interests of France. This is an important matter, because we tend to be over-suspicious of prominent French individuals who take a lead in the Common Market, because we suspect that their first loyalty is to France, and we retain a suspicion that it is bound to do us harm to become too closely involved in their initiatives.

I had the pleasure of working for Jacques Delors for three years when he was chairman of the Economic and Monetary Committee of the European Parliament, and I can say that he is a man to whom we can look for a first-class lead in the Community. He has thrown his weight of influence behind the creation of the internal market, and I am sure that he accepts the necessity for the internal market to be not just a matter of the exchange of goods and services, but, what is particularly important for London, the way to the complete integration of the European market for capital.

It is no good thinking that Europe is a Community that can live on current account alone. We are trying to build a capitalist society—a society in which people can take long-term decisions. We must build a context in which long-term decisions are likely to be taken in the most fruitful possible way. That is also vital for London's financial institutions, which are not concerned just with insurance, with which the Government seem to be preoccupied in dealing with this aspect of the internal market.

On the stock exchange, in house purchase finance, in the commodity markets, and in all the other activities in which London is pre-eminent and is capable of making an important contribution to the smooth operation of the Community, we still have formal and informal institutional barriers, barriers of tradition, and protective devices of all kinds, which prevent the operation of a genuinely effective integrated European market for capital.

One of the major difficulties is that we are still clinging to our national currencies, repeating the mistakes of the 1930s. The British Government should be seen to be taking a long-term approach to currency stabilisation. But we are waking up to the fact that we are facing a great decision. Do we want the world to be organised into two zones of time for the movement of capital, one based on Tokyo and one on New York, with London taking a subordinate and suburban position, related to both the great capitals, but not making any great contribution? Or do we insist that the world should be divided into three time zones, in which London, making its contribution as the pre-eminent financial centre of the Common Market, is able to hold its own for eight hours of each day and contribute to the success of a world economy that is founded on three great centres of excellence rather than two? The crucial decision whether we belong to a world with two time-zones of 12 hours or three time-zones of eight hours is likely to be made in the coming year. The Government must recognise the importance of their opportunity, with the presidency of the European Community, to do what is necessary to create an integrated European market for capital.

The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) complained that nobody had yet spoken about Britain and the European monetary system. I have spent a considerable amount of time on this subject, and I had the opportunity to study it for more than 10 years as a member of the Economic and Monetary Committee of the European Parliament.

At the moment the EMS can be regarded as a considerable success, but it is a solar system in which Frankfurt and the deutschmark constitute the sun around which the other currencies revolve. If sterling were to join that solar system, we would face the danger of creating a solar system in which there were two suns which, from time to time, would be likely to move eccentrically. This could be disturbing for all concerned and eventually lead to what occurred when we tried to join the snake more than 10 years ago. After only a few weeks of membership, we had to withdraw. As I am committed to the necessity to achieve an integrated currency system in the Common Market, I do not want Britain to join the EMS and then have to withdraw prematurely.

We might create the conditions in which Frankfurt and London moved together, or sufficiently closely for the system to co-operate fruitfully, if we reintroduced capital controls. That is not only undesirable, but virtually impossible, and I would not support it under any circumstances. The other way that we can move is towards the complete integration of the capital market between London and Frankfurt, by the perfection of arbitrage and by broadening the relationship between London and Frankfurt, so that we achieve something approaching the stability and continuity that one sees between Chicago and New York.

If we do not achieve something like that, the pound and the deutschmark will inevitably drift apart. We need a single real underlying rate of interest under the currency values of the national currencies, and we need a single market for the distribution of savings into investment opportunities. The European market will have to be seen as an extension of our home market, or even as our home market itself. This means a great leap forward in the thinking of our business people.

Inevitably, the long-term currency relationships must be based on the purchasing power parities. Is that what we would achieve if we joined the EMS as it now is? We have to ask ourselves two questions when considering whether this is the right moment for Britain to join the EMS. The first is whether we have the currency relationships on a stable basis. Is the pound now facing the deutschmark on a rate of exchange that is likely to continue?

Until recently I had not felt that we had achieved purchasing power parity between the pound and the deutschmark; but now we have come a great deal closer to it. It has been achieved because of the movement in the price of oil, and nobody can predict what will happen next to that. However, I hope that it would be Treasury and Bank of England policy, if we joined the EMS, to retain a structure of currency relationships between sterling and the deutschmark and the other major currencies of the continent that corresponded as nearly as possible to the purchasing power parity. That is the right way to turn the Common Market into a real, genuine, home market for British goods and services.

The second question is whether we have gone far enough with the integration of the capital market to be able to regard London and Frankfurt as sufficiently closely bound to each other to be able to co-exist in the same monetary framework for a period not just of months but of years. The answer to that is yes, if our membership of the EMS permits us to adjust the pound to its purchasing power parity in an orderly way from time to time; but the answer has to be no if it means that we are obliged to gear ourselves to a system which inexorably brings sterling back to a condition of perpetual over-valuation.

Many people are waking up to the fact that the decline of British industry relative to the industries of other major manufacturing economies, such as the United States, Germany and Japan, has been due to the Bank of England's persistent policy of maintaining the pound as an over-valued currency. This has been a wonderful background for the prestige of the City of London, but a disastrous background for manufacturing.

I would not want to see the deutschmark, with an inflation rate of less than 1 per cent. per annum, tied to sterling, with an inflation rate still of 4 or 5 per cent. per annum, if the relationship were regarded as so permanent that we were gradually dragged up and up again into over-valuation. But other currencies that are inflating faster than the deutschmark have belonged successfully to the EMS and have made occasional adjustments to the deutschmark without obstructing the system unduly. Therefore, I feel reasonably confident that we can now do that as well.

How do we define the most important target for our presidency, which we hope our Ministers will bring a great step nearer? It is not just joining the European monetary system, and it is not just having certain agreements for winding down controls at the frontiers or eliminating certain particular difficulties in the operation of the capital market. We must create the conditions for the most successful achievement in the creation of wealth by an international capitalist economy within a genuinely democratic framework. Of course, it is an enormous and very ambitious task. The conditions that we have to achieve must be clearly foreseeable over a long span of time so that business men can take ambitious investment decisions, in the confidence that they will prove to be right.

Capitalism is not working in western Europe in the way that we hoped, because many business men are unable to look ahead for even a few weeks.—[Interruption.] If the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) were a business man—I know it is claimed that he is many things, but I do not think that anybody has ever claimed that he is that—he would understand a little bit better what I am saying. One needs to be able to have a reasonable degree of confidence that decisions based on knowledge of the market and on knowledge of one's product will prove to be right. They do not prove to be right if there is unpredictable Government interference, or central bank interference, or tax changes, or other incidental movements which mean that decisions proved to be wrong, through no fault of the original investors or the economic planners.

This does not require merely the free movement of goods and capital. It requires also continuity and a favourable policy in matters of taxation, about which I want to say a few words. When we refer to the harmonisation of goods and services in the internal market, we must not forget the vital importance of tax harmonisation and the harmonisation of policy in regard to changes in taxation that will also be necessary.

Looking towards this country's Budget, I should like to say a word in support of those who are campaigning for a reduction in the stamp duty on investment decisions. We want to create favourable tax conditions for the integrated capital market. We want to take off London the burden which we ourselves have imposed upon London. I do not want just a halving of stamp duty. There should be an end to stamp duty altogether on investment decisions on the London stock exchange. We should set London free to exert its strength for the benefit of the whole Community.

[Sir Brandon Rhys Williams]

We should also seek out the best ways to end the artificial frontiers that are created by differences of taxation interpretation, such as the different treatment of particular classes of goods for value added tax. Next, we should make a serious effort to tackle the anomalies that are created by the different systems for the taxation of corporations in all of the member states. We made a considerable study in the Economic and Monetary Affairs Committee of the different systems of corporation tax which operate in the different member states. We tried to find a way in which we could work towards their eventual harmonisation so that we could end the tax frontiers created through the corporation taxes. We reached the conclusion that the only practical road to the harmonisation of corporation tax was the progressive abolition of corporation tax altogether.

This is not such a wild ambition when one realises that corporation tax is simply a tax on the eventual consumer of the goods or services that the company provides. But it is virtually a random system of tax, and it is very unfair and uneven in its operation, whereas value added tax, which is a similar tax, in that it puts the ultimate burden on the eventual consumer, operates in a much more comprehensible and more even and general way. It would be better even to have a slow increase in value added tax if it were accompanied by a step by step reduction in corporation tax, and eventually brought us to the total elimination of corporation tax throughout the European Community.

I realise that I have caused mirth on the Opposition Benches and that what I am saying constitutes ambitious objectives; but do we sincerely want to raise the level of the British economy in order to suck into profitable employment all the people who are looking for cash rewards for their work? Are the Government—and, for that matter, the Opposition—sincerely looking for a way to reduce the level of unemployment in this country? If so, we have only one road to follow. That is to make a success of our membership of the Common Market. If we continue to stay on the fringes of the Common Market and do not make a success of it, we shall waste the opportunity that is provided for us by the treaty of Rome to create a really successful economy and one which needs the services of all the people who are willing to work. We must help the other member states to do the same.

Our presidency offers us the opportunity to make important progress. The continental members of the Community have accepted the Prime Minister's lead in the control of the budget and the reform of the common agricultural policy. I believe that they would also welcome a major British initiative towards the creation of the internal market.

I should like to say a few words about preparing British opinion for the consequences of completing the internal market. This is a job for the British Government at home. We talk about the internal market, but we have not yet prepared ourselves for what it means. It means that economic nationalism will become an obsolete and impossible policy. It will bring much greater efficiency, far superior exploitation of capital and more rapid technical advances; but it will also mean the amalgamation and rationalisation of old established industries.

In recent weeks we have seen the excitement that has been caused by talk of the rationalisation of this country's motor industry. We have seen manifestations of a movement of opinion which has been interpreted as anti-American sentiment, or as a determination to keep our industries British, and to rebut amalgamation with the car industries of other countries. I do not think that British sentiment is anti-American or, for that matter, anti-Japanese; but British workers do not want to be dominated by people whose decisions are taken far away in a totally different economic context. We do not want to be dominated from overseas by people who do not have a very close relationship with the particular interests of this country.

Public opinion polls have already begun to show that British workers do not feel the same degree of suspicion where Common Market enterprises are concerned. The reason for this must surely be that they are beginning to feel a sense of community with the Common Market countries which we do not generally feel to the same extent with the Japanese or with the dollar countries. This, at bottom, if we analyse it, must be because we have the protection of the Rome treaty. The treaty is a highly detailed device for creating a market in which its members work together, instead of against each other's interests in forms of competition, which is unfruitful. It is a relationship which is far more precise and much closer than we in Britain could ever hope to achieve either with yen area industries or with the industries of the dollar area.

I have spoken at length, and the House has been indulgent, but I should like to make one last point. I regard it as an important recommendation for our presidency. We should seek to make the most of the Lomé convention, not just because it is a link with our former overseas territories, but because the accession of Spain and Portugal means that we have the opportunity to suggest a widening or a fresh development of the Lomé convention, so that more formal relationships can be established with the Spanish and Portuguese-speaking territories that lie outside the European Community. We need to put Government enthusiasm into creating a better understanding of and better relationships with these important economic areas.

I have said before, and I should like to repeat it, that we must look ahead to the influence which satellite television will exercise before very long in the context of the world economy. We may not understand this, but the Americans and the Japanese already understand it. They are making progress which will either leave us behind or leave us out of the picture altogether. I should like to see, as a development of the Lomé convention, the production of regular tapes for educational purposes. They could be shown in English, French, Spanish, Portuguese and, for that matter, in Russian on a world wide basis in order to give people at home in their own institutes of education what we used to try to give them by bringing them to this country for technical training, language practice and training in other subjects. Those services would be building on the success of the BBC overseas service and the Open University. We have taken the lead in those areas in an English-speaking context, but we have not yet grasped the idea of putting a world university of the air into effect as part of the EC's relationship with the outside world.

I should like to see a conscious, deliberate move by the Government during their presidency to take into account the influence that we can have, now that Spain and Portugal are members of the Community, on the Spanish and Portuguese-speaking territories of the world. This is an important EC opportunity to teach other nations how to live.

Let me conclude by wishing all success to our Ministers, who now have the duty to take the lead for six months in the running of the European Community.

8.10 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): We have listened to some grand and formidable compositions tonight. I want to follow the advice offered by the hon. Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) that in these debates we should occasionally wrangle over details of EEC decision making. That is precisely what I would like to do vis-a-vis the fishing industry.

I want to make a comment or two on the common fisheries policy in the light of what the White Paper and the Official Journal of the European Communities have to say. The White Paper devotes all of one paragraph to fisheries, an industry that is important to Scotland, particularly its more remote maritime communities. In that single paragraph the White Paper says:

"Under the common fisheries policy the European Community logbooks and Landing Trans-shipment Declarations were introduced on 1 April 1985. Along with the European Community's Fisheries Inspectorate they will help ensure that the common fisheries policy is applied equally and fairly to all Community fishermen and that member states observe TACs and quotas."

It is that equal and fair treatment of fishermen on which I want to comment.

Given the present circumstances of the common fisheries policy and the approval, albeit qualified, that it engenders among fishermen, it is now time to strengthen some elements of it in order to ensure the continuing viability of the industry and—the industry is dependent upon it—the continuing viability of the commercially important stocks.

Last night, during the Second Reading of the Salmon Bill, harsh words were spoken about the devastation inflicted upon salmon by interceptory fishing methods employing monofilament nets. I have a great deal of sympathy for those views, but at the same time I have some concern for the villains in that drama—villains to some hon. Members. They are the fishermen of the north-east of Scotland drift net fishery. We need European Community-wide measures to deal with that and other problems.

In addition to what was said last night by the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, a statutory instrument was laid this morning—the Inshore Fishing (Prohibition of Carriage of Monofilament Gill Nets) (Scotland) Order 1986. It says:

"The carriage of monofilament gill nets for any purpose in any British fishing boat in the specified sea area"—

that is Scottish waters—

"is prohibited."

Apart from the friction and anger that that order and the Government's proposals in the Salmon Bill will create for the drift net fishery, it will also create in the fishing ports on both sides of the border some considerable tension. These are piecemeal measures within the EEC framework. The Government should follow the advice contained in the report of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs on the fisheries protection service which was published this morning. Paragraph 77 says:

"The ban on monofilament will apply to all British boats in Scottish inshore waters. The SFF,"—

the Scottish Fishermens Federation—

"when questioned on this point, said that there was no opposition amongst its members to a ban per se, but there was strong opposition to a ban that affected only Scottish fishermen."

That legislation affects British vessels in Scottish waters, not the vessels coming into Scottish waters from other member states.

The Committee went on to say:

"The Committee sympathises with the Scottish fishermen. In our view, the strongest possible representations should be made to MAFF and to the EEC for a total ban in EEC waters. The banning of monofilament nets could well be an important move to help protect salmon stocks; but it should not be selective."

I hope that the House is given the opportunity to debate that report; at the very least, the Scottish Grand Committee should take it on board.

The report also has a sensible word or two to say about the vexed question of by-catches and the level of by-catches is again determined under the auspices of the common fisheries policy. The report says:

"The problem of by-catches by industrial fishermen has several facets. The permitted by-catch level is itself a matter of dispute. The permitted level returned to 10 per cent. at the end of May 1985; we were told that there was pressure within the EEC to raise the level to 18 or 20 per cent. again. There is to be no derogation from the 10 per cent. limit during the 1985-86 pout fishery."

The members of the Committee go on to say:

"We commend the successful outcome of the negotiations by UK Fisheries Ministers to retain the 10 per cent by-catch limit, and we hope that no attempt will be made by the European Commission or Member States to raise the limit in future years."

Let us hope that those member states opposed to an increase in the by-catch pay heed to that sensible observation and resist any attempt by the Danish Government to shift the percentage upwards. Such a move would be disastrous for the commercially valuable stocks of fish in the North sea.

The report also says:

"DAFS"—

the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries, Scotland—

"told us that they had arrested boats carrying both a 16 mm and 80 mm net and had not experienced any problem in securing a conviction, but that they had nevertheless taken up with the Commission the question of banning the carriage of 80 mm nets on industrial boats".

On that important issue, the Committee says:

"We support the efforts of the Government to secure a ban on the carriage of 80 mm nets by boats fishing for industrial species. It is our view that no fishing vessel should be permitted to carry both types of gear at one and the same time."

Again, I hope that the Government and the House remain vigilant on those matters.

Conservation measures of the kind introduced into Scottish and English waters need to be extended through our European Community seas. That should be the objective of the House and the Government. In the meantime, I commend to the House the report by the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs. I am a member of that Committee and—I hope the House will forgive my modesty—one of the authors of what some would call a commendable report.

Chapter 6 of the annual report by the Court of Auditors for the 1984 financial year deals with certain aspects of the common fisheries policy. Dealing with expenditure on biological studies carried out by institutions in the European Community, the annual report states:

"The appropriations for biological studies, entered in Article 412 of the 1984 budget and amounting to 640,000 ECU, are intended to enable the Commission to obtain, by means of specialized studies commissioned from external bodies or experts, the scientific information needed for the implementation of the policy for the conservation and management of resources."

I am not sure that that work is being done well.

The report states:

"Up to the end of 1984, contracts for biological studies were mainly concluded on the basis of proposals submitted by research institutes in the Member States. These studies should meet needs identified in advance by the Commission and set out in clear and precise terms; this has not been the case up until the financial year in question."

Replying to that criticism, the Commission stated:

"The Commission has decided to introduce a system of checking and, as far as possible, competitive tendering. The requirements will depend on the amounts involved."

In its defence, the Commission stated:

"In the fisheries sector, however, the specialized nature of the studies to be taken plus the geographical constraints severely limits the number of research institutes potentially capable of satisfying the requirements. Consequently, the Commission's choice is inevitably restrictive from the outset."

I believe that that is a weak defence of this poor method of controlling research.

The Commission should take a leaf out of the report by the Comptroller and Auditor General, entitled "Achievements and Costs of the Common Agricultural Policy in the United Kingdom". In regard to the poorly commissioned and inefficiently controlled research studies, it is worth pointing out that paragraph 45 states:

"While recognising the political problems involved in having (and indeed arriving at) precisely defined objectives, it seems to me that if greater attention were concentrated on the settlement of criteria and targets associated with the objectives, the negotiation of cost-effective measures to achieve them would be made easier."

I commend that advice to those who seek to commission research within the European Community.

Paragraph 6 of the White Paper refers to the need for a more co-ordinated system of maritime transport. In paragraph 6.6 we are offered some hope of a more equitable system of cabotage. I suspect that that is a vain hope, given the reluctance of some member states to make any concessions. The Minister of State, with her experience in another Department, will perhaps agree. The British coastal trade suffers badly in this regard. When will there be an improvement in community maritime transport routes and practices?

The importance of the fishing industry cannot be over-emphasised. For many Scottish communities, it is the only industry that can provide employment not only for the present employed generation but for the youngsters who are still at school. In the long run, if it is managed properly and efficiently, it will provide employment and a first-class food for the consumer long after the offshore oil and gas industries have been shut down. The House has an important duty vigilantly to monitor the decisions taken in Brussels on fishing operations in United Kingdom waters.

8.26 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I find debates of this kind somewhat disappointing, because so few hon. Members attend them, yet this debate concerns a matter of great importance to our constituents. It has oscillated frequently between the Euro-fanatics and the Euro-haters. The Government's position is made more difficult by this polarisation.

Legislative and harmonisation programmes and the problems of agriculture, commerce and competition policy are all matters upon which our legislation is firmly hinged on the European Community. People in our manufacturing and service industries are greatly affected, yet so little attention is paid to what is happening all the time behind the scenes.

I am a member of the Select Committee on European Legislation. This afternoon, that Committee had the good fortune to see my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. I thought that it was important to ask him, in relation to his policy on Europe, whether we should adopt a sector by sector approach. The common agricultural policy takes up an enormous proportion of the Community's budget and directly affects farmers, including those in my constituency. I believe that the Government would like to help them, as I would. Farmers are greatly affected by overproduction, but opportunities to make alternative use of the land and to reduce the amount of nitrogen fertiliser used in farming are not being taken up.

It is all very well for us to complain that there is massive overproduction of food, but, in trying genuinely to help the farmers concerned, we should look at what we are doing in the European Community to help them. We should look through the mass of verbiage at the complexities of the market mechanism and consider whether wheat is grown in Duisburg and whether all the other factors are taken into account in determining target and intervention prices. However, when we consider everything, we are really talking about overproduction.

Why is there overproduction? There is overproduction, in part, because, according to the experts, there is too much use of nitrogen fertiliser. Instead of overly concentrating on the elaborate legal framework set up in the Community, we should ask questions, the answers to which will be of practical help to the farmer.

At present the Agriculture Bill is approaching Report. New clause 1 of that Bill includes several useful provisions provided by the Government. They provide that the farmer shall have services and advice available to him. I am sure that farmers will be extremely keen to take up that offer. However, it is no good providing such services and advice if, when farmers ask what they should do about overproduction, there is no opportunity for them to take advantage of alternative use policies because they are constrained by planning requirements from putting the land to alternative use. I urge those responsible in agriculture to consider such practical questions and, through consultation with the Department of the Environment, to find ways and means to alter the planning guidelines which were tagged on to the policies pursued in the mid-1970s. That will enable us to improve the rural economy, provide alternative land uses, such as forestry and tourism, and enable the farmer to maintain his income in practical terms.

I urge that we do not maintain the co-responsibility levy in connection with milk or cereals as is now being proposed by the Commission. I hope that the Minister will fight hard for the British farmer in that respect. I also urge the Minister to keep the beef variable premium scheme for which he fought so successfully last year.

The White Paper covers the question of the internal market and competition law. All of our commercial policy —the rows in the City about mergers, whether the City is ripping people off and the extent to which huge companies are entering into relations with one another and causing difficulties for the small investor and British industry as a whole — is dependent on our applying competition policy effectively. Our competition laws are based on the treaty of Rome. At the eighth European conference on competition law recently, the experts clearly stated that competition policy simply was not working. If that policy is not working and we cannot apply it, it is not surprising that criticisms are levelled against us about the difficulties that are cropping up through mergers and monopolies in the City.

The same problem could arise in connection with financial services. I am a member of the Committee on the Financial Services Bill. We have not so far reached the competition policy provisions in Committee, but they have a direct bearing on how our economy functions. We must recognise that there are problems and consider whether the provisions of the treaty of Rome are working effectively for the benefit of the people of this country.

I tabled a question to the Minister concerned, asking if he would be good enough to examine whether, for example, regulation 17 could be revised. One assumes a glazed expression as soon as the boring and technical subject of regulation 17 is mentioned. I find the whole thing very boring, but the fact is that it is upon such legal principles that so much of our commercial policy operates. There is no point in pretending that problems do not exist. The Civil Service operates upon such regulations and our courts make decisions based on them. In fact, all commercial policy is developed on the basis of such regulations. If they are not working effectively, we must seriously consider how to improve and reform them.

Reference is made to science and technological research in paragraph 5.13 of the White Paper. At the risk of trespassing on a subject in which I have been involved for the past few years, I would ask those concerned to consider whether, under headings such as science and research, policies are being developed and directives formulated on human genetic engineering. In its own way that topic is as important, if not more important, than the atomic bomb. We must consider whether, by developing policies along these lines at European level, we are storing up serious problems, which we will later regret, for ourselves and for future generations.

In connection with external relations, trade and aid, I sincerely hope that the proposals for the new general agreement on tariffs and trade are successful this time round. This matter brings me back to the central theme that I developed on the question of competition policy. I hope that the people responsible for negotiating the GATT will come up with a practical proposal which will deal effectively with the Japanese problem and whether the Japanese are importing a sufficient amount of manufacturing products from other countries.

I have been to Luxembourg and Brussels recently and had the opportunity to discuss overseas development in relation to food aid with people in the European Commission and with the Court of Auditors. I returned very depressed about the poor showing in providing food aid to the countries which needed it during the emergency. I appreciate that there are difficulties and that there are no magic wands. However, when one examines the way the process developed, the Court of Auditors' report is worth reading. The reality is that the European Commission, for some reason or another, did not respond effectively enough. If we place the responsibility for handling such matters in the hands of the people in Brussels, then I hope that they will come up with something rather more effective than occurred on that occasion.

I am not by any means anti-European in terms of political co-operation. One of the mainsprings of the European Community has been a desire to move closer to a sensible degree of political co-operation. By that I emphatically do not mean political integration.

The ideas raised this evening by the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) about majority voting and federalism are extremely dangerous for this House.

Paragraph 13 of the White Paper deals with Parliament, and in two paragraphs it disposes of the work of the two Select Committees on the European Communities. Legislation and harmonisation have an amazingly important impact on how we conduct our affairs in commerce and in industry. There is almost total ignorance of the principles of law upon which these operate. Those responsible for organising the examinations in the Law Society and in other colleges of law should give a higher priority to examinations in European law and legislation. We have been a member of the European Community since 1973, yet these subjects are not even part of the normal curriculum for law students. That is an extraordinary state of affairs, given the impact of that law and legislation on our daily lives.

I wish to touch briefly on the Single European Act, which has been deposited in this House, and the co-operation procedure that will operate under it. The Minister kindly wrote to me when I asked a question about this the other day. I appreciate that the nature of the Act makes it difficult to give a precise answer, but one is left with serious worries about the way in which it will operate in practice and about the apparently significant increase in the powers of the European Parliament which will accrue at the expense of this House. I appreciate that the Council of Ministers can have the final say, but that is not the real world.

In reality, constant accretions of power exercised within the Council, subject to the co-operation procedure as it develops, are gradually whittling away the powers of this House in relation both to scrutiny and to the manner in which legislation is devised. The fact that so few Members are present for this debate shows the difficulty that we face in this respect. When matters of vital concern to our constituencies are debated at a late hour or come before the Select Committee on European Legislation for scrutiny, without in any sense being anti-European we must ask ourselves whether we examine these matters sufficiently carefully to ensure that the system of law being devised is genuinely in the interests of those whom we represent. Is it not possible for those with responsibility in these matters to ensure that the Select Committee is able to consider prospective legislation affecting our constituents at the earlier "avant-project" stage when the working groups of civil servants who go to Brussels are considering these matters?

There is no doubt that under the new procedures a number of things will occur. For example, there will be an increase in the number of matters subject to majority voting, which will undoubtedly reduce the power of individual member states to put a brake on progress. If they are so minded, the other member states can cut short attempts at negotiation and proceed to a vote, and that will have a significant effect on the way in which legislation affecting this House goes through.

It is also clear that, following the accession of Spain and Portugal, the position of the "big four"—France, Germany, Italy and the United Kingdom—has been reduced. Two of those four states will no longer be able to exercise a blocking power and the new Mediterranean bloc of Greece, Italy, Portugal and Spain will be able to exercise a major influence.

The first special report of the Select Committee on European Legislation shows one uncertain element at the centre of the whole question—the extent to which the Luxembourg compromise will operate under the new arrangement. There has been pressure to require member states to identify the very important interests that they seek to protect by invoking the compromise, but none of that appeared on the face of the Single European Act—nor could it do so, because, as the Select Committee pointed out, the compromise is not legally binding. In reality, however, because the compromise currently lies at the root of the way in which voting takes place, which is the basis on which we determine whether to insist on unanimity or go to majority voting, the question of whether the arrangements under the Single European Act will necessarily be in the interests of our constituents is vital.

Finally, although some of us take a pragmatic and, I hope, practical view of progress in the European Community and are in no sense anti-European, we wish to ensure that when legislation goes through this House it is properly scrutinised so that, when we have to answer to our constituents for the decisions taken in their name, we can give reasonable answers to the questions that they reasonably ask about the legislation that goes through. I therefore ask that great care be taken to ensure that the procedures under the Single European Act are truly in the interests of our constituents and that, when making procedural changes in this House, we ensure that the scrutiny procedure really works in a way that is both fair and reasonable to those whom we represent.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The reference to "decisions taken in their name" was one of the most important aspects of the comments of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) because one such decision was taken in the name of the British people when the Minister of State signed the Single European Act on the royal prerogative. I do not think that the hon. Lady is yet a member of the Privy Council, but I make no complaint about that.

I am grateful to the Minister of State for her remarks about the Scrutiny Committee, of which I have the honour to be Chairman, and I apologise for not being present at that time. My absence was perhaps a symptom of things to come, in that it was the timetable of the European Council and of this House which prevented some Members from being present at that time as we were listening to evidence from the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food at a meeting arranged some weeks ago. But more of that anon. The Minister of Agriculture also take decisions for the people of this country, although he and the House have lost control over British agricultural policy—indeed, there is no longer any such policy.

I referred earlier to the prerogative of the Crown. We are now discussing, with other developments in the EEC, an Act which was signed by Her Majesty's Government unwillingly, as the Prime Minister told us when she went to Milan last June. I wonder when a Government last invited the House to ratify a treaty that the Government had signed unwillingly. I can think of no context in which that would have been possible in the past.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: The Anglo-Irish agreement.

Mr. Spearing: That may be true, although there was a majority in the House for it, but the right hon. Gentleman will at least agree that that related to the British Isles and not to mainland Europe.

The assumption about the royal prerogative in signing treaties was, ever since the Labour Government of 1923, that nobody's Government would sign a treaty which could not command the majority of their own party. That was, as it were, taken as read.

When the Ponsonby rules were adumbrated, they said in effect that a treaty would lie on the Table, as a statutory instrument might, for some 40 days. If it was not prayed against or voted against it was deemed to be ratified. The Minister may go into greater detail on this but she and other Ministers have kindly said that our ratification procedure will not be of that type for this particular treaty. It will be subject to further legislation. We can be grateful to that extent. However, the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) was right when he asked in what way we can actually scrutinise the terms of this treaty—which runs to 77 typewritten pages, some not full—and which is legislation by reference and changes the treaty of Rome.

In effect, that means changing the written constitution that exists in the United Kingdom. One might say that there is no written constitution; indeed, that is one of the things which people are taught in history. In practice, however, we know that it is not true. The written constitution of this country consists of a whole number of written documents. I believe that the Standing Orders of this House are one such document and the mysterious documents circulated by Prime Ministers inside the Executive may be another. It also includes a number of other Acts of Parliament such as the Representation of the People Acts, and the Quinquennial Act. These documents are all bound together by a series of understandings, custom and practice. That is our constitution plus the treaty of Rome.

The treaty of Rome is to be substantially amended by the treaty which has been the subject of discussion tonight. As the preamble has not been read this evening, I shall do so:

> "Moved by the will to continue the work undertaken on the basis of the Treaties establishing the European Communities and to transform relations as a whole among their States into a European Union, in accordance with the Solemn Declaration of Stuttgart of 19 June 1983. Resolved to implement this European Union on the basis, firstly, of the Communities operating in accordance with their own rules and, secondly, of European Co-operation among the Signatory States in the sphere of foreign policy and to invest this Union with the necessary means of action".

That is the preamble to the treaty. It is important to study some of the facets because they will make a great deal of difference to how this House keeps track of legislation and other developments which are continually going through the European system.

That system is complex. Many hon. Members present will know that, when listening to informed speeches such as that of my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) it is difficult to follow the labyrinthine constitution which has arisen. Indeed, I would suggest —the Minister may know this for herself—that unless one has been involved with these issues for perhaps the past 10 years and has organically developed with this tangled mass of interlocking growth, it is almost impossible to understand it, no matter how many lectures one might attend.

The greatest change occurs in the way in which legislation is created. It means a change in the scrutiny and oversight of this House, of how Ministers behave or of how, to refer back to the text given by the hon. Member for Stafford, "decisions made in our realm" are carried out and the way Ministers are accountable. The work of the Scrutiny Committee—recently committed to the House —will probably be changed by the changes in the treaty, if they are effective. It is up to the House to decide whether changes in our constitution are made.

The Danish people had a referendum on this matter only six days ago. It is true that they decided—not by a big majority—to go ahead with these changes. However, the referendum showed that there was a major divison of opinion in that country, just as there has been a difference of opinion in Britain on the main question.

Mr. Deakins: Does not a difficulty face any country with a written constitution—how those changes should be put to the Parliament or assembly concerned to represent the opinions of the people? We are faced with a difficulty which does not face countries such as the United States which have a written constitution. In the United States they consider constitutional amendments individually and can discuss them in great detail. In Britain we have to consider amendments en bloc and have no opportunity to consider them in detail; nor are we able to accept this or reject that. We have to accept or reject them all at one stage.

Mr. Spearing: Yes, that is one of the disadvantages of the way in which our constitution has arisen. It is based on an assumption that the Crown would not give away power. It also assumed that nobody would go against the Act of Praemunire—that is to give prior allegiance to another sovereign power. They are the assumptions on which our constitution rests. Thus, in respect of EEC legislation, there are difficulties which have been pointed out by my hon. Friend.

I do not wish to be partisan. It is clear that there are different views about how the EEC should operate. The hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) made it clear that he wants progress towards a United States of Europe. I do not think I am doing him any injustice.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams indicated assent.

Mr. Spearing: Indeed, he nods his assent.

However, that is anathema to other hon. Members. In the discussion of this Act and the changes in the constitution there is a continual difference of emphasis between the people who take those views. I suggest to the Minister that even among people of differing views there is a fundamental common interest, that democracy, whether on a United Kingdom or pan-European level—which the hon. Member for Kensington wishes to see—is effective, efficient and seen to be democratic and is understood by the people whom it seeks to serve. When "decisions" are made in their name, whether at national level or at pan-national level, as with the EEC—it is not federal—they are understood and there is a chain of accountability which commands confidence. That view will bridge all opinions in the House, including the hon. Member for Kensington and even the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston). Public life and democracy demand confidence and transparency. Without them, the quality of democracy falls apart, just as rotting cement will cause a building to fall.

I should like to consider the change in the new article 149. At the moment, the House can examine documents and proposals on a proposal from the Commission, and anything to do with the internal market or harmonisation requires unanimity. As has been said, that will be changed to a qualified majority. We shall therefore get more harmonisation a la the Cockfield Green Paper, and it will come more quickly. Moreover, it will be more difficult for the Government to hold up those proposals if that is to the national advantage.

Of course, there is always the so-called Luxembourg agreement, but I think that the Minister will agree that there are moves afoot—they may be right—to see that it is used in a less liberal way. Perhaps there are written orders. If one uses a dangerous weapon such as that agreement too often in the wrong way, it may become a little blunt. I suspect that we shall have more harmonisaiton, which it will be more difficult to keep track of.

Sir Anthony Meyer: This is all getting very muddling. I assume that the hon. Gentleman is talking about the traditional Luxembourg compromise and not the agreement that was recently reached there.

Mr. Spearing: The hon. Gentleman is quite right. I was referring to the historic non-agreement.

Sir Anthony Meyer: The agreement to disagree.

Mr. Spearing: The second feature of legislative change will be the insertion of a second round for some legislation. Hon. Members will be aware of what can happen. Instead of the Council trying to change a Commission proposal by sending it back, whence it will return in revised form, if the Council does not agree with what the Commission says, having obtained the opinion of the Assembly/Parliament, it has to produce what is called "a common position". That phrase appears in the treaty. The "common position" is passed to the Assembly/ Parliament, which can amend it or reject it by simple majority. If the Commission receives an amended "common position", it puts a new proposal before the Council of Ministers, which can be passed by a qualified majority. If the Assembly/Parliament rejects the "common position", the Council can only insist by unanimity. That means that the House and the Scrutiny Committee will be faced with a second round, which I think I will call a second reading, for some legislation, including that relating to harmonisation and achievement of the internal market, which has aroused some of the greatest controversy.

The Select Committee said in its report that there could be difficulties, as there might be more, longer and possibly more acrimonious debates in the House. Moreover, the decisions might be more difficult for the Government as the pace of harmonisation could well increase. There might not be a single proposal. We all know that, in the EEC—I shall not say that it does not happen elsewhere—there is linkage to produce a package proposition. One considers the whole and cannot distinguish between the parts. That is one of the least satisfactory features of what is going on.

If the EEC is to work properly in the next two or three years, we want proper partnership and co-operation. I am anxious to carry the hon. Member for Kensington with me. One of the distinguishing features of a healthy and proper partnerhip is that one of the partners can say no, knowing that it will not be penalised. I am afraid that, as I understand it, all too often in EEC affairs a partner says no at its peril, whatever the merits of the issue.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Is not the great danger that some other member will say no and that Britain will be penalised? We need progress with the Community. If other member states can block it, we may suffer the worst.

Mr. Spearing: The hon. Gentleman may be correct. However, there is an opportunity for blocking—it will be reduced to some extent; although some people believe that a reduction in the power to block is progress, other people take a different view—which I think is one of the inherent problems in the EEC. Its ambitions in terms of integrated Common Market harmonisation, whatever their merits, are so politically ambitious when one is faced with the vested interests, proper or improper, spoken or unspoken, which will prevent that, the whole machinery, good or bad, falls into disrepute.

I suggest that we shall see a new phase in the life of the EEC if this treaty is agreed. It will make life more difficult for this House, particularly in keeping up with legislation, because there will be more of it, it will move faster and it will be further away from the control of this House, and therefore from the people. I will not dwell on this at length, but that includes the creation of what some people will dub a European foreign office, which is now a treaty obligation.

There will be an obligation for consultation at every level and an obligation to have an EEC party group, if I can put it like that, inside every international organisation or conference where members of the Community are present in any number.

Therefore, we will find that most of the features on which we have prided ourselves through the ages, such as being a sine qua non of a Parliament and parliamentary democracy, will be diminished. We know that those features are legislation—the power to appoint judges, the power to tax and the power to control expenditure. There are other criteria but those are the primary ones. In respect of legislation, we know that we will now share it more and more and, for the first time, an Assembly which is not of this country will have a hand in originating legislation which then becomes binding on every citizen.

We know only too well from some dramatic examples in the past fortnight and exchanges across the Floor of the House, indeed even in statements from the Government, that the ruling of the European Court, whatever its merits, will be of increasing importance in this country. We know that our own courts have increasingly, formally or otherwise, to refer cases to the court of the EEC.

We still have, just about, the power to determine maximum levels of taxation—1·4 per cent. of VAT and so on. However, I suggest that we have largely lost control of the EEC's expenditure. It is true that we may not be too great on that inside the United Kingdom, but the Government are accountable and may be broken by the House. Therefore, when we passed greater powers of taxation to the EEC we did it, did we not, on the understanding that there was budgetary discipline? Some hon. Members have already said tonight that all the signs are that it will not bite in the year when we thought it was going to bite. It is becoming increasingly clear that in 1986 there will not be the budgetary discipline which the House was promised as one of the conditions of its voting extra money.

Therefore, if all those factors come together and if the House approves the Single European Act, we will be in a completely new phase of the EEC where it will accelerate and widen the ambit of its competence, not only to help the environment and other things of that sort, but in terms of a European foreign policy.

About 12 years ago, at the time of the great debate on the subject, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) said that the position of the Queen would not be affected. I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman understood some of the basic constitutional principles on which the country has evolved. That is perhaps a charitable view, and it may be a startling view for someone who was then Prime Minister of our country. The position of the Queen, or the monarch, was not affected as much as the position of the Crown by the decision in 1973. It will be further affected if the Single European Act is approved by the House. Until that date, it was the Crown, in one form or another, which approved legislation, appointed the courts, and, in Parliament, was the highest point of appeal in the House of Lords. It also decided the level revenue of taxation.

That was not so on 1 January 1973. The power of the Crown in those matters, and so the power of the British people themselves, was diminished. I suggest to the House that if the Single European Act is ratified, it will be diminished further.

9.11 pm

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): I join my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) and the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) in congratulating and adding my welcome to the Minister of State, who has joined our debates as well as the foreign affairs Front Bench team. I was going to say that the British motorists' loss was the Europeans' gain, but I thought that it might be taken the wrong way, so I shall confine myself to welcoming the hon. Lady.

In my reply I shall have some difficulty in living up to the billing given to me by my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, but I shall do my best, because, unlike the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), who was a bit disparaging about the debate, I thought that it was unexpectedly interesting in several ways, and quite worth while. I was not expecting some of the comments and contributions that we have had. I accept that it has not been an exciting debate, but it has been interesting.

I should like to ask the Minister some questions. I hope that I shall receive some answers tonight, but, realising that this is a complicated issue, I shall understand if I do not. The Minister and I are becoming regular correspondents—[Interruption.] "Letter writers" might be a better phrase to use. Perhaps we can continue our letter writing on the points that the hon. Lady cannot answer tonight.

In the short time available to me, I hope to get down to the essentials of these complex matters. I sometimes think that the jargon, the Eurospeak and the gobbledegook that surround this area are designed as deliberate obfuscation by the Eurocrats, so that we know little about what is happening, and so that they can get on with things, and we remain without knowledge and understanding of what they are up to. I think that some of them like to keep the public and Parliament in ignorance of what is going on in the Community. I hope that part of our job is to try to sweep that away.

The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), as usual, made some excellent points about the Single European Act. We now understand why it is called that. It is not a singular sensation for the House. However, it would be helpful for us to know how the Act will be considered by the House. I know that to some extent that is a matter for the usual channels and the Leader of the House, but obviously the Foreign Office is involved. When will we get it? Many Conservative Members, some of whom have not been here today, are anxious to know. The Minister said that it would be within three months. That is a fair leeway. I hope that it will be in the earlier part of that period. When we get it, what will the procedure be for its consideration? It is important to know whether we can amend it.

Many comments have been made about the useful report from the Scrutiny Committee. I should like to pay tribute here, as I do informally on other occasions, to my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) for the work that he does. He is extremely valuable to my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton and myself.

The major point that I want to make is to endorse on behalf of the Opposition the recommendations in the report on the need for greater parliamentary scrutiny of all the matters that come to us from Europe. As the hon. Member for Stafford said, whether they have been traditionally pro-European or anti-European, all hon. Members are anxious for greater accountability. Even in 1984 the Scrutiny Committee said that scrutiny was inadequate. It is clear from the present report that there will be more proposals to be examined. Because of majority voting, the House will have to debate major issues much earlier than it did in the past, and the British Government will not be able to hold up decisions of the Council of Ministers pending a debate in the House. For those reasons, scrutiny becomes even more important.

Even in 1984 the report of the Scrutiny Committee was already critical of the Government's attitude to scrutiny. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton said, it pointed to major changes which had been agreed by the Council of Ministers before we had had the opportunity to debate them. I am thinking, for example, of ESPRIT and of the new arrangements for the regional development fund. Both those who are for and those who are against Europe think that it is wrong that changes should be made before we have had an opportunity to discuss them.

I hazard a guess that the United Kingdom is among the poorest, if it is not the worst, of the European Parliaments in its arrangements for scrutiny. It has already been said that within this Parliament the House of Lords does a better job than we do. The House of Commons is woefully inadequate in carrying out scrutiny. My hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton said that I would try to put forward proposals. I shall not go that far, but I shall suggest some points which may be taken into account by the Government, especially as they have said that they will accept the Opposition amendment.

Statements to the House after meetings of Ministers have to be drawn from the Government like rotten teeth. My hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton is on the telephone regularly to the Foreign Office asking for statements. I am referring not just to Foreign Affairs Council meetings but to important meetings of the Energy Council and the Environment Council. When matters of importance are on the agenda when decisions are being made or when consideration is undertaken on our behalf, it should be a natural course to have regular reports to the House. If that means that time for other debates is squeezed, consideration must be given to another way of dealing with the statements. I shall come in a moment to the suggestion of a Grand Committee—

Mr. Deakins: Does my hon. Friend agree that, in addition to having more oral statements, we should revert to the procedure whereby there was a separate slot of 20 minutes in Foreign Office Question Time for oral questions on European Community matters?

Mr. Foulkes: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for mentioning that. That was to be my fourth point but I shall deal with it now.

I do not want to criticise anyone. We ought to look at the arrangements for European questions, but we should do so without taking any time away from foreign affairs. Today, for example, questions were raised about South Africa, the middle east and the Falkland Islands, and an hour a month is not a great deal of time. We should therefore consider the possibility of having a separate Question Time for European matters, because today there were no questions at all on the EEC.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will recall that when we did have EEC questions hon. Members were allowed to table only questions that related directly to the Foreign Office, whereas one wanted to table questions relating to all European activities. That was the great defect of that 20-minute slot.

Mr. Foulkes: I accept that. That is why I said that I would have difficulty in living up to my billing. I am not trying to be definitive. I am merely trying to point to the way in which the Government ought to examine this matter.

Sir Russell Johnston: I thought that the Labour party was active in taking Europe out of foreign affairs questions. In the negotiations, I was certainly opposed to the idea.

Mr. Foulkes: It was agreed as an experiment, and I am sure the hon. Gentleman agrees that foreign affairs questions require a lot of time. The subject covers the whole world, and quite often certain issues are not covered.

Our one Scrutiny Committee is overwhelmed by paper. I do not criticise it in any way, because it does a marvellous job. Perhaps we should look at the House of Lords or at the possibility of having more Scrutiny Committees.

There is also the possibility of setting up a European Grand Committee, which might have a separate Question Time, to deal with statements and consider European business. I know that there are problems about that, and I am not advocating it. I am merely saying that these are some of the things at which the Government should be looking.

I also hope that we will look at other national Parliaments in Europe. I think that we can learn from our European partners and from their parliamentary set-ups. Having accepted the amendment, I hope that the Minister will tell us how the Government will consider this matter, and how Parliament will be allowed to consider any report that they make.

Having dealt with scrutiny as a principle, let me refer to some of the issues that we are scrutinising today. The Government keep stressing the blue-eyed concept of the internal market, about which they seem to be star struck, but the implications have not been spelt out. This is a very important development, but the House has not had the opportunity of dealing with it.

There is the proposed common market in banking and insurance and the liberalisation of financial services. What does that mean in relation to control over the City and Lloyd's? There will also be changes in public procurement policies. What does that mean in terms of safeguarding United Kingdom industries? There will be European directives on radio and television—not, I hasten to add, that that will mean "Coronation Strasse" for the Germans —[Interruption.] I thought that hon. Members might moan at that. The development of satellites raises some very important matters. What effect will that have on the Bill of the hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill)? There will also be the harmonisation of competition policy, including mergers. What effect will that have on the current merger mania that is under way in the City?

I have tried to obtain some answers from the Government. I tabled a question to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry asking about the effects of the European internal market on the structure of British industry, the level of employment in the United Kingdom, the level of British exports to the EEC, the level of British imports from the EEC, the balance of payments and the rate of growth of the British economy. That gave the Minister for Trade an ideal opportunity to spell out what the internal market means. He said:

"Progress towards completing the internal market will be one of a number of factors influencing the development of the British economy. In general, removing barriers to trade within the Community should further increase our trade with other member states and reduce costs to business. It should, therefore, help to stimulate increased efficiency in the use of resources and accordingly encourage growth of the economy." —[Official Report, 24 February 1986; Vol. 92. c. 422.]

Where have we heard that before? It is not an answer to the question. I hope that the Minister will make the position clear.

The Government's views, as we understand them, seem to differ from those of other countries, which believe that the international market will require harmonisation of VAT, which causes us great anxiety. Does it mean that? The Minister shakes her head, but Jacques Delors, Lord Cockfield, and others seem to think that. Why cannot we have a White Paper on the effects of some of the proposals? We get parliamentary papers of one kind and another on less important issues, yet these matters are not spelt out for Parliament and the people.

Another area for scrutiny is the budget and its overrun. During the six-month period that we are considering, a supplement of £120 million was requested, as my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) will remember. We had to agree to pay our share of a £1·1 billion non-refundable advance. Soon the Community will run out of euphemisms for the money that it keeps asking us for. Although the limits on agricultural spending for 1986 were agreed only in June 1985 and the new budgetary discipline — that sounds good and rigid — was to be invoked in 1986, in the first year of their operation agricultural expenditure will break the limits. Yet the Government said that the great control was a major achievement and would be effective. Indeed, they said that they had agreed to the increase in own resources only because there was to be effective control and, preferably, legally binding control. They have now forgotten that, and the ceiling has been broken in the first year.

In The Scotsman recently, Mr. Andriessen, the farm Commissioner, is quoted as saying that surpluses are a time bomb. The headline was:

"EEC may seek £450 million supplement to budget."

The Council spokesman, Mr. Junker, said in December that there would be a supplementary budget by the end of the year. May we have a categorical assurance from the Government that they will make no further requests for loans, non-refundable advances, or whatever they are called? The Minister must answer that question, which Labour Members have asked previously. We have the discipline, and if it is effective, there is no need for additional funds. Indeed, if it is effective, the Ministers should be using it to effect and we should have no further requests.

We in the Labour party are demanding fundamental reform of the common agricultural policy. Price freezing is not enough, as Mr. Andriessen has made clear. The system itself must change. We must have an end to a system which allows the EC to dump subsidised produce on world markets, causing great harm to developing countries. The latest inequity is dumping under-priced sugar in Jamaica. The EC is undermining the economies of Third world countries and making it more difficult for them to pay their debts.

I have been fairly critical of some areas, but I should like to welcome one aspect. Perhaps some of my hon. Friends will disagree with me, but if they consider the matter and understand fully the implications, they should welcome co-operation on foreign policy. But we must know how the secretariat will operate and where it will be sited. I understand that it will move with the presidency. We would welcome joint foreign policy co-operation if it meant more effective co-operation on South Africa and if it forced the Government to impose stronger sanctions on South Africa, as our European partners wish. We would welcome it if it meant that the European Governments could persuade the British Government to join the condemnation of American aid to the Contras in Central America. Indeed, Congress is considering further aid to the Contras to undermine the duly elected Nicaraguan Government.

Finally, I should mention the "people's Europe". The people who I meet in Dalmellington high street do not think that the internal market is a major priority. They do not talk much about it when I meet them on the street. They do not say how marvellous it would be if United Kingdom banks and insurance companies could sell their wares to other European countries. However, they are worried about unemployment. In my constituency there is 28 per cent. unemployment. In the Community 14 million people are unemployed — nearly half of them young people — and their despair, despondency and anxiety cannot properly be understood by anyone in the House. School leavers have a less than 50 per cent. chance of obtaining jobs, although, to give it credit, the Commission is proposing joint reflation.

Will the Government take the opportunity of their presidency starting on 1 July to advance a strategy of co-operative growth to reduce unemployment? Will they give more money to ESPRIT, EUREKA, the social fund and the regional fund, which would also help to reduce unemployment? The Minister will not give us that answer tonight. I assure the House that, after the next election, when the Labour party is returned to office, we shall use the mechanisms of the Community to ensure joint reflation among the increasingly Socialist Governments of Europe. Our priority will be a reduction of the appalling unemployment.

9.32 pm

Mrs. Chalker: With the leave of the House, I thank hon. Members for their kind remarks and for their welcome to this maze of a Community debate. It has been a long debate covering more than the documents before us. There were many ideas and misconceptions, and I am sorry that I shall be unable to comment on everything that has been said in more than five hours of detailed debate, with questions from hon. Members on both sides of the House. A few moments ago, I thought that the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) wanted, instead of a system of filibustering, a system of Eurobustering. That might be even less workable than the unsatisfactory system that we have now, but which we are trying to change for the better.

We have heard three sorts of contributions to the debate. Some hon. Members were highly critical, and we share some of their criticisms. Others were anxious, and some were forward-looking. My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) made some especially ambitious remarks. I should make two general points to those who were highly critical and anxious. In 1972, the House decided to join the Community. In 1975, the Labour Government conducted a referendum in which that decision was endorsed. Since then, we have been through a difficult process of accession — the most recent being that of Spain and Portugal. With two major allies making the decision to join us, we know that they, like us, consider the economic and political growth of the EC to be tremendously important.

Of course, there are problems with the essential workings of the Community. There is no way in which a Community of 10 or 12 would not have such problems, and we shall not be satisfied until we achieve better working methods and better scrutiny, as I have already told the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), whose Select Committee has done such a good job.

Over a long time we have frequently experienced irrational results, but that must not mean that when things go wrong we should sit back and refuse to look at possible solutions to making the European Community a better and more workable institution. The length of time that it takes to consider many parts of European business is a problem. Coming to this matter from the Department of Transport, I am reminded of the average timetable from the inception of a road to putting the first vehicles on it, which is 13 years. There have been long-drawn out considerations but now, having had progress bedevilled for many years and after hard work in a number of Committees in past years, we have the Single European Act, which is an important step forward.

I shall try to go through the fears and anxieties expressed by a number of hon. Members, because I understand some of them. Other hon. Members have been more positive. I listened to the speech of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), as always, with respect. He is an authority on constitutional law, but I fear that his obsession with a narrow interpretation of national sovereignty is misguided. Every international treaty can be interpreted as a diminution of national power, in so far as it limits freedom of independent action, yet, inevitably and rightly, we have entered into treaties because we believed that the benefits of combined action at international level outweighed the theoretical limitations on our sovereignty. NATO is one such example, and political co-operation is another. We live in an international world, not a national environment that automatically seeks and abides by boundaries. The Single European Act acknowledges and gives form to the excellent and useful practices that have developed.

The hon. Member for Newham, South said that we were asking the House to approve an agreement that the Government had signed unwillingly. He rightly pointed out that in Milan we argued against an intergovernmental conference because we believed that the improvements that all member states recognised to be necessary could be achieved by other means. But once the decision was taken to hold a conference, the Government's main concern was to ensure that the outcome was one with which we could willingly agree. That is what happened, and that is why, on 17 February, I signed the initial stage in the process.

I have been asked about the nature of the legislation that follows from the Twelve having signed this agreement. The House will have a formal presentation—not going through on the nod—and a full opportunity to debate the matter. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary made clear in the House several weeks ago, we shall introduce a Bill to amend the European Communities Act. The issues raised by hon. Members tonight can be aired on Second Reading and no doubt in Committee, on Report and on Third Reading.

Mr. Foulkes: When?

Mrs. Chalker: I wish that I knew the date on which the Bill will be introduced, for it would make my diary planning easier. I can say that it will come up within the next three months. The Bill will then pass on to the House of Lords.

The right hon. Member for South Down misunderstood what I said in my opening remarks about the co-operation procedure involving the European Parliament. There are no circumstances in which the European Parliament can cause decisions to be taken by a qualified majority that would otherwise be taken by unanimity. It is true that if the Commission incorporates amendments to its proposals, they can be further amended only by unanimity. That, however, is a feature of the existing provisions of the treaty, under article 149. So no change in the existing constitutional balance is involved.

The hon. Member for Newham, South asked about the extension of European Community competence on foreign policy. The treaty provisions in the sphere of foreign policy are entirely separate from Community treaties. There is no extension of Community competence. The treaty leaves us free to maintain, where necessary, a separate position. That we shall do, where necessary.

The hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) asked whether there would be further intergovernmental agreements. He knows that this is an own resource decision. It neither provides for nor excludes further intergovernmental agreements. Such an agreement would be proposed only if the 1·4 per cent. value added tax ceiling were found to be inadequate to meet proposed expenditure. That is not the position now. Unanimity in the Council would be required if a proposal for an intergovernmental agreement were to be put forward. We could not proceed without it.

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Chalker: I apologise to my right hon. Friend, but I have many questions to answer.

Mr. Higgins: Could my hon. Friend just confirm——

Mrs. Chalker: No, I shall not give way, because the time in which I can respond to all the points that have been made in this debate has been very severely clipped.

I was asked about the breach of financial guidelines. The 1986 budget is within the financial guidelines. However, recent developments, particularly the decline in the dollar-ecu rate, have led the Commission to say that it will need to seek a provision within the supplementary budget, which will be needed later this year anyway to cater for the expected increase in the United Kingdom's abatement. If we cannot get our abatement without a supplementary budget, then, for the sake of Britain, I am in favour of a supplementary budget. It depends upon the outcome of the price fixing. It would be idle to pretend that we can insulate ourselves from the effects of exchange rate movements. That is not possible.

The hon. Member for Walthamstow also asked about the budgetary powers of the European Parliament. Since the call-up of revenue in the Community is the product of expenditure decisions, the actions of the European Parliament have revenue implications. One cannot get away from that; we are dealing with the two sides of the balance. That is one of the reasons why the Council has decided to take the European Parliament to the European Court of Justice. The point is therefore covered in the Council's challenge. Our national case is that we are challenging the European Parliament's power unilaterally to set the level of the budget as a whole. Other nations are doing the same. I shall look at what the hon. Gentleman said about taking up the matter in another way.

The hon. Member for Walthamstow also suggested that we should give consideration to a preliminary ruling from the European Court of Justice under article 177 about the validity of the European Parliament's actions. I shall need to check that, but I understand that article 177 allows for preliminary rulings on points of European Community law that are raised in proceedings before national courts, not before the European Court of Justice. If that is the case, the proper way for us to challenge the European Parliament's decision is by direct action in the European Court of Justice. That is exactly what we are doing.

Several hon. Members referred to the budget. Of course we are concerned about the cost of the budget. However, it is unrealistic to expect there to be no net cost for member states such as Britain, which has an above average gross domestic product. We should expect to contribute to policies from which we benefit. Whereas, before Fontainebleau, we contributed at a level which did not reflect our relative prosperity, our contribution has now been established on a fair basis. Following Fontainebleau, the Federal Republic of Germany makes a net contribution three times as high as ours and France's net contribution is broadly on a par with ours. As a result of the two thirds abatement that was agreed at Fontainebleau, the rebate that we receive from the Community has doubled in two years from £440 million in 1984 to £605 million in 1985, and the estimate is that it will be £900 million, or more, in 1986.

In view of the remarks that have been made tonight, and also because I believe it to be vital, I need to address a fundamental problem that underlies so many of the Community's anxieties — the common agricultural policy. No one disputes the contention of several hon. Members that the costs of the CAP are too high. What is questionable is whether some of the simple solutions that have been suggested would have the effects that have been claimed for them.

The recent report of the Public Accounts Committee, House of Commons Paper No. 71, rightly pointed out that the objectives of the CAP are broadly the same as those of the Agriculture Act 1947 passed under the then Labour Government. The balance between achieving security of supply and reasonable prices to consumers has always been difficult to achieve, and the faults of the CAP are reproduced in most national schemes — not simply in Europe, but in other parts of the world as well.

There is no magic solution, save to those who would offer no support for agriculture, thereby putting at risk the security of supply, the working population involved in agriculture and the 80 per cent. of our land mass which is rural. The Community has not funked the issue of reform. Again, as the Public Accounts Committee reported, over the past four or five price fixings the price of wheat has been reduced in real terms by about 12 per cent. What makes the achievement of reforms at once necessary and difficult is the fact that technological improvements have led to a parallel growth in productivity. I shall be looking at the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) who was obviously concerned about the productivity from the land today.

We cannot duck the fact that farmers have benefited from technological change, particularly in the cereal sector where one quarter of the surplus stocks in intervention are accounted for by United Kingdom production. We need no sudden about turns, but a sustained programme of reform. As a result of the Government's policies, we have achieved price reductions in real terms in six out of the last seven price fixings.

This year the Commission's price proposals are for a 4·1 per cent. reduction in real terms which, with its other reform measures, amount to savings of 408 million ecu in 1986 and 786 million ecu in 1987. That would be equivalent to a real terms price reduction of 7 per cent., and that is the direction in which we should be going.

The hon. Member for Walthamstow asked about the use of the German veto on the CAP and subsequent action by the Commission. There was no question of the Commission unilaterally implementing price cuts. Based on its own powers, the Commission managed the market arrangements and the timing of the intervention arrangements to achieve savings in costs, particularly in cereals. That is completely within its powers. I should have thought that the savings in costs were exactly what hon. Members wanted. Therefore, if it was possible by management, we should not decry it.

The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) was worried about European Community White Paper debates. White Papers on Community developments have been a regular six-monthly feature since 1974. Debates on them in the House are usually held within three months of publication, but on this occasion that was not possible. The White Paper before us, as everyone knows, was published in September, but at the end of last year the House gave its attention to several major Community matters, including European Community Finance Bills and various EC budget documents, as well as the European Communities (Spanish and Portuguese Accession) Bill. That was all in the last two months of 1985.

Against that background I hope that hon. Members will agree that there was no lack of opportunity, but I assure Labour Members that I will do my level best to persuade my right hon. Friends that we should have debates within a reasonable time.

The hon. Member for Hamilton also asked about a White Paper on the projected benefits and implications of the internal market. It has not been the practice to publish White Papers on such matters. The proposals have been made available to the House and we have had several opportunities to debate them. However, it would be pointless to keep publishing projections. That is the sort of thing that centralised economies go in for. The hon. Gentleman gave us an interesting example earlier in the day when he told us that he had had a five-hour briefing in Moscow from President Gorbachev. We prefer results to hypotheses. It is clear to us that the liberalisation of the European market will be of benefit in its impact on jobs and prosperity.

Several comments were made on the need for a co-operative growth strategy. The Government's policies have led to the creation of more jobs than in any other European Community member state. We have a common strategy for growth. All the Heads of Government—Socialist as well as Conservative and other Governments—have agreed that jobs and prosperity can come about only by the continuation of the type of policies that we and all other European Community Governments are pressing. It is only the Labour party that has a different view—different even from its fellow Socialists in Europe. It is the only one that is out of step.

I want the benefits of the European internal market to be brought to the ordinary people of Britain. The Opposition are out of touch if they continue to claim that it is irrelevant to try to achieve a reduction in barriers to trade and an internal market. We have achieved cheaper air fares for travellers. In the first year of the United Kingdom-Netherlands air agreement, we had 10 new services, a 16 per cent. increase in traffic growth between London and Amsterdam and 70,000 extra passengers who would not otherwise have travelled. The pattern is exactly the same between the United Kingdom and the Federal Republic of Germany.

We have opened new markets for British goods and services. We are doing away with the barriers and the delays which cost the United Kingdom and the rest of the Community £6 billion a year. We intend to create the prosperity and the jobs that a single large market can bring. The Opposition claim to see no connection between a single internal market and new employment in Europe. The connection is there. It is obvious and crucial. We shall continue to ensure that it works to the benefit of people seeking employment in Britain, because that is what the liberalisation of the internal market is all about.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) asked whether we would make progress on maritime cabotage. That is probably a strange subject for many of my colleagues. I am happy to tell the hon. Gentleman that we are making real progesss. A package of measures to liberalise maritime transporting, including cabotage, is now before the Council. The Dutch presidency is pressing hard, and we shall continue to make this an important part of our work in the second half of this year. As time is short, I shall write to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow about fisheries.

The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochabar (Sir R. Johnston) asked about the regional fund and the abolition of non-quota measures. As I think he is already aware, the regional fund will make allowance for a quota range as well as for the Community programme. We believe that we shall have every opportunity to be a substantial beneficiary, as in the past. I remind the House that, in 1985, the United Kingdom received nearly 24 per cent. of the fund. We have not been doing badly, and we intend to continue to do our best to get that which is due.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford asked about the new GATT round. I very much share his view on the importance of the new round. Preparations are under way in Geneva. I believe that it is important that we reach agreement on the outstanding issues to enable the launch of the new round at the next GATT ministerial meeting in September. We are taking a positive attitude to the GATT round, and I hope that other member states will take a similar attitude.

Many hon. Members raised the issue of the scrutiny procedures. We are well aware of the unsatisfactory nature of the arrangements which have been pointed out by the hon. Member for Newham, South, who is Chairman of the Select Committee on European Legislation. The Select Committee considered the operation of the arrangements in 1984. That was spelt out in House of Commons Report No. 527. The Select Committee concluded that the Government should make greater efforts to ensure that debates on European Community documents were held in good time. We revised our guidelines in August 1985 with the aim of ensuring that debates should, as a rule, take place as soon as possible after the Committee makes a recommendation. We are committed to doing everything possible to make the new scrutiny procedure work effectively. I should like to examine the Select Committee report. We must work within the new guidelines already accepted and consider other suggestions in the Select Committee's report.

It is sometimes very difficult to strike the right balance between debating a proposal at a very early stage, with the risk that it may be amended out of all recognition by the time that it goes to the Council of Ministers, and debating it late in the day when the debate may have to be hurried through at the eleventh hour. I give the hon. Member for Newham, South an undertaking that we will do our best to have the debate at the right time.

I should like to give further consideration to the suggestion about a Grand Committee. I do not believe that the House wishes to weigh itself down with yet more detailed debates, as some hon. Members already complain about the verbosity of other hon. Members on occasions when we discuss procedure.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw), who unfortunately could not stay this evening as he had a prior engagement, made a number of remarks about political co-operation. It is helpful to be in firm political combination with our partners in Europe, as we have shown in the past two months in the statement on terrorism and the influence that Europe is having on the South African issue. My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud spoke about Ethiopia, and the views he expressed about resettlement are shared by the Government. I am glad to say that they are also shared by many of our partners in the Twelve.

Matters are frequently discussed and views exchanged. I am grateful for the welcome given by the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley to the political co-operation part of the Single European Act.

It would be impossible to recount all the matters which have produced the present position. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's report, "Europe: the Future", is important, and we stand by it. It is positive and realistic. Equally, we have few reservations about the Dooge report. I pay tribute to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind), now Secretary of State for Scotland, for all that he did to bring that about and to ensure that Britain's views were thoroughly and well known by our European partners.

I should now like to emphasise the importance of the second six months of this year. We have heard both negative and positive comments tonight. I hope that we can cease living in the past, wake up to the present and start working for a positive future. Although some hon. Members may not be reconciled to EEC membership, the negative comments and that lack of reconciliation have more to do with nostalgia than a realistic assessment of United Kingdom interest in many of the matters we have discussed.

We need the unity of the European market if our economy is to be competitive enough to provide prosperity and jobs. We need the strength of a united western Europe if collectively we are to counter Soviet foreign policy. We must also meet the commercial challenge of the United States and Japan rather than try to hang on as national champions. We need unity to fend off the growing threat of protectionism from whatever source.

The Community has achieved many things in the past few years. Some things, like Fontainebleau and the effective start of agricultural reform, are well known. Others, less well known, are none the less important to our prosperity. I was glad that the Community's research programme was mentioned by a number of hon. Members tonight, including research into information technology.

Environmental decisions are another important feature. These include exhaust emissions which protect the environment and preserve the unity of a single market. There has been a breakthrough on standards by the adoption of the 15 directives which had long been blocked, and agreements on future mutual recognition of standards. I mention toy safety because for many people that has been a major issue. How many families in this country do not have small children for whom they wish to buy a toy at Christmas?

There are many other areas in which we shall be working with our European partners. There are many objectives to be gained as well as interests to be defended. We shall do our best to achieve those objectives and to defend the interests of the United Kingdom and of the Community as a whole.

Amendment agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of the White Paper on Developments in the European Community January to June 1985 (Cmnd. 9627) and of European Community Document No. 8616/85, the Commission's opinion on the Proposal for Amendments to the EEC Treaty and, noting the First Special Report of the Select Committee on European Legislation (Session 1985-86), calls on the Government to undertake to co-operate in improved procedures so that the House can effectively scrutinise proposals under the Treaties as they would be amended by the Single European Act.'.

10 pm

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Peter Brooke): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of the Annual Report of the European Court of Auditors on the financial year 1984, together with the replies of the Institutions, and supports the Government's efforts to ensure implementation of the Court's recommendations where these would improve the Community's financial procedures.

The annual debate on the Court of Auditors report offers a valuable opportunity for the House to discuss expenditure planning and control within the Community. Our discussion tonight will be much helped by the lucid report from the Select Committee on European Legislation, which highlights important themes from the court's report, and I pay tribute to the Committee's work.

The role of the Court of Auditors report in the Community's budgetary procedure is set out in the explanatory memorandum which I submitted to the House on 17 January. As the House will recall, one of the functions of the European Parliament, after advice from the Council of Ministers, is to grant a discharge each year to the Commission in respect of the implementation of the Community budget. The Court of Auditors report is the main document which the Council takes into account when making its recommendations to the Parliament.

Last year, at the request of the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, the ECOFIN Council discussed the court's annual report for the first time. That report related to the 1983 budget. This year, at the meeting arranged for 10 March, the ECOFIN Council will discuss the court's report on the 1984 budget. For the first time, the president of the court will attend to present the report. These arrangements for discussion in the ECOFIN Council are a sign of the importance which the Council now attaches to the work of the Court of Auditors.

As the Select Committee acknowledges in its report, the court has a formidable task. The United Kingdom has always strongly supported the court's efforts to improve financial control in the Community and welcomes the Commission's statement in part 2 of the report that many of the court's recommendations are already being carried out. There is, however, no room for complacency. The latest report provides ample evidence that further improvement is both possible and necessary.

I do not propose to discuss the court's detailed recommendations. It may, however, be helpful to the House if I draw attention to half a dozen areas in which the Government warmly support what the court has said, and to a couple of issues of budgetary procedure on which we respectfully beg to differ.

First, we strongly support what the court has to say about the overhang of past commitments, notably in the structural funds. The court notes that outstanding commitments increased again in 1984. It is evident, as the court says, that a better balance has to be struck between payments and commitments, within the framework of the budget discipline arrangements. The Community needs to cut back on new commitments so as to leave sufficient room for meeting inescapable commitments from the past. In the Budget Council disussions on the 1986 Community budget, the United Kingdom strongly opposed the provision of additional budgetry resources outside budgetary discipline limits to deal with the so-called "cost of the past."

Secondly, the court has recommended that the commission should improve the accuracy of its revenue and expenditure forecasts with a view, among other things, to reducing the number of expenditure appropriations which turn out to be in excess of need. A related recommendation is that the Commission should give more attention to multi-annual forecasting of revenue and expenditure. These recommendations, too, the United Kingdom strongly supports.

Thirdly, the court makes the telling point that functions should be carried out at Community rather than national level only if benefits are likely to be superior to national programmes of a similar cast. this again echoes arguments which the United Kingdom has put forward on many occasions.

Fourthly, the court has paid special attention, as in previous years, to the administration of development co-operation and food aid. The report highlights the continuing difficulties of delivery and timing. It is a matter of concern that, as we suspected, emergency food aid was not arriving significantly faster in 1984 than non-emergency aid. In 1985, by using flexible procedures outside its normal food aid arrangements, the Community was able to arrange swift deliveries of food to the African countries worst affected by famine. We have left the Commission in no doubt that the current review of food aid procedures must produce arrangements which are more responsive to emergency needs.

Fifthly, the court is critical, rightly in our view, of some aspects of the administration of the European development funds. There is still some way to go. In the light of previous Court of Auditors' reports, however, the United Kingdom has succeeded in obtaining agreement to some useful changes. The Commission will now introduce a more systematic method for forecasting contributions by member states, together with procedures to avoid accumulation of excessive balances. It has also brought forward proposals to charge interest on late payments by member states.

The court also draws attention to the problem of fraud and irregularities in the agricultural guarantee section of the budget. The Government take a serious view of this matter. We are concerned to ensure that all reasonable steps are taken to prevent fraud and to ensure that any fraud which does occur is promptly identified and dealt with.

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): My hon. Friend said that the Government hope that there would be a better balance between revenue and expenditure. It is not clear from the Court of Auditors' report that the treaty requires that there should be an exact balance between the two? Do the Government agree with that view?

Mr. Brooke: Clearly there should be a balance between revenue and expenditure. If the budget is drawn up and the Commission asks us to pay a contribution towards that budget under the usual procedure, there may be occasions when, although expenditure is allowed for in the budget, it is not actually spent. That is what I think my right hon. Friend was referring to.

Mr. Higgins: I was thinking in the other direction, namely, when expenditure appears to exceed revenue. Does my hon. Friend agree that that situation is not allowed under the treaty?

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend has anticipated the issue relating to the Court of Auditors' comment. I was intending to deal with that as one of the issues on which we disagree with the court.

There are two matters of budgetary procedure on which the Government do not agree with the Court's recommendations. The first concerns the legality of the intergovernmental agreement for 1984 the court argues that, by using this agreement to provide some 1 billion ecu to finance inescapable financial commitments in 1984, member states failed to fulfil their treaty obligation to ensure that revenue and expenditure balance.

As explained in a memorandum which the Treasury submitted to the Treasury and Civil Service Committee last month, the member states, including the United Kingdom, do not share this view. In our view, payments under the intergovernmental agreements for 1984 and 1985 were entirely consistent with article 4 of the Community's 1970 own resources decision. This referred to the budget as being financed out of own resources "irrespective of other revenue". The Community receives other revenue, such as gifts and bequests. The Government consider that contributions under the intergovernment agreements are likewise a form of "other revenue" and are therefore available to balance the budget in accordance with article 199 of the EEC treaty.

The second area of disagreement concerns the Commission's proposal, in its supplementary budget for 1984, to cancel certain expenditure appropriations which it was then clear would not be needed. These cancellations enabled the Commission to raise less extra revenue from member states than would otherwise have been needed to finance the supplementary budget. This has been criticised by the Court of Auditors, but in the Government's view the Commission was right to reduce the calls on taxpayers in member states in this way.

In conclusion, then, the Government respectfully take a different view from the court on two general issues of budgetary procedure, as well as on certain specific cases discussed in the court's report. But the areas of agreement are far more important than the differences, and we continue to support the court's efforts to ensure that the community's expenditure is properly managed and controlled. I commend the report to the House.

10.9 pm

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): I welcome some of the Minister's comments about the Court of Auditors' recommendations for stricter financial control at perhaps a lower level than overall budgetary discipline. There is much to be done in that regard if the Community is not to engage in wasteful expenditure. I am glad that the Government want some of the recommendations to be carried out.

I was anxious to note that the Government do not accept the Court of Auditors' strictures about the use of the intergovernmental agreement in 1984. The Minister's remarks lead us to expect a similar IGA in 1986. The Minister should make that absolutely clear. We have already heard that Mr. Andriessen, the farm Commissioner, talks about an extra £450 million being necessary to cover certain aspects of farm expenditure. If that is so, and the case is pressed, the Government will have to ask for another IGA.

I could not help smiling when the Minister referred to other forms of revenue such as gifts and bequests, as he merely suggested that the IGA was a form of gift. We shall probably find ourselves making a similar gift this year.

The Minister skipped rather lightly over some issues, such as the Court of Auditors' report for 1984, which made it clear that agricultural spending had increased by 16 per cent. over 1983. As is clear from my reference to Mr. Andriessen's demand for more money, nothing has been done to curb farm expenditure. We expect it to rise once again this financial year. It cannot be contained because the budget discipline is not strict enough, as the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office said in winding up the previous debate. She said that the Community could not be isolated from changes in the exchange rate. That is true, and budgetary discipline is obliged to recognise it, but farm spending is bound to escape. We can expect a future Court of Auditors' report to show another large increase in agricultural spending this year.

The Minister should have drawn our attention to another feature of the Court of Auditors' report—the fact that a substantial proportion of farm spending in 1984 was squandered on storage. Storage accounted for almost half of farm spending and the losses on intervention stocks ran at 2·5 billion ecu. They are massive losses which affect dairy products, especially butter, skimmed milk powder and beef. It is plain that those substantial losses are about to occur again in 1986 and I think that the Minister should have referred to that. The whole design of the common agricultural policy leads to a continual growth in intervention stocks and as they decline in value, money is wasted, first in storage and secondly in further losses as the stock deteriorates.

The Minister referred to what had happened in food aid; that is a sorry story indeed. Not only were goods delivered late—cereals 14 weeks late, milk powder 23 weeks late and butter oil 19 weeks late — but even emergency consignments were late. He might also have mentioned that not only were many of the shipments made far too late, even when they were designed for emergency purposes, but they actually overran the date set by the mobilisation authority. Even worse, some of the food shipped out had to be rejected. For example, Indonesia had to reject over 1,000 tonnes of skimmed milk: its quality was unacceptable because of breakages of packets and excessive humidity during the voyage there.

The Court of Auditors once again draws the attention of member states to the disgraceful and sorry story of intervention stocks, the expense incurred by the Community in storing food and the further loss of value, as compared with what happens to food aid. Not only do we waste food by producing more than we need, but we cannot even manage to get food of decent quality to places which desperately need it on time. That is no record for a civilised community. We all ought to be ashamed and I hope that the Government will make the fiercest possible condemnation of such late deliveries and of the poor quality. More than that, I hope that the Government will take firm action within the Community to ensure that it does not happen again. It is something of which we are all thoroughly ashamed, but shame is not enough; action is what is necessary.

To cap that, millions of ecu—the Court of Auditors estimate 6 million — are lost in fraud. Unofficial estimates put the amount at 30 times the sum given in the Court of Auditors' report. The report lays specific charges against member states. It states that they do not report fraud before payments to the Commission, they do not scrutinise subsidy claims adequately and they refuse to co-operate with the Commission in the investigation of fraud. Some member countries are particularly guilty in that regard.

Once again, within the Community we want the Government to ensure that money is not wasted in that way. It is bad enough pouring millions of pounds into a wasteful and expensive agricultural policy. To be subsidising fraud, particularly in other member countries, makes matters even worse. I want an assurance from the Minister that our own methods of investigation and control are entirely adequate, that we co-operate with the Commission and that we do everything in our power to ensure that other member countries do the same.

I am glad that the Minister recommended the Court of Auditors' report to the House, as indeed I do. However, it tells a sad tale of the behaviour of the Community over the management of its funds and its disgraceful agricultural policy and it should give hon. Members cause for thought.

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): It is noticeable that the motion that the House is being asked to consider refers to the House taking note of rather than approving the annual report of the European Court of Auditors.

I found the speech by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Treasury disappointing in several respects. In the memorandum that the Government submitted to the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service this week, which is now in the Library, they say:

"The United Kingdom considers that the Court of Auditors has a key role to play in improving financial control within the European Community. The proposed discussion in the ECOFIN Council of the recommendation for discharge provides an opportunity to support the Court's work and to ensure that the Commission responds to the Council's comments."

The extraordinary thing about the speech by my hon. Friend the Minister of State is that he is projecting some of the points that the Court of Auditors made about the proper financial workings of the Community. He is in a similar position to a company chairman, who, having received qualification of his accounts from the auditors, stands up at the annual general meeting and says, "I do not agree with what the auditors said." Those who were investing in such an enterprise might react in a sensible way. Alas, the taxpayer is not in a position to do so. The plain fact is that the report of the Court of Auditors confirms all the misgivings that I have expressed on previous occasions and which, more particularly, the Treasury and Civil Service Select Commitee has expressed, about the way in which the Community has been conducting its finances.

The Court of Auditors' annual report comments on the practice of using reimbursable advances authorised by means of intergovernmental agreements to finance short falls in the European budget. The court is clear about that, as, indeed, the Select Committee has been on previous occasions. The court says:

"financing the budget by means of reimbursable advances does not fulfil the obligations placed on the Member States by the EEC Treaty".

The court is absolutely clear about that. In his remarks, my hon. Friend said that that was not the Government's view. If there is a conflict between the auditors and the Government, how is the matter to be resolved? It is perhaps rather unfortunate that at a time when rightly, in my view, the Government are taking the European Parliament to the European Court, arguing that it has made an illegal budget, they are, at the same time, opposing the views expressed by the Court of Auditors that what they the Government have been doing is illegal. That does not seem to be a good arrangement, because the law should be indivisible.

The Court of Auditors is also critical of the introduction of article 302. That is an item in the accounts, the expected balance for the current year. It says:

"The Court considers that the introduction of this article into the budget of the current year was simply a device for disguising the fact that the budget expenditure exceeded available revenue, that is, own resources, plust the reimbursable advances, which is contrary to the provisions of Article 199 of the EEC."

The Court of Auditors expressed that view in very clear terms. I have great difficulty in understanding why my hon. Friend the Minister is not prepared to accept the view that the court expresses, and which the Select Committee has pointed out on previous occasions.

After the Fontainebleau summit, on 27 June 1984, at column 1003, the Prime Minister told the House that "it is not right to raise loans for budgetary purposes because it is contrary" to the treaty of Rome. The intergovernmental agreement substitutes the words "reimbursable advances" for "loans". The Select Committee, in its report on the special supplementary estimate in January 1985, said:

"A distinction was argued between 'loans' and 'reimbursable advances'. We are not convinced there is any real difference and the requirement now proposed would certainly seem to be contrary to the spirit of those who originally drafted the treaty".

I should be grateful for my hon. Friend's views on a more technical point. The Court of Auditors is there to audit; it is for it, not the Government, to audit. It says that the IGA does not come within the category of gifts and other bequests to which the Minister referred. The hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) rightly drew attention to the fact that that would be humorous if it were not so expensive.

My hon. Friend the Minister has not dealt with the point as to whether the Community is entitled to receive a reimbursable advance. Perhaps he would give his attention to that because it is separate from an advance which is not reimbursable. We may find that the two are indistinguishable because the advances which are said to be reimbursable do not come back to this country, as they are supposed to do. Perhaps my hon. Friend will be kind enough to tell us when he expects to get the advances back and whether they are likely to arrive back on time.

It is extraordinary that the Treasury, which is rightly stringent in many aspects of domestic expenditure, seems to be so profligate—that is the only word that I can use—in going along with such a proposal. It would be intolerable if the House were again asked to approve an intergovernmental agreement in the face of the clear view expressed by the Court of Auditors that intergovernmental agreements providing such advances are contrary to the treaty, not least because it means that once again, when we come up against the VAT limit—in this case 1·4 per cent. as against the previous 1 per cent.—we would be able to put off the evil day when the House had to be asked for an increase in that limit. We know all the consequences which would follow for the United Kingdom on rebates. After all, rebates do not continue indefinitely if the conditions on which they were granted are no longer fulfilled. The problem now is very serious. It should not be subscribed to by the Treasury, the British taxpayer or by those who might otherwise have the money spent upon them at a domestic level.

Budgetary discipline is also mentioned in the report of the Court of Auditors. After the Select Committee took evidence from my hon. Friend and further evidence from Treasury officials this week, I cannot avoid the conclusion that the idea that there is any real budgetary discipline in the Community is a farce. The extent to which that is so is amply demonstrated by the fact that the Government themselves are taking the European Parliament to the European Court on the grounds that the budget that has been made by the Parliament is illegal. Clearly the European Parliament has not the slightest intention of subscribing to any system of budgetary discipline. That is immensely sad.

The House has been told by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister:

"More EC member countries are becoming net contributors. Frankly, that is the best discipline we can possibly have." —[Official Report, 27 June 1984; Vol. 62, c. 1001.]

That has scarcely been borne out by the way in which some of the net contributors have been performing against the background of the European Assembly's own illegal budget; some of the net contributors are among those who have been less than forthright in taking the line that Her Majesty's Government have rightly taken on the issue.

If one goes into more detail on the report of the Court of Auditors, one should refer to paragraph 3.4 which says:

"Article 199 of the EEC Treaty provides that all items of revenue and expenditure of the Communities shall be included in estimates to be drawn up for each financial year and shall be shown in the budget".

It then takes particular exception to two items. It says:

"The amending and supplementary budget No. 1, adopted on 25 October 1984, increased the VAT own resources rate to the 1% ceiling. The shortfall was covered within the budget by two new budget lines."

The next words are very important:

"The Court"—

the Court of Auditors—

"considers that these do not comply with normal budgeting principles, nor with the requirement of Article 199 of the EEC Treaty that annual revenue and expenditure of the Communities should be in balance".

It is not good enough for my hon. Friend simply to say that the Government are sorry, that the auditors have qualified the accounts, but that they disagree with the qualification.

Article 820 relates to amounts to be financed by reimbursable advances granted by member states. It states:

"The Court adheres to the view which it expressed in its opinion No. 1/84, that financing the budget by means of reimbursable advances does not fulfil the obligations placed on the Member States."

The same can be said of article 302 relating to expected balances from the current year.

One can go along with the view expressed in the motion that we should support the court's recommendations where these would improve the Community's financial proceedings. The regrettable and sad fact is that, on the most crucial aspect of the Court of Auditors' findings, the Government are not prepared to go along with what it recommends.

This is all in the past, and in one sense we are shutting the door after the horse has bolted. That would be worrying enough—and one accepts that it is difficult to claw back the money—but even more worrying—this was the point on which the Minister of State would not give way to me earlier—is that, having shut the door after the horse has bolted, they are opening the door again so that another horse can bolt. That is totally unsatisfactory.

It is deplorable that the Government should have taken such an attitude. They should stick firmly to the letter of the treaty. That is in the interests not only of United Kingdom taxpayers but of the future of the European Community itself. It cannot hope to get the support that it needs for the many other desirable objectives that have been mentioned if, when a report of this kind has been put before the House of Commons, the Council of Ministers and the Commission, those concerned are not prepared to face the true consequences of what it says.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The ninth report of the Select Committee on European Legislation — HOC 21-ix of the current Session — attempts to summarise the auditors' report which is the subject of this debate. It is proper to point out that the Committee is assisted in its task by Officers of the House, and our weekly reports and this special report are greatly enhanced by their skill. When people thank the Committee and its members—sometimes even its Chairmen—they should be aware of the fact that it is assisted by Officers of the House.

I use that phrase advisedly, because this House is responsible for the proper expenditure of taxpayers' money. When, some time ago, the EC was running out of money, people said, "Ah! Wait till it hits the ceiling. When the 1 per cent. ceiling is reached there will be some budgetary discipline," and we all stood by as the graph reached the ceiling. However, as the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins)—who is Chairman of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee—pointed out, instead of discipline being applied at that point, the ceiling was pierced, and all that we had were ecus falling around the wreckage. That was achieved through the intergovernmental agreement, to which the right hon. Gentleman properly referred, because it was thought to be the way in which the House and taxpayers throughout the Community would achieve discipline. The Government are extremely hot on that in domestic expenditure, but the right hon. Gentleman outlined why that did not work.

Will that view, which I suppose will be adhered to, feature in the meeting on 10 March when the ECOFIN Council meets to discuss the budget? It is a little ironic that the budgetary discipline mechanism applying now will also be on the agenda. I understand that Agriculture Ministers will request that budgetary discipline is put into abeyance for the present year. It will indeed be ironic if budgetary discipline is put in abeyance this year through some treaty let-out, while at the same time the Government will tell the president of the Court of Auditors, who will be present, that they disagree with the court's findings in respect of the intergovernmental agreement in paragraph 3.6 on page 30 of the Official Journal at column 326.

I hope that the Minister will not take that view, but if he does he should so inform the House. In effect he will be picking and choosing from the auditors' report. He will be saying, "We accept a great deal of what the auditors say, but we do not agree with the part where the court says that we have been party to providing illegal funds." Indeed, that is implicit in the words of the motion. That may suit the Government politically, but it is novel for a Treasury Minister, or, indeed, any citizen, to pick and choose from an auditor's report. Indeed, it is a terrible thing to behold. But it appears that the Government will do that.

The position is even worse than the right hon. Gentleman suggested. He properly quoted the important paragraphs, in particular paragraph 3.6 of the report. I shall quote from the Commission's reply to those matters. Page 175, paragraph 3.6a states:

"In order therefore to ensure that Community obligations could be met and that Community policies could continue to be implemented, whilst respecting the requirement in Article 199 of the EEC Treaty, that the budget be in balance, the Commission made a proposal based on Article 235 of the EEC Treaty, for the Member States to make supplementary finance available to the Community in 1984 which would be repaid when new own resources became available."

That did not happen, because the Council decided that that would not be the right way to proceed. The paragraph continues:

"The Legal Service of the Council shared the Commission's opinion that Article 235 was an entirely proper basis for the regulation."

I do not think that the Council thought that, because the paragraph continues:

"In the event, the Council did not adopt such a regulation. The Member States decided rather to make an intergovernmental agreement to provide additional finance in 1984. The Commission regrets that this agreement was entered into outside the framework of the Community treaties."

The view of the Court of Auditors that this was ultra vires and outside the terms of the treaty was apparently shared by the Commission. How can that organisation get away with such activities when a Select Committee of the House, the Court of Auditors and the Commission—with which some of us do not always agree—interpret them to be outside the terms of reference?

The Minister quoted an article in relation to miscellaneous income, but article 199 provides:

"All items of revenue and expenditure of the Community . . . shall be included in estimates to be drawn up for each financial period."

The intergovernmental agreement did not feature in the estimates, or in the so-called budget. That is a bit dodgy, too.

The right hon. Member for Worthing said that no taxpayer could do anything about it. However, one taxpayer tried. The Government tried to get one intergovernmental agreement through by way of statutory instrument under section 1(3) of the Act, and we all know what happened. There was a court case; the Government withdrew from that route and, properly, introduced a new Consolidated Fund Bill, as they should have done from the start. The taxpayer lost his case because of the judge's view of the word "ancillary".

At that stage, we did not know that the Commission believed that the matter was outside the framework of the Community treaties. Mr. Smedley lost his case, and I understand that the Treasury is still asking him to pay its expenses. I do not expect a reply from the Minister tonight, but I put it to him that if the Court of Auditors, the Commission and another article of the treaty give at least some substance to Mr. Smedley's case on judicial review, it is a bit much for the Treasury, after picking and choosing whether to accept qualifications, to come down on a British taxpayer, and an old-age pensioner to boot, and insist on his paying its expenses for the test case. I hope that the Minister will note that point, if nothing else.

The role of the Court of Auditors is fundamental to transparency and confidence in the financial operations of the Community. In many ways, it does a good job—so good a job that apparently the Government object to its drawing attention to payments which the Government consider to be legal. In some ways, that is an excellent testament to its work and a large question mark against the Treasury, which persists in picking and choosing between qualifications in an audit report.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): As hon. Members have said many times, the Common Market has been riddled with fraud from the day that it started. Although we have auditors in Britain who are supposed to examine malpractices and corruption, in the Common Market the British taxpayer has been paying heavily to be a member of the club. According to official answers, the total net cost to the British taxpayer during the first 10 years of membership, taking into account the barrowloads of money that the Prime Minister was supposed to bring back after all her well-publicised arguments with the Common Market, was £4,726 million. British taxpayers have had to pay a great deal of money for the United Kingdom to be a member of the club.

I read not so long ago that in Italy there were olive trees that existed on paper only and that the moneys claimed for them went to the Mafia. What would happen if a British local authority was involved in fraud to the extent of about 10 per cent. of its budget? That has been suggested of authorities in other countries on many occasions. That sort of money is not available in Britain to allow that degree of fraud to continue. I want to know why the Government have given the nod and the wink to others in the Common Market. Why have they allowed them to fiddle the British taxpayer at such an exorbitant level? A Minister told us the other day that there is not enough money to allow the Government to give pensioners another 40p a week. That was just about enough to allow pensioners to buy mustard plasters during the coldest February that we have had for 40 years. However, another Minister is accepting a report that details £600 million-worth of fraud.

As the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) said, the Common Market was bailed out this Session by the British taxpayer to the tune of £252 million. Even then, it was still running an illegal budget. A stop must be put to all the money that is pouring out to all the gravy trains in the Common Market. The ex-leader of the Social Democratic Party is being paid a fat pension by the Common Market, and I notice that he is not in his place this evening. He is not present to defend the budget that is before us. I wonder where he has got to.

Where are all the other SDP Members who joined the then Conservative Prime Minister to drag an unwilling British nation into the Common Market without the issue having been put to the vote? Where are Dr. Death and all the rest of them? I suppose that they are in Fulham, but I bet that they are not telling the electors in Fulham of the extent of the fiddling within their beloved Common Market. I note that the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) is in his place. He should be complaining about the demise of the 500 tin miners in Cornwall instead of trying to defend the rotten system that prevails within the Common Market.

The stage has been reached when we should put an end to this carry-on. The right hon. Member for Worthing has talked about illegal budgets and they have been acknowledged by the Government, including the Prime Minister. However, nothing has been done. That can be said on a day when 80 of my colleagues in Liverpool and Lambeth have been surcharged and threatened with being kicked out of office and made bankrupt for expenditure of less than £250,000. At the same time, others are gallivanting around the world from the Common Market. They are using British taxpayers' money to do so. I read that 63 of them have gone on a trip somewhere. In doing so, they are said to have just about exhausted the moneys that are available for trips, but I do not believe that. I am sure that some more money will be found. Those whose responsibility it is will come rabbiting to the Government for more money. The 63 have taken with them their wives, mates, friends and God knows who else.

However, in the British High Court the judges have decided to hammer 80 councillors for expenditure of less than £250,000. Those who have come before them have not been involved in fraud and they have not rigged the market. They tried to stop the Government from crippling the ratepayers and others who depend on services in Lambeth and Liverpool. That is why it makes me sick.

I have in my hand an article that I saw towards the back end of last year. It is headed "EEC's £600 million fraud" and it says:

> "The official auditors to the common market have uncovered evidence of wholesale fraud in the trade of farm produce. Exporters are claiming millions of pounds in subsidies for food which in many cases does not exist. As much as £600 million a year could be involved . . . Among the irregularities discoved were: Falsified documents. According to customs officials, a British company was caught trying to export non-subsidised vegetable oil as heavily subsidised butter."

There is another system of fiddling, called "the roundabout." The article says:

> "Traders claim several subsidies by sending their produce repeatedly across the same frontier after smuggling it back into the country . . . At one stage Northern Irish farmers were sending the same cattle across the border so frequently that, in the words of one customs official, 'the cattle knew the way themselves'."

There is another fiddle, called exploiting levies. A trader inports a low-fat product which attracts a low import levy, adds oil and re-exports it, claiming subsidy at the full rate. We can laugh at it, but the trouble is that the British people are having to pay through the nose to be in the Common Market. It is time that the British people understood what is happening.

Today, after a £600 million fraud, this Tory Government are giving a nod and a wink to all this irregularity and corruption. If the Government were really concerned about the British taxpayer, the pensioners, the nigh on 5 million people who are in the Tory dole queues, the disabled and all the other people who need assistance, they would not be doing what they are doing tonight. They would be saying to the Common Market, as the right hon. Member for Worthing said earlier, "We are not going to wear this. Take it back. Sort it out. We are not going to take note. It is time that you cleaned up the Augean stables over there in the Common Market."

There has been too much of this Euro-fanaticism during the last decade. We were promised all kinds of wonderful things. The British people were told that the Common Market would get rid of the dole queues, that there would be economies of scale, that in this giant market of 250 million people the economies of scale would result in more efficiency and that all kinds of British goods would be produced. British cars would be sent across to this wonderful market on the Continent and we would have more car workers. Industries in the west midlands and everywhere else would be burgeoning and there would be jobs for everybody.

The whole system has been a fraud from beginning to end. This is the tail end of it—after all these years, after something like £4,700 million, net, has been paid by the British taxpayer, after an illegal budget, after £252 million has been handed out to bale out the Common Market in this parliamentary Session. Yet the Prime Minister is continually telling sections of our society, "Oh, the Government have got no money. It all belongs to the taxpayer." But the British taxpayer has had to foot the bill for this. It is time that we put an end to it.

I do not know what this Minister is going to do tonight. I suppose he hopes that at this late hour he can sneak it through and that we shall carry on again. Then next year the Mafia in Italy, and all the rest of them who have been engaged in these fiddles, will be able to say, "Well, it has gone through that Parliament. It has gone through the others. They had a little bit of a set-to late one night in the British Parliament but they managed to get it through. They've got a 160 majority. One or two people complained." And on and on they will go. Those fat cats in Europe will continue to ride on the gravy trains and to laugh at the British taxpayers who will have to foot this bill.

Mr. Brooke: With the leave of the House, I should like to reply to the debate.

This has been a brief but interesting and lively debate, and I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) and those Labour Members who have participated in it. They have underlined once again the importance which the House rightly attaches to the sound management of Community funds.

The views expressed here this evening will certainly be helpful to myself and other United Kingdom representatives as we prepare for the forthcoming Council discussion in Brussels. As in previous years, I intend to draw this debate to the attention of the Community's Budget Commissioner, Mr. Christophersen, and the Chairman of the European Parliament's Committee on Budgetary Control, Herr Aigner, by sending them a copy of the Official Report of today's proceedings.

I should like to deal briefly with some of the points which have been made. The hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald), like myself, welcomed much of what is in the report and supported it, but she did have three worries. The first related to intervention stocks. The Government share the court's concern at the level of public intervention stocks and the costs involved, both in budgetary and economic terms, in their purchase and maintenance. We remain firmly of the view that the only satisfactory long-term solution to the problem of increasing intervention stocks lies in a rigorous price policy, enforced over a number of years, which will bring the markets back into balance and enable existing stocks gradually to be sold off. That will restore intervention to its correct role as a seasonal or emergency support for agricultural production. The Court of Auditors has urged a more systematic approach to the depreciation of intervention stocks. That, however, can take place only after having regard to the availability of resources under the financial guidelines for agricultural expenditure.

The hon. Lady went on to talk about food aid, to which I also referred earlier. I said that the performance on the emergency side had been significantly better in 1985 than it had been in 1984. The average time taken to deliver most food aid which was given balance of payments support is not significant. Shipments may, for example, have to await the right market conditions in the recipient country. What concerns us is the fact that the emergency shipments have not moved significantly faster than non-emergency shipments. The Commission is now reviewing its food aid procedures, and we have left it in no doubt that we expect the review to produce more streamlined procedures for emergency aid.

The auditors do not suggest that their examples of badly packaged food aid, to which the hon. Lady referred, are typical of the programme as a whole. The Commission has spent more on quality control recently, and we have no reason to believe that the amounts of food aid from the Community unfit for consumption are higher than from other food aid donors, but of course we shall continue to pay attention to that.

The third subject mentioned by the hon. Lady was fraud, and in that she was supported by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). Of course the Government are concerned, as I stressed earlier, to ensure that all necessary steps are taken to eradicate fraud from the operation of the CAP.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Paragraph 4.28, page 44 of the Official Journal of the European Communities says:

"The main thing the Court noted was a certain indifference on the part of the Member States to the financial interests of the Community and a more or less general lack of cooperation in a number of areas".

I should like to be sure that when it comes to investigating such matters, Britain will not fall into the category described in paragraph (c), which says:

"finally, the Member States have frequently shown little inclination to cooperate with the Commission's enquiries, particularly when frauds or irregularities within their territory were involved."

I want to be sure that that will not apply to Britain as a member state.

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that matter. I had intended to come to our position. We are generally satisfied with the current arrangements, but of course we are prepared to co-operate in any intensification of activity in that sphere, although naturally we would hope that controls and anti-fraud activities were cost-effective.

Reference has been made to the potential volume of undetected fraud and the fact that it might be larger than the figure that the Court of Auditors has quoted. It is easy to allege that there is a volume of undetected fraud, but if it is undetected it is, by definition, difficult to quantify.

The United Kingdom is active in the field in the prevention of fraud, with Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and International Board for Agricultural Produce investigation units and Customs and Excise co-operating, not only internally, but through the mutual assistance framework with the authorities of other member states.

Dr. McDonald: The hon. Gentleman has rightly explained what the British Government are doing. Nevertheless, as I stressed in my speech, the activities of other member states leave much to be desired, to put it mildly. Just what is Britain doing to ensure that other member states play their part? There is no reason why the British consumer should subsidise the fraudulent activities of others, never mind the wasteful CAP.

Mr. Brooke: I sought to say, both in my first speech and just now, that we are supportive of the general attitude to these problems. I give the assurance that the hon. Lady seeks.

The hon. Member for Bolsover quoted from a newspaper report and was good enough to state that people were being caught and arrested. Nevertheless, I have to contest the language that he used.

The hon. Member for Thurrock generally approved the report by the Court of Auditors, and in that respect we share her view.

Mr. Spearing: The hon. Gentleman referred to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and implied that his language was a little extravagant. On the issue of the Mafia and olives, will the hon. Gentleman at the meeting to which he referred, request the president of the Court of Auditors to state his view or, if not, to report in the succeeding year?

Mr. Brooke: I acknowledge that the level of control exercised in certain member states has been a cause for concern. Olive oil production is obviously one of the issues to which that applies. As the president of the Court of Auditors is coming to the Council's meeting, no doubt there will be an opportunity for a discussion on that matter. the Commission has been assiduous is pursuing the allegations, but has not yet been able to substantiate them. Clearly, the pursuit continues.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing returned to the subject on which he intervened during my first speech. My right hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing)—I pay tribute to the Select Committee on European legislation, of which the hon. Gentleman is Chairman — referred to the intergovernmental agreements. As I said in my opening speech, the Government do not share the court's views on this matter. I take the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing that we are taking issue with an observation by the auditors. I must say, in passing, that disagreements between auditors and their clients are not unknown in the conduct of ordinary professional business.

Whatever one's opinion of the desirablilty or otherwise of such agreements, the Government have no doubt that the agreements for 1984-85 were perfectly compatible with the treaties and involved no infringement of them. All other member states shared the Government's view, as did the Master of the Rolls in our Court of Appeal, as the hon. Member for Newham, South said.

Mr. Higgins: Will my hon. Friend take up my point about reimbursable advances? I said that if extra money was obtained by way of gift, or whatever, that was legitimate, in his view. The Court of Auditors and I do not agree. What about what are effective loans or reimbursable advances? Under what paragraph of the treaty do they fall?

Mr. Brooke: In my first speech I went on to refer to gifts and bequests, but I specifically referred to the phrase in article 4 "irrespective of other revenue" meaning items embraced by the measure.

Mr. Higgins: A reimbursable advance is not revenue; it is a loan.

Mr. Brooke: Just as the Government are in conflict with the Court of Auditors, so it appears that on this subject there will be a continuing debate between us and my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing.

My right hon. Friend continued to refer to budgetary discipline and correctly identified the dispute between the Council and the parliament, as a dispute which the council is undertaking both in the context of the legality of the budget and to ensure that budgetary discipline is maintained. The hon. Member for Newham, South also drew attention to this matter.

Mr. Higgins: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. He is always very courteous, and I apologise for intervening again. Under which provision of the treaty is the Community allowed to accept a loan?

Mr. Brooke: It is clear that there are outstanding issues on which, as I said a moment ago, my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing and I must correspond. I should like to return to the point that all member states are in agreement with the view that we have taken.

Mr. Spearing: They are all wrong.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend went on to refer to the two new budget lines. The Commission entered in the supplementary budget a new article entitled "expected balance for the year". I referred to this in my opening speech as the cancellation of expenditure appropriations which it was clear would not be needed. By taking this action we will improve budget transparency and ensure that revenue and expenditure are more accurately matched.

The hon. Member for Newham, South referred to the ECOFIN meeting on 10 March. The next step, which will follow the court case which the Council and our Government have initiated, is to ensure that budget discipline is respected in 1987. The ECOFIN Council meeting next Monday is due to discuss the confirmation of the 1987 reference framework. In particular, we will consider the Commission's figures for calculation of the 1987 agricultural guideline, and that will be an important constraint on the 1987 price fixing negotiations.

Mr. Spearing: The point that I made was about the 1986 agricultural settlement and the proposal which I understand will be made, which would breach the framework to which the Minister referred. Will this matter be decided on 10 March and so settle this year's non-budgetary arrangements?

Mr. Brooke: The issue will come before the Council on 10 March, but the Council of Agriculture Ministers will not discuss the matter until 25 March. Preliminary discussions were held a short while ago.

The hon. Member for Bolsover referred to fraud and drew attention, as did my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing, to the text of the motion. My right hon. Friend referred to the fact that we were taking note. That motion goes on to endorse the Government's efforts to ensure implementation of the Court of Auditors' recommendations where these would improve the Community's financial procedures. This reveals the Government's strong support for the report from the Court of Auditors and its contribution to the draft procedures. I ask all right hon. and hon. Members to support the motion.

PETITION

Allied-Lyons (Takeover Bid)

11.19 pm

Mr. Roy Mason (Barnsley, Central): With your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and that of the House, I beg leave to present a petition from the joint trade union committee of the food division of Allied-Lyons plc, initially signed by Mr. Sam Vickers of the Bakers, Food and Allied Workers Union, Mr. Malcolm Self of the Association of Scientific, Technical and Managerial Staffs, and Mr. John Reed of the Electrical, Electronic Telecommunication and Plumbing Union—three senior shop stewards — backed by the signatures of 671 workers of the Barnsley bakery.

The workers in Allied-Lyons are alarmed at the threat to their jobs because of the proposed takeover bid by Elders IXL Ltd. of Australia. They fear that if the bid is successful, Elders IXL will hive off the food division of Allied-Lyons and the 1,500 workers in the Barnsley bakery believe that they will lose their jobs, especially because of the asset-stripping history of Elders IXL and the nature of the bid. They also believe that this foreign firm will disregard any social consequences of such an act, which could be quite disastrous in an area of 20 per cent. unemployment in the Barnsley, Central constituency.

The petition reads:

Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray that your Honourable House will urge the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to take into account these factors when considering the desirability of such bids for the economy of the United Kingdom.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

PETITION

Sunday Trading

11.20 pm

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): With your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and that of the House, I beg leave to present a petition which has been signed by more than 1,000 of my constituents who are deeply worried about proposals for unrestricted trading on Sundays. They very much wish to keep Sunday a special day, and I entirely share their sentiments.

The petition reads:

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled. The humble petition of residents of Basildon constituency, sheweth that the undersigned are opposed to the provision for unlimited Sunday Trading in the Shops Bill currently before Parliament, recognising that Sunday has special characteristics as a day of rest, recreation and worship for the benefit of our family and community life.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House do maintain legal limitations on Sunday Trading to ensure that the special character of Sunday is protected.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Orsett Hospital

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

11.22 pm

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): I make no apology for talking about the plight of Orsett hospital, which serves the majority of my constituents.

The hospital's future has been under discussion in the Basildon and Thurrock district health authority area for the past few months. Because so many doubts have been raised about some of the services offered there, my constituents made their views felt by a petition, which 55,000 of them signed. That constitutes almost the whole electorate.

A poll of 500 residents showed unanimous opposition to the removal of any services from Orsett hospital. On 27 February, the district health authority again considered the future of services in the area and proposed this time that all maternity, gynaecological and children's surgery should go to Basildon hospital, subject to a three-month consultation period.

Before I continue, I want to say that I am deeply concerned about the possibility of any cuts in hospital provision in the Basildon and Thurrock district health authority area. Nevertheless, at the moment it is the future of Orsett hospital which is causing me and my constituents great concern.

Although Orsett hospital is situated in the east end of the borough and is in fact in the Billericay constituency, it largely serves my constituency from the west end of the borough. Although Orsett and Basildon hospitals might appear to be not too far apart geographically, the journey from Basildon, from the west end of my constituenly, is very difficult. Constituents—mothers-to-be—travelling from Grays, Purfleet, Tilbury, West Thurrock, Aveley and South Ockendon, find the journey to Basildon hospital even more difficult than the journey to Orsett hospital. If an ambulance had to bring an emergency patient to the hospital, the additional few miles could cause tremendous problems. Traffic in the area is very bad and it would be possible for an ambulance to be held up, perhaps a little too long, to the detriment, even death, of a patient.

The hospital has been described as an excellent hospital in which the maternity unit and antenatal care form a good service for my constituents. About 40 per cent. of births in the area take place at Orsett hospital, and it has about 1,700 births per year. I asked the Department of Health and Social Security for figures and found that the number of births at Orsett hospital per year is about average when compared with other maternity units in England and Wales.

The maternity unit at Orsett hospital does not have a special care baby unit, which wouuld be desirabie. However, there are about 60 other hospitals with maternity units which do not have special care baby units. If my constituents are to be provided with a full and proper service, not only should the maternity unit remain, but the hospital should be provided with a special care baby unit so that the needs of my constituents can be fully met.

The district health authority has problems of staffing, but it is difficult to be sure what form those problems take. For example, the district health authority suggests that it wishes to phase out a particular grade of specialist in the maternity and gynaecological unit, but when I questioned the Department on that matter, I found that it was not Department policy for that particular grade to be phased out. Staffing problems are indicative of financial problems. Since 1982, the district health authority has had its budget reduced by £2·5 million—5 per cent. Some of that is due to the resource allocation working party formula and some is due to a reduction in efficiency.

Over the period 1984 to 1993 there is a planned reduction for the regional health authority in the long-term resource allocation. All of those cuts will mean not only the disappearance of the maternity unit at Orsett hospital, but the ear, nose and throat, children's services, pre-convalescent geriatric services, cuts in the family planning service and other general cuts. Those cuts are being made in an area which is growing. At present the need for maternity units at Basildon and Orsett hospitals is based on population figures that are somewhat out of date. In fact, the area is developing pretty rapidly. In Thurrock, my constituency, the number of houses has already increased substantially, and most of them are occupied by young families, many of whom will have children in future years. That feature of the area has been picked up by the local press. For example, the Basildon Evening Echo reported on 28 February:

> "Essex, already one of the largest shire counties in the country, will be the centre of another massive population explosion between now and the year 2001."

The paper goes on to comment that the prospective baby boom is one of the main problems worrying county hall officials, and that possibility should be worrying the district health authority more than it appears to be at the moment.

I also wish to refer to the accident and emergency unit. I have, of course, discussed the matter with the district health authority, including the district manager, Mr. Taylor. He has given me assurances that the district health authority has committed itself to two-centre planning for accident and emergency units—one at Basildon and one at Orsett. In my view, those two units are essential not only because of the population, but because of the serious risks from the industry in the area. Thurrock, in particular, is noted for oil refineries, power stations, petrochemicals and the docks, and the M25 and the dualled A13 are extremely busy roads. As I fear we know all too well, traffic on such roads can mean serious injuries in accidents.

Although I have been given assurances, I am extremely concerned about the future of the two units in view of the cuts in the resources of the district health authority. Some of the savings that the district health authority expects to make will come from competitive tendering for cleaning services and so on. Other savings are supposed to come from increased efficiency. I am sure the Minister knows that, as few services in the Basildon and Thurrock district health authority area have been put out to competitive tendering, the prospective savings from that can be only guessed at, and cannot be regarded as certainties. I do not expect the Minister to admit that, but, on the other hand, the efficiency savings are to be found more on paper than in actuality.

Therefore, I am concerned about the future of those services, in spite of the fact that I believe that the district health authority does not want to see the two accident and emergency units disappear. That point was also covered in the Basildon Evening Echo in some detail on 3 March, just this week.

I referred to the maternity unit, and that of course is my prime concern. It is an efficient and attractive unit.

Patients readily turn to it. They value the services provided by Orsett hospital very much, and many of the older residents in Thurrock regard Orsett as their hospital. Let me give the Minister a little history. The original hospital for Thurrock was in Tilbury, in the docks area. It was brought into being by public subscription. Eventually that hospital became out of date and was transferred to a new building at Orsett. The hospital is very much the result of past community effort. Any cuts in services, particularly in maternity services, would be bitterly resented by the whole community.

The Minister and other hon. Members have had experience of dealing with petitions. They will know that the obtaining of 55,000 signatures on a petition in a very short time, without any real effort by the organisers, shows the depth of feeling in the constituency about any threat to the maternity services and the accident and emergency units at Orsett.

The number of live births, 1,771 in 1984, means that the maternity unit is about the same size as other maternity units throughout the country. In regard to the views of the medical profession, Professor Sorors, professor of paediatrics at University College hospital, commenting on a suitable and viable size for a maternity unit, said:

"Not less than 2,000 deliveries a year would be ideal . . . but it is not practicable, I do not suppose, for every woman in this country to be delivered in a unit of that size."

The West Midlands regional health authority has said that a minimal work load of 1,500 deliveries per year is acceptable for a maternity unit. The professor suggested that a large unit was ideal, but he recognised that other considerations were important besides the mere number of deliveries per year. The maternity unit must be acceptable and accessible. Patients must be able to reach it easily, should they find that the birth is more imminent than expected, or is risky. If a patient has to be rushed to hospital, the accessibility of the maternity unit is important.

Because of the antenatal care provided at Orsett, a mother has her baby in familiar and friendly surroundings. I have visited the maternity unit more than once for constituency, not personal, reasons. I have also visited the prenatal unit. I was most impressed by the care and concern shown by the staff, by the brightness and friendliness of the surroundings and by the way in which people are treated in the maternity unit.

The maternity unit is a valued part of the community to which the residents feel they have contributed in the past. They are determined that it should remain. If the petition is anything to go by, my constituents will not accept the closure of the maternity unit. They find the journey to Basildon long, difficult and expensive by public transport. They want their familiar and friendly hospital. The medical and financial reasons are not adequate justification for refusing to let the residents of Thurrock have the service that they need and desire.

The present population want the services. Mothers who are moving into my constituency in large numbers want a convenient maternity unit. If the number of births is to be a consideration, the growth of the population will remove that as a justification for closing the maternity unit. To close the maternity unit only to find that the growth in population necessitated its reopening would be a grave error that would cause unnecessary anxiety and suffering. It would simply be a financial mistake.

I hope that the Minister will take account of what I have said and begin the consultation period, which will be completed in May. I know that my constituents are relying on me to present their views tonight, and they will no doubt present their views very forcibly indeed during the consultation period.

We expect the Government to ensure that a good maternity service will remain at Orsett hospital to serve my constituency. We hope that the Basildon and Thurrock district health authority area will not experience cuts and loss of services.

11.41 pm

Mr. K. Harvey Proctor (Billericay): rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Do I understand that the hon. Gentleman has the agreement of the hon. Lady and the Minister to intervene?

Mr. Proctor: Yes, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

This is the third in a series of Adjournment debates on the reorganisation of health services by the Basildon and Thurrock health authority, and the hospital to which the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) has referred is in my constituency. I ask the Minister to assure my constituents that Orsett hospital is quite safe. Such an assurance is needed for morale and recruitment reasons which my hon. Friend will readily understand.

Orsett hospital is a larger hospital than Basildon district hospital. It is providing substantially more general surgery and medicine than Basildon. It is the only ENT in-patient service in the Basildon and Thurrock district area. It is less than 15 years old, and in investment terms it is today worth between £30 million and £35 million. There is bound to be at least 60 years of life left in it, and it is needed to provide a substantial part of the acute services for my constituents.

I should be grateful for an assurance from my hon. Friend about the safety and the future of Orsett hospital, and I look forward to his response to the comments of the hon. Lady on the maternity and accident and emergency units.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I recognise that the subject that the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) has chosen is of great importance and concern to her constituents and to the constituents of my hon. Friends the Members for Billericay (Mr. Proctor) and for Basildon (Mr. Amess), whose presence I also welcome.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay said, this is the third debate in as many months on the organisation of NHS facilities within the Basildon and Thurrock health authority. The views of the constituents of my hon. Friends were represented in the debates in January and December. Following the earlier consultation — as the hon. Lady recognised — the district health authority decided not to proceed with its earlier proposals, but on reconsideration it has issued a further set of proposals relating solely to the provision of maternity services.

As in the previous debates, at the centre is the proposal that has been put out for public consultation by the health authority. I must emphasise that it is only for consultation. The proposal is for the centralisation of maternity, gynaecology and paediatric in-patient services on one site in the district. If the community health council, which represents the views of the community, objects to the proposal, and if the regional health authority then supports the plans, it will come to Ministers for final decision.

The hon. Lady will well understand that it would not be appropriate for me to pronounce at this stage on the validity of the arguments either for or against the proposals that the district health authority put out only on 27 February for consultation. Therefore, as I hope the hon. Lady will understand, I cannot respond in favour or against her points. I achnowledge that she has properly used the procedures of the House to make clear her constituents' anxiety, which is shared by those of my hon. Friends, but I may not respond in a way that might prejudice the well established procedures for dealing with such important matters.

Comments on the consultation are required by 30 May 1986. All that is said in this debate, and all other relevant factors, will then be weighed carefully by the health authority to see what is best for the overall interests of all its patients. Therefore, the time for Ministers to play their part has not yet arrived, and there is no certainty that it will.

One issue is central to the proposal to relocate Basildon and Thurrock's in-patient maternity services upon which I can comment. It is not unique to this proposal, and it keeps cropping up wherever Health Service reorganisations are discussed. It is the question where best to locate services in a district with several large population centres. I reiterate the points made by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health in the Adjournment debate in the House on 3 December, when my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon spoke so eloquently and movingly to express his great concern about the proposal at that time to withdraw in-patient maternity provision from Basildon hospital, and to concentrate maternity services at Orsett. Although the proposal now is to centralise these services at Basildon and not now at Orsett hospital, the points made then remain valid.

First, it would not make sense to provide all facilities come what may in every large town in a district. I hope that the House will accept that. It must be recognised that where it makes no medical or economic sense to preserve the status quo, change is essential and extremely difficult decisions must often be taken. That proposition finds wide agreement in principle, but in practice real and strongly held objections will arise when a town is chosen for a closure or major change of provision. But the health authority has a duty to make those difficult decisions, and to seek to get the balance and distribution of services right for the majority of its patients.

Secondly, I understand that the district health authority continues to believe that mothers and babies in the district will receive better and safer in-patient care, if they are cared for in a central unit where there is adequate paediatric cover. I understand that it is proposed that out-patient ante-natal and post-natal clinics will continue at both Orsett and Basildon, as will accident and emergency services. The authority has also said that it is committed to maintaining the integrity of both hospitals as acute hospitals. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay will accept that undertaking, which is not challenged.

I understand that there is also a genuine staffing resource problem over providing obstetric services at more than one hospital. The district reports an unstable and unsatisfactory medical staffing structure that would be brought up to standard by centralisation.

Those reasons together suggest to the district health authority that a safer, enhanced standard of service will be provided only if in-patient services for maternity, gynaecology and paediatrics are concentrated on one site. The future organisation of those services are now being considered on their own, and not, as previously, as part of a package covering other services. As a result, the district believes that the services should be centralised, not, as the hon. Member for Thurrock has argued, at Orsett, but at Basildon. I stress that that proposal is service-led and revenue-neutral and does not stem from a desire to save money.

In response to the hon. Lady's point about funding, I hope that she accepts that the issue here is how best to provide maternity cover of the highest quality for her constituents and those of my hon. Friends. It is not a matter of finances. Inevitably, there are financial problems, of which we are all aware, but I repeat—as I have done many times during debates on changes in health provision—that it is important to recognise that the proportion of resources, in real terms, devoted to our health services is steadily increasing. Next year, there will be an increase of no less than 6·7 per cent., with forecast inflation of 4·7 per cent. Of course, RAWP also has an impact here, but North-East Thames regional health authority will receive an increase of 5·7 per cent.—significantly above the forecast rate of inflation.

The district health authority has problems, but here, too, I hope that hon. Members will recognise and acknowledge the achievements of the district authority in treating more patients. For example, between 1982 and 1984, in-patient treatment increased by no less than 12 per cent., and the number of day cases treated increased by 24 per cent.

The district health authority is managing its resources well and is extremely sensitive to the needs of the community. It is seeking better provision, and I hope that the consultation exercise will achieve that. I assure the hon. Lady and my hon. Friend that their contributions to the debate will be taken carefully into account as part of the consultation exercise which an issue of this seriousness and importance merits.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at nine minutes to Twelve o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Common Agricultural Policy

2. Mr. Marlow asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food by what date he anticipates that the reforms he seeks in the common agricultural policy will be implemented.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Michael Jopling): We have made progress in agreeing the financial guideline, milk quotas and measures for the wine sector. We must make further progress this year, particularly with cereals and beef, in limiting the production of surplus commodities and the burden that they place on the budget.

Mr. Marlow: A generation ago Professor Mansholt promised reforms of the common agricultural policy, yet this year we seem to have the highest prices, the highest subsidies and the lowest farm profits since the war. What will the Government do about that? Last year, for example, we gave away the 1 per cent. VAT limit, on the basis that the financial mechanism would work. If the financial mechanism does not work — many of us believe that it will not and said so at the time, when we also said that the dollar might go down—will my right hon. Friend put radical alternatives before the House, including the repatriation of our own agricultural produce?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend is a well known merchant of gloom and doom on these matters. I remind him that since the United Kingdom joined the Community productivity per person in agriculture has risen by more than 70 per cent., that the volume of output has risen by more than 18 per cent., that the volume of our exports of agricultural products, food and drink has risen by more than 25 per cent., and that we now produce 80 per cent. of our needs in temperate foodstuffs compared with 60 per cent. in 1972.

Mr. Freud: At the annual general meeting of the National Farmers Union the Minister told the farmers that he would not agree to anything that would discriminate against the British farmer. Did he say that to stop the farmers lynching him, or did he mean it? If he meant it, will he repeat it now at the Dispatch Box?

Mr. Jopling: I have said many times that there are elements in the current price proposals which discriminate seriously against Britain's interests. I told the Council of Ministers in Brussels only last week that some of them were unacceptable.

Mr. Forth: What is the estimated impact of the movement of the exchange rate with the dollar? Does my right hon. Friend expect a supplementary budget in the EEC this year? Does he believe that the chronic surpluses in the CAP are a root cause of the problems? If so, what will he do about them?

Mr. Jopling: The Commission and the Council are committed to the financial guidelines. It will be an important objective to ensure that it is held to in the coming negotiations on the CAP.

Mr. John: In the Financial Times this morning we read that the extra agricultural budget is likly to be not £450 million, but £1 billion. Is that what the Minister calls financial discipline?

Mr. Jopling: In the negotiations that lie ahead of us we have to seek further savings so that we can live within our financial guideline.

Food Manufacturers

3. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to meet representatives of food manufacturers.

Mr. Jopling: I am regularly in touch with representatives of food manufacturers. Whilst I have no immediate plans to meet them, I am ready to do so on specific problems at any time.

Mr. Lloyd: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for that answer. I am glad to learn that he is ready to meet the food manufacturers to discuss specific matters. Is he aware that they now accept the need for, and the desirability of, the removal of the Official Secrets Act as it applies to the food advisory committees? Will the Minister meet representatives of the food industry so that he can discuss this matter with them and tell them when he intends to legislate on the issue, so that the secrecy surrounding the use of additives to food can be broken and the public can have access to and knowledge of what takes place?

Mr. Jopling: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman is still pursuing a very old story which I thought had been put to rest. He should know, and I am surprised that he has not seen the statements which have been made, that members of the committees do not have to sign the Official Secrets Act. However, some information which comes their way is commercially sensitive and they are asked, in the same way as any Government Department is, to observe the need to keep it confidential.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is the Minister not aware that his hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, whose absence we regret and who is our sparring partner on these matters, has said that there are some formal limitations on secrecy in the advisory committees? Can the right hon. Gentleman say what is the formal thing that the members are asked to sign, even within the parameters that he has outlined to us about the confidentiality of business agreements?

Mr. Jopling: As I said earlier, members of the committees are not required to sign the Official Secrets Act. However, certain information is given which is commercially private and the committees are asked to keep it that way. I think that that is the only reasonable way in which to proceed. I hope that at some time the hon. Gentleman will look at the huge mass of technical material which these committees churn out. We are trying to make further information available through the British Library in the immediate future if we can arrange it.

Common Agricultural Policy

4. Mr. Eastham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will seek to ensure that the price proposals agreed by the Counicl of Ministers encourage a reduction in surplus commodities within the common agricultural policy.

11. Mr. Hardy asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what changes in agricultural policy he is seeking in order to respond to the present and prospective levels of food production in the United Kingdom and the European Community.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): In order to tackle the problems of the CAP we are seeking in this year's price negotiations and over a period of years to secure price proposals and other measures to limit the production of surplus commodities and the burden that they place on the budget.

Mr. Eastham: I am glad the Minister recognises that there are serious problems in the CAP. May I remind him that in Europe in 1985 we had surpluses of 10·5 million tonnes of wheat, 2 million tonnes of barley, 0·5 million tonnes of beef and 1 million tonnes of butter? What does the Minister propose to do to remove these surpluses? Can he not give them to the pensioners or pass them on to the Third world?

Mr. Gummer: No one who has followed any of the speeches, comments or work done by Ministers could possibly ignore the fact that we want to reduce these surpluses. The hon. Gentleman would make a great deal more fuss if there was shortage of food.

Mr. Hardy: Is the Minister aware of the deep and intensifying anxiety which is felt in the farming community, which has been illustrated by the substantial fall of 40 per cent. in the price of land in some areas? Is he aware that farmers believe that his right hon. Friend is guilty of serious intertia, which was illustrated during the previous Question Time when he said that he had been looking at the matter urgently for months?

Mr. Gummer: I do not think that the farmers would hold that view. They know perfectly well that we are now living in a world of surplus, rather than of shortage, and if the hon. Gentleman looks back at his Government's performance he will see that they did nothing to prepare the country for it.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: Will my right hon. Friend recognise that the farming industry is worried that it might be unreasonably discriminated against in the search to find ways in which the surpluses can be reduced? Will he take special care in his negotiations in Brussels to ensure that British agriculture is not disadvantaged?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend has put his finger on one aspect which has to be part of the negotiations. It is right to expect the farming industry throughout Europe to bear the burden of dealing with surpluses. The burden must be borne fairly. It must not land unfairly on the backs of farmers in Britain compared with what happens to their neighbours in Europe.

Mr. Jackson: Does my right hon. Friend consider that the recent downward movement of the dollar could count as an exceptional circumstance?

Mr. Gummer: I do not believe that we can solve the problems of agriculture unless we are prepared to adhere to the financial guidelines which have been agreed.

Mr. Foulkes: What action is the Minister taking within the Council of Ministers to stop the dumping of subsidised surpluses in Third world countries? Is he aware that sugar is being sold below the market price in Jamaica, thus causing great devastation to the economy of that country and making it much more difficult for countries such as Jamaica to repay their debts?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman should be a little more careful about the detail of what is happening to the sugar market in Jamaica and other countries, because the situation is much more complicated than he suggests. I hope that he will have a word with his hon. Friend the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham) about the supply of surpluses to developing countries.

Mr. Philip Oppenheim: Can my right hon. Friend arrange for a study trip to be organised for Labour Members who complain about surpluses? I suggest that there should be a study trip to examine food production in the Soviet Union, where I understand they have overcome the problems of surpluses quite successfully.

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is right. Almost every major part of the world produces enough food to feed its people, except the Soviet Union and the Soviet bloc, which are incompetent.

Mr. Torney: Will the Minister consider instituting research into breadmaking wheat, so that it can be grown in Britain instead of being imported from abroad, and so reduce the massive surpluses of cereals in this country and in the Common Market generally?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman is a little behind the times, and he does down the previous Labour Government. Over the past few years the Chorley Wood process has made it possible for us to use to a large extent breadmaking wheat which has been grown in Britain. It is only the particularly bad weather of this year that has meant that the quality of our wheat, unusually, has not been suitable for breadmaking, and as a consequence we have had to import suitable wheat.

Mr. Torney indicated dissent.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman may shake his head, but it is clear that he does not know the facts.

Mr. Budgen: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that no matter how much the dollar falls and thus creates greater expenditure in disposing of surpluses, this will not be used by the Government as an excuse for asking for an increase in the VAT contribution to the EEC?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is the last person in the House to demand that any member of the Government answer a question which begins, "No matter what happens to something, will he confirm?" I shall therefore not confirm.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Minister aware that one reason for the chaos in the CAP is all the fiddling and fraud that takes place in the Common Market? Is he further aware that last night the Minister of State, Treasury admitted that the Mafia was being investigated because it was saying that there were so many hundred olive trees in Italy, when they existed on paper only? Is he aware also that Northern Irish farmers are sending cattle across the border so many times in order to get increased export rebates that the cattle almost know the way themselves?

Mr. Gummer: It must be an amazement to the House that the hon. Gentleman belongs to a party which had a reputation for being internationalist. His constant attacks on anyone who happens to live abroad are becoming bywords.

Mr. Marlow: In which areas in which the Community is currently in surplus does my right hon. Friend expect surpluses to be reduced this year?

Mr. Gummer: One would not expect changes in agriculture to take place rapidly. Any one who understands the farming industry realises that the crops for this year have already been planted. Therefore, my hon. Friend will accept that the changes that will be made, and the attack on the surplus that will take place, cannot result in a change in this year's harvest.

Mr. Deakins: Will the Minister condemn the European Commission for putting forward price proposals which break the financial guidelines which the House was told by the Government last year were binding on the Council and the Commission?

Mr. Gummer: We are in the business of winning the point. We have to solve the problems of surpluses within the financial guidelines laid down and within the competence of British farmers to provide their fair share of the burden. I am not one of those who go around condemning what has been done. I am seeking an answer.

Mr. Livsey: Does the Minister agree that one of the most effective ways of controlling surpluses is through variable premiums, such as is used in the beef sector? Can he assure us that the beef variable premium will be negotiated successfully at this round?

Mr. Gummer: As we are in the business of negotiating the kind of assurance which the hon. Gentleman wishes in advance, he cannot expect me to sum it up in those words. We are going into these negotiations intending, as we have in the past, to defend the beef variable premium, which is of great importance to the British farmer.

Mr. John: Will the Minister tell the House, in whatever time scale crops need to be harvested, whether cereal surpluses will come down within the next three years?

Mr. Gummer: It is the Government's firm intention to fight for policies which will bring down cereal surpluses, not just in three years, but as soon as possible. That means that we must start on it now. The hon. Gentleman must accept——

Mr. Torney: We want facts.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman asks for facts, but one of the facts of farming life is that one does not know what the weather will be like. It shows how little Opposition Members know about agriculture. The fact is that surpluses can be fundamentally altered by whether or not we have a good grain growing period.

Food from Britain

5. Mr. Maclennan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the future funding of Food from Britain.

Mr. Jopling: I have made clear the extent of Government support for Food from Britain until 1991 provided industry is also willing to contribute. Discussions on industry funding are continuing and I am hopeful that satisfactory arrangements will be agreed soon.

Mr. Maclennan: Does the Minister regard it as satisfactory that the budget for Food from Britain is being cut from £6·3 million to £4·8 million in the forthcoming year? Will the Minister step in to make good this shortfall, or will he allow this attempt to promote British foods abroad languish through lack of finances and lack of Government backing?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman has not done his homework. He will remember that originally the Government promised £14 million over the first five years as pump-priming funds. Out of that arrangement, there remains for 1986-87 the £3 million that was promised, and that will be paid. For 1987-88 there is £2 million, which will be paid.

Mr. Ashton: Is the Minister aware that in agriculture there is always satisfactory funding for everyone except farm workers? Is he aware that farm workers now receive a basic wage of £89 a week? That is for a week, not the figures which are usually given for a week and a half, including overtime. When will the Minister answer the justified demands of the farm workers union for a decent living wage for the profits that its members have created?

Mr. Speaker: That was a bit wide of funding Food from Britain.

Mr. Jopling: I was wondering by what stretch of the imagination that supplementary question could attach itself to this question, which is about Food from Britain. If Food from Britain is allowed, as I hope it will be, to continue its good work, that will be in the interests of farmers, farm workers, the consumer and the taxpayer alike.

Sir John Farr: I remind my right hon. Friend that Food from Britain was launched when our food supply was more or less in equilibrium. Is there not now a need to strengthen our export efforts as we have a large surplus in most commodities?

Mr. Jopling: I agree with my hon. Friend. He has put his finger on it. It is important, as marketing becomes more and more essential, that the industry should—as I know it is trying to do—give Food from Britain its full support so that it may do its job properly.

Mr. Home Robertson: How can Food from Britain survive as an effective organisation in the present circumstances? I agree with the Minister that the industry ought to provide more funds for it, but failing that, how can it survive? Is it the Department's intention to guarantee the future of Food from Britain? If not, how can we have an effective organisation to promote the sale of food from Britain at home and abroad?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman should recall that last October I announced that when the £14 million pump-priming funds ran out in 1987-88, up to £2·5 million would be available in each of the subsequent years to 1990-91, and that would be done on the basis of £1 for every £2 from industry. The industry greeted the announcement with a great deal of enthusiasm and gratitude, and I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman is so carping about it.

Fisheries Protection

6. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many boardings by United Kingdom fishery protection vessels took place in the month of January.

Mr. Gummer: During January 1986, 115 vessels were boarded by United Kingdom fishery protection vessels.

Mr. Lewis: Does the Minister accept that those figures include only 17 boardings of Spanish vessels, but 56 boardings of British vessels? Does that not give the impression that British fishing is not being adequately protected by the Minister, despite all the promises that he has made?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman, who relies on such an impression, has not looked at the facts. The system that we have imposed is widely accepted by fishermen as being extremely effective. One of the fishing vessels which was boarded and found guilty was fined heavily. The French give us information about every boat that passes through their waters, so that we can track them extremely carefully. There is no doubt in my mind that we can control the entry of Spanish fishing vessels into our waters, and that the common fisheries policy is a major success.

Mr. Harris: I applaud the attitude of my right hon. Friend in trying to clamp down on illegal Spanish fishing, especially off Cornwall, but will he confirm my impression that there has been a sharp decrease in the number of arrests during the past few weeks, and give an assurance that there will be no let-up in the drive against illegal fishing by Spain in the south-west?

Mr. Gummer: There will be no let-up whatsoever. That is why we have increased the number of surveillances and the amount of resources available. My hon. Friend has pressed me on the matter, and I continue to say that. The fact is that if people keep the rules and we have tight rules, and if our system works closely with that of our French and Irish colleagues, we can stop ships breaking the law and bring them to court. That is what has been happening.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Is the Minister aware of the Scottish Affairs Select Committee report on fishery protection, which recommends that Scottish courts should punish illegal fishing with the same severity as the Norwegian courts do? What does he think about that recommendation as applied to English courts?

Mr. Gummer: If the hon. Gentleman studies recent fines imposed by English courts, especially in the south-west, he will see that they have been exemplary and heavy and have caused a decline in the amount of illegal fishing. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) will agree on that. I cannot comment on the effects in the Scottish courts, because that is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Mr. Wigley: In view of the importance of fishery patrols, can the Minister give an assurance that with the disappearance of the metropolitan authorities, either bodies such as the Lancashire and North-Western Sea Fisheries will receive alternative funds, or there will be alternative structures to safeguard their activity?

Mr. Gummer: It is for members of the body to decide whether they wish to continue on it. We have examined the activities of that body carefully, and, we will ensure that none of the necessary activities for the proper control of fisheries will fall into desuetude if they are not covered elsewhere.

Dr. Godman: Is the Minister aware that one of the recommendations in the Scottish Affairs Select Committee report on fisheries protection refers to the replacement of the fisheries protection vessel Norna? Will the Minister urge on his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland the advisability of that replacement vessel being built by Ferguson Ailsa in Port Glasgow?

Mr. Gummer: I am sure the hon. Gentleman will accept that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State will have to make up his mind on that, and that it is not an area in which I can make recommendations to him.

Mr. Kennedy: When the Minister considers his Department's response to the Scottish Affairs Select Committee report which was published yesterday, will he, in particular, adopt the practice in Norway, so that third country vessels must notify the DAFS direct, instead of simply notifying Brussels, so that a more efficient, but not over-bureaucratic, scheme can monitor foreign vessels near our shores?

Mr. Gummer: I will look at that point. I remind the hon. Gentleman that European Community vessels, including Spanish vessels, have to give direct information as they pass into the British sector from the French sector, and they provide similar information to the French. In that way we have been able to keep very close control over their movements. I will certainly examine the matter closely.

Mr. Randall: Does the Minister agree that his attack on my hon. Friend the Member for Worsley (Mr. Lewis) was totally unjustified, as the figures that my hon. Friend quoted were given to me by the Minister in a written answer on 24 February? Will he confirm that the number of boardings of United Kingdom vessels in January was comparable to the number of boardings of the rest of the EEC fleet put together? Should the Minister not be directing his attention and efforts towards the countries which have a track record of abuse, rather than bashing British fishermen?

Mr. Gummer: My answer and the figures were absolutely correct. I welcome the hon. Gentleman's presence today. He was absent from the debate on salmon fishing earlier in the week, which appeared to have been hi-jacked by the Scots. There are two ways of ensuring that we are successful in our policing. The first is to bring large numbers of people before the courts. Alternatively, people should obey the law. I was right to tell the hon. Gentleman that his impression was wrong and that he does not know the facts.

Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce

7. Mr. Fallon asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will relocate the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce.

Mr. Jopling: I am currently considering this question.

Mr. Fallon: Why have so many of these quangos been allowed to set up camp along the Thames Valley? Would it not be cheaper to move the board to the north of England and thereby provide much-needed jobs into the bargain?

Mr. Jopling: I rather guessed that my hon. Friend would ask that question. I assure him that if a move were proposed, the merits of alternative locations, including the north-east of England, would be considered.

Mr. Home Robertson: As the board's stocks of cereals doubled to 5·7 million tonnes and its stocks of beef increased to 85,000 tonnes last year, will the Minister reconsider the way in which those stocks are relocated? Why not give the British consumer the benefit of some of those stocks instead of handing them out cheaply to the Russians?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman will know very well that I have for a long time expressed similar concern about the level of surplus stocks within the Community. However, that matter is not within the question, which is about relocating the intervention board.

Agricultural Land

8. Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of land at present farmed he estimates will be surplus to agricultural needs by 1990.

Mr. Jopling: Further measures clearly need to be taken within the Community to cut back production of commodities now in surplus. I see this as leading to changes in the existing pattern of land use in agriculture and forestry, rather than to the creation of substantial areas of land which are no longer in production.

Mr. Carlisle: Does my right hon. Friend accept that many authorities in the industry believe that about 10 per cent. of current production will be surplus to requirements by 1990? Will that not present the farming industry with its greatest challenge and opportunity for more than half a century? Will it not need a structure on which it can plan for the future, and will my right hon. Friend provide such a structure?

Mr. Jopling: Yes, I think that we must give serious thought to the possibility that there may be a need for a change of land use in that way. It is very dangerous to be too specific about that. Any changes will depend on a number of factors, such as the nature and level of Community support, the level of Community and world demand for temperate foodstuffs, the relative efficiency of our industry, technological improvements that might take place and the extent to which other countries outside the community, particularly the United States, are successful in developing their agricultural policies.

Mr. Ralph Howell: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the fact that he is dealing with the problem of food surpluses without mentioning cutting prices. I urge him to persuade the Government to call for a world food conference to try to deal with this problem, which cannot be dealt with either in the United Kingdom or in Europe alone.

Mr. Jopling: I shall certainly bear my hon. Friend's point in mind. If I have not said it already, I fear that I must tell my hon. Friend now that I see no prospect of reducing the huge surpluses of foodstuffs in the Community unless we have a stringent price policy.

Mr. Hardy: Is there not a case for substantial and immediate higher priority to be conferred on conservation? Does the situation not justify serious consideration being given to the additional production of cellulose on non-arable land?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman is right to think that environmentally sensitive areas should play an important part in the business of land use. The hon. Gentleman knows as well as any other hon. Member the initiatives that the Government have taken in the Community and which are enshrined in the legislation before the House to provide for environmentally sensitive areas. I hope that we shall be able to set the ESAs before too long. I think that that goes a long way towards meeting the hon. Gentleman's point.

Mr. Hicks: If consideration is to be given to taking land out of production deliberately, does my right hon. Friend agree that attention must be given to the impact of that on the stability of rural areas?

Mr. Jopling: That is correct. That is why I said in my original answer that we should look for changes in the existing pattern of land use rather than to the creation of substantial areas of land which are no longer in production.

Mr. John: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that in 1990, which is the year to which the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) referred, only five ESAs will exist? In view of the difficulties in changing agriculture production patterns, is it not time that the Minister stated the level of forestry and alternative crops that will be available to farming at that time?

Mr. Jopling: We have said that we hope, in the first instance, to set up five ESAs. The hon. Gentleman has welcomed that move. That is for this year. What may be done in future years is a matter for future decision.

Mr. Rathbone: Whatever the surpluses may be, will my right hon. Friend reconsider the policies presently applied to encourage — not to allow — the growing of opium-producing poppies as a cash crop in Britain without any sense of responsibility in relation to how that crop might encourage the misuse of drugs? The rest of the Government are trying to contain that problem.

Mr. Jopling: We are looking into these matters. I am sure the House agrees that we must not do anything that allows illegal drugs to become more freely available.

Mr. Latham: What does my right hon. Friend expect farmers to grow instead of surplus barley — trees or caravans? Is it not high time that we had a strategic document spelling out the way in which agriculture is supposed to go?

Mr. Jopling: I am sure that my hon. Friend has heard me say on many occasions that I believe that it is necessary for us to consider carefully the opportunity to grow more trees. I hope that he has seen the consultative document that we issued some months ago on encouraging more farm woodlands.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Maclennan.

Mr. Maclennan rose——

Hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Andy Stewart: Does my right hon. Friend agree that allowing every village and small town of fewer than 7,000 people to expand its housing stock by 10 per cent. would be the most advantageous way of using our surplus land?

Mr. Jopling: Yes, I am sure that every hon. Member will agree that where housing needs to be provided, one should go to every possible extent to find suitable land for development.

Land Drainage and Coast Protection

9. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when his review of finance and administration of land drainage and coast protection will be complete.

Mr. Gummer: Our aim is to complete the review as soon as possible.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Why were the conservation aspects of land drainage not addressed in the Government's most recent Green Paper on land drainage? Could the reason be that the argument between the Department of the Environment and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food still rages and, as a result, no clear decisions can be taken? As privatisation now seems to be on the agenda, may we have assurances that there will be a new Green Paper and the fullest possible consultation on conservation aspects?

Mr. Gummer: The answer to the first part of the question is no, Sir. The answer to the second part is that there will be the fullest possible consultation on conservation interests.

Mr. Rathbone: Contrary to the politically inspired question by the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), may I ask what my right hon. Friend is doing about the pressing need for coastal defence work along the coastline in Sussex around Seaford? This community is waiting upon certain bodies. Will my hon. Friend reconsider the parsimonious allocation this year?

Mr. Gummer: I shall look carefully at this matter. In my area of Anglia similar problems arise, and no firm decisions have yet been taken, but we are aware of my hon. Friend's concern and that of local authorities.

Mr. Home Robertson: As the Secretary of State for the Environment told the House on 5 February that land drainage and flood protection were the one responsibility of local authorities that would not be privatised, what residual public water authority will assume these responsibilities? I presume that the right hon. Gentleman must have a considerable constituency interest.

Mr. Gummer: I have important ministerial and constituency interests. When the time comes for us to continue our discussions, we shall produce some answers to that question.

Mr. Freud: When it comes to coastal protection, would it not be infinitely fairer if this were charged on central Government funds instead of on local ratepayers and water authorities?

Mr. Gummer: There are those who put that view, but there is also an argument and a case to say that those who benefit most particularly should make some major contribution towards it.

Mr. Ralph Howell: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the serious situation in my constituency, at Horsey? Will he give urgent attention to the problem of coastal protection there?

Mr. Gummer: This is primarily a matter for the Anglian water authority, but I shall look particularly at my hon. Friend's concern.

COMA Report

10. Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he intends consultation on his proposals following the COMA report to be concluded; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: We have asked for comments on the labelling proposals announced on 13 February to be submitted by 1 May of this year.

Mr. Callaghan: I thank the Minister for his answer, but will he consider requesting, by law, manufacturers to label foods with polyunsaturated fats, as recommended in the COMA report?

Mr. Gummer: We have, of course, already accepted that it will be necessary by law to insist on fat content labelling, but one cannot restrict it to that. The intention is to provide the housewife or consumer with a range of information, much of which will be given voluntarily by food manufacturers. We hope to provide in this consultation a framework so that information given on different products will be readily understandable. The Ministry and the hon. Gentleman are very much on the same side.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Do we not spend billions of pounds on eating to make ourselves unhealthy, and then spend billions of more pounds, which we find increasingly hard to muster, on patching ourselves up after these excesses? Therefore, will my right hon. Friend undertake to have a word with my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Social Services and the Chief Secretary about these "Ubuesque" arrangements, and put it to them that a rather more generous budget for research into how we can produce the elements for a healthy diet, vegetables for example, might rapidly be justified by significant, consequential savings on expenditure on the Health Service?

Mr. Gummer: I have not noticed any shortage of healthy food. Healthy food is available. However, the housewife and the consumer must be in a position to choose what he or she wants to buy. This Government are concerned about providing them with that information. The choice must be theirs. We do not want a nanny state which tells people what they ought to eat.

Poultrymeat

12. Mr. Cockeram asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the arrangements for poultrymeat exports to the United States of America.

Mr. Gummer: Discussions with the United States authorities on access to their market are proceeding.

Mr. Cockeram: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the importance of this industry to rural areas such as Ludlow, where poultrymeat exports provide a substantial element of employment? Will he bear this in mind during the negotiations?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is quite right when he speaks of the importance of this country's poultry industry and its need to secure access to the largest number of markets. During his recent visit to the United States my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food raised these matters with the Agriculture Department there. We shall seek to do our best to defend and extend the opportunities for the British poultry industry.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Bidwell asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 6 March.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today, including one with the National Pensioners Convention.

Mr. Bidwell: Does the right hon. Lady realise that the pensioners' lobby today indicates not only deep anxiety among our old folk but deep anxiety about them in the nation as a whole? Does she further realise that if the Government had clung to the Labour Government's formula of uprating pensions according to the cost of living or national average earnings, the pensioner and his dependent wife would be £6·50 better off today? Why does the hon. Lady not address her mind to this question? She will hear about it later from the Trades Union Congress. Would this not be a handy sum with which old people could meet their fuel bills instead of freezing to death?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is aware that the previous Government's policies led to the International Monetary Fund and to peak inflation, the highest that this country has ever known. This Government kept their pledge to protect pensions against the rise in prices. In fact, pensions have increased by nine percentage points more than prices and we have brought down the inflation that destroyed the savings of pensioners in the 1970s.

Mr. Dorrell: Will my right hon. Friend take time today to consider whether sterling should join the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system? Is she aware that Mr. Sam Brittan has argued that this could allow us to reduce the level of interest rates prevailing in Britain? Does she agree that, by any definition, sterling is now more competitive since the decline in the exchange rate in recent weeks and that it may therefore be, in the time-honoured phrase, that the time is ripe for sterling to become a member of the exchange rate mechanism?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend knows, I am asked this question regularly, usually on the basis that "now" is the time to go in. I was asked it when the pound bought DM 3.70. It now buys about DM 3.20. Those who asked that question then must be rather glad that we did not go in, because we should have suffered rather grievously if we had. One day, when we think that the time is appropriate, we shall join the EMS. We do not think that it is appropriate to do so at the moment.

Mr. Kinnock: When the Prime Minister meets the pensioners' delegation this afternoon, will she explain to them why she is deliberately ensuring that the value of the old-age pension next year will be 3 per cent. less in real terms than it is this year? Is that not a deliberate betrayal of her pledge to protect the poor and those who are most in need?

The Prime Minister: I shall explain to them that the pension has gone up by nine percentage points more than prices, that we have kept our pledges to the pensioners and that if we were to accept all of the National Pensioners Convention proposals the cost would be at least £20 billion a year. That would add at least £16 a week to the national insurance contributions of those on average earnings as well as requiring substantial increases in income tax and value added tax. That, and a lot more, I shall explain.

Mr. Kinnock: The Prime Minister must surely know that if she claims that pensions have gone up in real terms by 9 per cent. under her Government, they went up by 20 per cent. in real terms under the last Labour Government. As she is so fond of referring to the record of the last Labour Government, why does she not have the decency to match it?

The Prime Minister: I am not prepared to go back to the inflationary policies of the last Labour Government. That is the way to destroy the savings of pensioners. What the last Labour Government were prepared to do was to create inflation, claim big pension increases and pay for those pension increases by debasing the savings of pensioners. We will not carry out such a dishonest policy.

Q2. Mr. Forth asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 6 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Forth: Does my right hon. Friend welcome the statement by President Botha of South Africa on the ending of the state of emergency in his country? Does she believe that this vindicates our policy of continuing to talk to the South Africans, and does she now expect the Opposition parties to welcome the statement as a further advance in the country of South Africa?

The Prime Minister: I welcome very warmly President Botha's decision to lift the state of emergency in South Africa. I hope that it will lead to reduced tension and that it will bring nearer the prospect of a genuine dialogue between the South African Government and black South Africans.

Mr. Loyden: Is the Prime Minister aware that many people will view the decision taken in the High Court yesterday as a further attack on local democracy — [Interruption.] It is she and her Government who should be before the courts to answer for the misery and hardship which she and her Government have imposed upon 750,000 people in Lambeth and Liverpool by savage cuts in the local government expenditure of authorities which are trying to remedy the damage which she and her Government are doing to inner cities.

The Prime Minister: Government and local government are answerable to the courts, as everyone who believes in the rule of law knows.

Mr. Grylls: If I may revert to the question of pensions, does my right hon. Friend agree that the Government's policy on inflation is the best way of protecting pensioners and their savings, and that we should not be deflected from sticking to that course, which is a way of giving them honest money?

The Prime Minister: I agree wholly with my hon. Friend. There has to be the certainty that Governments will run prudent financial policies and therefore get stability in their financial dealings.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: When suggestions are again made, as they already have been made this afternoon, that we should return to the miseries and follies of a fixed exchange rate for sterling, will the Prime Minister remain deaf to these unwise promptings?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman heard my reply earlier. These suggestions are made regularly. I think that, had we listened to them earlier, we would have found ourselves in some difficulty in view of the fluctuation in exchange rates which inevitably comes through having a currency rather different from those in the rest of Europe. We must continue to take that factor into account.

Q3. Mr. Proctor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 6 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Proctor: When my right hon. Friend meets the National Pensioners Convention this afternoon, will she explain to it that the inflationary policies of Her Majesty's Opposition will crucify the savings of pensioners?

The Prime Minister: Yes, Mr. Speaker, they will do just that. Not only that, but if we ever returned to a period when inflation went up sharply by 25 per cent. or so, to put up the pension by that amount may increase its value for a few days, but it would rapidly lose that value as inflation ate away the increase.

Dr. Owen: Does the Prime Minister draw no lessons from the last couple of months from the way that many pensioners did freeze in the very cold spell when heating allowances were shown to be inadequate? [Interruption.] Hon. Members can jeer but there must be many of their constituents who suffered greviously. Surely the Prime Minister will at least try to change this situation by next year.

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, the Government's record on payments for heating is far better than that of the Government of which he was a member. The facts show that. He cannot possibly get over that, no matter how much he trys to wave it away with his hand. It is because he has not got the answer that he asks such stupid questions.

Mr. Ottaway: My right hon. Friend will be aware that the projected population increase in Britain to the end of the century is 1 million. Is she aware that the population of the world has risen by 1 million in the past five days? What plans does she have to meet that growing demand for the world's resources.

The Prime Minister: The growth of world population is discussed in international forums, particularly when we deal with our aid programmes. My hon. Friend will understand that we try to help those programmes that are designed to reduce the increase.

Mr. Ashton: Is the Prime Minister aware that every hon. Member is being badgered every day about the Shops Bill? In order to influence hon. Members before they vote, will she arrange for the Second Reading of the Bill to take place at 9.30 am on a Sunday, in the same way as we meet on a Friday, and, so that we may experience the effects of the Transport Act 1985, will she arrange for everybody to get here by public transport?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman makes his point. I think that I have got it. I think that it was in favour of extra choice in Sunday trading.

Mr. Rathbone: Will my right hon. Friend find a moment today, or before the end of the week, to have a word with my right hon. Friend sitting on her right, the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, and inquire of him why in the world British farmers are encouraged to grow opium poppies as a cash crop in the face of all the other admirable activities of her Government to fight drug misuse?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend says that he is looking into it. Strenuous efforts are made to ensure that the growth of that crop, necessary for pharmaceutical drugs, cannot be turned to illegal use.

Q4. Mr. Dormand asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 6 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Dormand: Will the Prime Minister give urgent attention to the plight of sacked miners? Is she aware that there are 11 from my constituency, 74 from my county of Durham and 520 nationally, that many of them have won their appeals through industrial tribunals and that many have been acquitted by the courts? Before she adopts a Pontius Pilate role, saying that is a matter for the National Coal Board, will she realise that the re-employment of those miners will be the biggest single step that can be taken to begin to restore good relations in the coal industry, and will she bring pressure to bear on the Coal Board to do that?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman in part anticipated my reply. Of course it is a matter for the NCB, but I understand that one case is before the courts, to which I can make no reference. That is a matter for the courts to decide. The hon. Gentleman is aware that the important thing is to have an efficient coal industry. Productivity has increased enormously. It needs to increase a good deal further, particularly with the fall in the price of oil, which has to compete with coal. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that, despite the improved performance, the taxpayer will still put about £1·5 billion into the coal industry this year.

Q6. Mr. Martin asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 6 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Martin: Does the Prime Minister agree that it is a scandal that some pensioners have died from hypothermia, some are living below the poverty line and some cannot turn on the heating because they fear the very high electricity and gas charges? What will the Prime Minister do for our elderly citizens?

The Prime Minister: I gave the figures in answer to another question, but I shall repeat them. When the Labour Government were in power, the amount available for heating addition was £90 million. In 1979 deaths from hypothermia were at the highest level ever. Since then we have increased the amount available for heating to £400 million and there are amounts for severe weather payments. May I also remind the hon. Gentleman that in the lifetime of the Labour Government the price of electricity went up by 6 per cent. every four months and that under this Government the price of electricity has gone up only by 6 per cent. in three years? So pensioners have had a far better deal under this Government than they ever had under a Labour Government.

British Leyland

3.30 pm

Mr. Stan Thorne (Preston) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement regarding Lancashire Enterprise Ltd.'s firm indication of interest in respect of the purchase of British Leyland.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Paul Channon): I understand from BL that Hill Samuel has offered a meeting this week with Lancashire Enterprise Ltd. to explore further the nature of its proposals following its preliminary expression of interest indicated to Hill Samuel on 4 March.

Mr. Thorne: That reply comes to me as a surprise, particularly if we refer to the statement made yesterday in the House by the Secretary of State, from which I quote:

"The deputation was given a full opportunity to declare a firm indication of interest but it did not do so."

In reply to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith)——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman please paraphrase?

Mr. Thorne: By inviting me to paraphrase, Mr. Speaker, you are inviting me to do what the Secretary of State did yesterday — deliberately or otherwise to mislead the House. I do not wish to do that, so I am quoting what the Secretary of State said.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must stick to the rules.

Mr. Thorne: I shall read, because I am talking about what the Secretary of State said.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Gentleman is out of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Thorne) knows that we have a very busy day ahead of us. Will he please get on with his supplementary question?

Mr. Thorne: I am doing my best to be brief, Mr. Speaker, but if you continue to interrupt I shall be in difficulty. In regard to LEL, the Secretary of State said: "every assistance was given to it to try to get it into a position to make a firm indication of interest, but I understand that by last night it had not given any such indications." — [Official Report, 5 March 1986; Vol. 93, c. 312-16.]

That statement was made by the Secretary of State in spite of the fact that LEL, the firm I am talking about, had already sent a telex to Hill Samuel which read as follows——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I granted the hon. Gentleman a private notice question, not an Adjournment debate. He must ask a question, please.

Mr. Thorne: You draw attention to the fact that you granted the private notice question, Mr. Speaker. I assume that you did so on the basis of my being able at least to give the facts to the House——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a private notice question. Will the hon. Gentleman please ask a question?

Mr. Thorne: If I were to ask a short question of the Secretary of State, it would be why he misled the House yesterday but, to do that, I have to demonstrate the basis for my claim that he misled the House. That is why I shall read to you, Mr. Speaker, the telex that was sent to Hill Samuel at 6.25 pm on 4 March. It said:

"This telex is intended to formally confirm that interest prior to tonight's deadline".

In other works, LEL got its name before Hill Samuel before the midnight deadline on 4 March.

Mr. Channon: I did not mislead the House yesterday. I have checked carefully what I said yesterday, and it was wholly accurate. By the appropriate night, Lancashire Enterprises Ltd. had not put in a firm intention to make a bid which those whom I described to the House yesterday had done. Nevertheless, Hill Samuel has helpfully offered a meeting. It seems to me that that is a helpful suggestion, not an unhelpful one, and I cannot understand why the hon. Gentleman is making a fuss.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the pressure for consideration of LEL's offer has the support of all parties on Lancashire county council, including the Conservative party, and the support of my Conservative-controlled borough council? Does he agree that, in view of the wide disparity between the time allocated for General Motors to consider the matter and that available for other bidders, some flexibility should be granted when a definite interest is involved, such as my right hon. Friend has generously been able to do in relation to Leyland Bus?

Mr. Channon: There should be the meeting which Hill Samuel has suggested with LEL, and then all these matters can be examined.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Is not the Secretary of State aware that one of the reasons why Lancashire Enterprises Ltd. was not able to declare a "firm indication of interest"—the right hon. Gentleman's words—until late on Tuesday night was that Hill Samuel had repeatedly refused to grant it the necessary documentation to put together proposals? Although we are glad to learn that, at this late stage, the Secretary of State has relented, as has Hill Samuel, to declare that negotiations with LEL must go ahead, will he instruct Hill Samuel to give LEL exactly the same documentation as was received by General Motors?

Mr. Channon: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, that is not exactly true. Unlike all the other people, LEL has not signed a confidentiality agreement — [HON. MEMBERS: "It has not been asked."] It most certainly has been asked. There were telephone conversations last week, and still no action was taken. With respect to the hon. Gentleman, I am afraid that he is grossly exaggerating the situation. Nevertheless, Hill Samuel has offered a meeting. That seems an extremely helpful way forward. We should see what happens.

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): Of the offers that were in by the deadline, especially that of Lonrho, did any involve the introduction to Land Rover of a high technology plant?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question is out of order. The private notice question relates to Lancashire Enterprises Ltd.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Will the Minister now answer this question directly? As the giant American consortium General Motors has had 18 months to put its bid together, will he give the House a clear indication that this bid, which is British and local, will not be — [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. All this takes up a great deal of time.

Mr. Ashdown: I will have my question. Will the Secretary of State give an undertaking that the bid, which is British and local, will not be decided on the grounds of a technicality?

Mr. Channon: I made the position clear regarding General Motors yesterday. Nothing has changed since 3.30 yesterday afternoon. In fact, Hill Samuel offered a meeting with Lancashire Enterprises Ltd. at 11 o'clock yesterday morning. When I came into the Chamber, no reply had been received. It seemed to me a helpful step that there should be a meeting to allow them to get on with it.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): My right hon. Friend might agree that there are few more nauseating noises than those made by someone who wants an American takeover one week and a British flag-waving operation the next. Leaving that aside, can my right hon. Friend help me? He has not yet managed to convince me that the Government are genuinely even-handed in their assessment of the General Motors bid as opposed to this bid and the other British bids. He has not yet managed to convince me that genuine equality of information has been offered for this bidder and for the other British bidders as opposed to the information offered to General Motors. Could he please try harder?

Mr. Channon: I tried hard at the same time yesterday afternoon to satisfy my hon. Friend. I am happy to come down every afternoon and do my best. I can only repeat the answer that I gave my hon. Friend yesterday, which assured him that we were treating all the firm indications of bids with extreme care.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): The Secretary of State will understand that we are looking forward with interest to his daily appearances next week. Before then, can he answer two simple questions? First, is it not the case that Lancashire Enterprises Ltd. showed its firm interest before what he called the "close of play"? Secondly, what is the purpose of this meeting? Will it be open to the Government to receive a bid from Lancashire Enterprises Ltd. as a result of what transpires at the meeting? Will he please answer that yes or no?

Mr. Channon: It is clear that LEL did not put in a firm intention to make a bid by the appropriate time. However, at the same time, it did put in a telex which I have described to the House and to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. I understand from Hill Samuel that the purpose of the meeting which it suggested was to explore all those points. If suitable assurances can be found, I would not wish to rule out anyone on a technicality.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does it arise directly out of questions?

Mr. Butterfill: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take it, then.

Mr. Butterfill: You will have heard the question from the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden), Mr. Speaker, relating to the dismissal of local councillors and you may have seen early-day motion 547 in the name of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) calling for the dismissal of the judges who disqualified those councillors.

[That this House regards with grave concern the decision of Mr. Justice Glidewell, Mr. Justice Caulfield and Mr. Justice Russell to disqualify democratically elected councillors from Liverpool and Lambeth; notes that judges are themselves appointed and not elected; and calls for the immediate dismissal of these judges.]

Is it not a gross abuse of this House to use an early-day motion to call for the dismissal of judges whose duty it is to uphold the laws made by the House?

Mr. Speaker: It is perfectly in order. In fact, the only way in which it is possible to criticise a judge is to put down a motion.

Business of the House

3.44 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House to state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 10 MARCH—Debate on a motion to take note of the 1986 farm price proposals and the proposed milk outgoers scheme. Details of relevant EC documents will be given in the Official Report.

Debate on a motion on the second report of the Privileges Committee in Session 1984-85 (House of Commons paper No. 555).

TUESDAY 11 MARCH—Until about Seven o'clock debate on a motion to take note of EC document 5635/85 relating to a common policy and liberalisation of shipping. Details of relevant documents will be given in the Official Report.

Motions on the Local Government (Temporary Provisions) (Northern Ireland) Order and the Appropriation (Northern Ireland) Order.

At Ten o'clock the Question will be put on all outstanding supplementary Estimates and Votes.

WEDNESDAY 12 MARCH — Opposition Day (10th Allotted Day). Until about Seven o'clock a debate entitled "The City" followed by a debate entitled "Support for Students in Further and Higher Education". Both debates will arise on Opposition motions.

Afterwards, a debate on a motion to take note of EC documents relating to Community steel. Details of the documents concerned will be given in the Official Report.

THURSDAY 13 MARCH — Proceedings on the Consolidated Fund (No. 2) Bill.

FRIDAY 14 MARCH—Private Members' motions.

MONDAY 17 MARCH—Progress on remaining stages of the Gas Bill (1st Allotted Day).

The House will wish to know, Mr. Speaker, that it will be proposed that the House should rise for the Easter Adjournment on Thursday 27 March until Tuesday 8 April.

Mr. Kinnock: I am tempted to ask the Leader of the House whether he will take up the kindly offer of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to provide us with daily statements on the continuing saga of the British Leyland affair. If we have daily statements, they will have to be made before the close of play and we shall have to call the period injury time.

In answering questions yesterday, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry refused repeatedly to give a time scale or timetable for the sale of Land Rover, Freight Rover, Leyland Trucks and related businesses. Today's press reports suggest that the Government plan to complete the sale by Easter. Can the right hon. Gentleman tell me whether that is true? Will he ensure that in any event the House is given time to debate the matter before we rise for the Easter recess on 27 March?

In view of the sentiments expressed by a senior spokesman for the President of the United States about that Administration's hostility towards Nicaragua and its readiness to contemplate the use of military force against that country, will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that the Foreign Secretary makes a statement next week on the Government's attitude towards President Reagan's policy? If his policy was carried into effect, it would pose a further threat to the stability of the central American region.

In view of the apparently well-founded story in this morning's edition of the Financial Times about proposals for narrowly limiting the future programme content and powers of the BBC, will the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that no action will be taken in that direction until the House has had a chance to consider it and to raise objections to it?

Mr. Biffen: The time scale and timetable, to quote the words of the Leader of the Opposition, for the handling of Leyland were outlined yesterday in the House by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

As for a debate on the matter this side of the Easter recess, perhaps that is something that we can consider through the usual channels. I shall convey to my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary the right hon. Gentleman's anxiety that he should make a statement on the policy of the United States towards Nicaragua.

Finally, I must confess that I do not have the same zeal for reading the capitalist press as the right hon. Gentleman and I have not seen the references in the Financial Times to the future of the BBC. However, I am sure that it is a subject that would merit debate in the House.

Mr. Tom Sackville (Bolton, West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the House has not yet received satisfactory answers to the issue of the 200 acres of opium poppies that are said to have been grown experimentally this year? Does not this growing of opium poppies make nonsense of the Government's eradication programme overseas as well as of the attempts of the police and Customs and Excise to interdict the importation of heroin? Will my right hon. Friend allocate time to debate this issue fully?

Mr. Biffen: I must confess that I came into the Chamber with a virginal innocence about opium poppy growing in the United Kingdom. It seems pre-eminently a matter to be raised during the proceedings on the Consolidated Fund Bill.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Although I regret the official Opposition's decision not to support our request for a debate on the future of historic buildings and monuments, especially Kenwood House at Hampstead heath, will the Leader of the House arrange for a debate on our prayer in a Committee of the House?

Mr. Biffen: I certainly hope that we could make arrangements for it to be debated upstairs.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Is my right hon. Friend aware that I am not asking for a debate next week on early-day motion 280 which now has the support of 170 hon. Members—

[That this House notes the widespread concern felt in Parliament by eminent scientists, by other responsible observers and by members of the public who have viewed programmes on the matter screened by Channel 4, that Anne Maguire, Patrick Maguire (senior) Vincent Maguire (then aged 17), Patrick Maguire (then aged 14), Sean Smyth, Patrick O'Neill and the late Giuseppe Conlon, sentenced in 1976 to long terms of imprisonment since served, now appear, despite confirmation of their convictions at the time by the Court of Appeal, to have been entirely innocent of the crime with which they were charged; further notes at the conclusion of debate in the other place on 17th May 1985, the recognition by the Parliamentary Under Secretary at the Home Office of the strength of feeling on this matter in that House and his pledge to draw the attention of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to what had been said; and therefore earnestly urges the Secretary of State for the Home Department in the interests of the highest standards of British justice of which this country needs to feel rightly proud, to move without delay for a review of these convictions, either under the provisions of section 17 of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968, or by such other public process of review as he may deem appropriate to this disturbing case.]— but I am asking him to ensure that we have an early statement from the Home Secretary or perhaps a Law Officer of the Crown to allay the growing misgivings in the House and the country about the miscarriage of justice in the Maguire case?

Mr. Biffen: I acknowledge my hon. Friend's central role in raising a wide degree of parliamentary interest in this topic. I will refer his request to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Meanwhile, I hope that he will not totally dismiss the possibility of using the Consolidated Fund as providing an opportunity to raise the matter.

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): As joint treasurer of the United Kingdom branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, of which you, Mr. Speaker, are president and the Prime Minister is the chairman, may I draw attention to early-day motion 528?

[That this House joins with all other parliaments throughout the Commonwealth in the observance of Commonwealth Day on Monday 10th March 1986; and recognises the importance of the work of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association which brings together parliamentarians throughout the Commonwealth who share a community of interest and the positive ideals of parliamentary democracy.]

Is the Leader of the House prepared to associate the Government and this House with that expression of Commonwealth good will in connection with Commonwealth day on Monday? Will he take this opportunity to welcome Commonwealth parliamentarians from all over the world who are presently our guests?

Mr. Biffen: As long as we understand that the Commonwealth is fairly intangible in its implications, I shall be very happy to give my good will to the motion.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Will my right hon. Friend consider providing time for an urgent debate on the vexing question of the entry of child brides into the United Kingdom? When my right hon. Friend is considering such a debate, will he bear in mind that the British section within the Swedish embassy in Tehran, by issuing the visa, has knowingly commissioned a crime in the United Kingdom of unlawful sexual intercourse with girls under the age of 16? It is therefore an accessory before the fact. Such a debate would give us the opportunity of expanding more fully the notion "When in Britain do as the British do or go back to your country of origin."

Mr. Biffen: I note what my hon. Friend says. The Home Office has already said that it intends to take action in respect of the child bride issue which has recently become topical. I advise my hon. Friend to seek the many opportunities that he will have to raise this issue on his own account.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Will the Leader of the House find time in the not-too-distant future for a debate on the subject of building safety standards? A recent written answer I received stated that no fewer than 25,000 people were injured last year in their own homes by coming into contact with glass in door frames, window frames or other matters. It seems clear that the glass is too thin and that our standards are wholly inadequate.

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman raises a point which probably falls within the authority of the Department of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. I will certainly make sure that my right hon. Friend is made aware of the matter.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Does the ewelcome absence next week of the Second Reading of the Shops Bill mean that my right hon. Friend might be thinking again on this matter and that it might go down the black hole along with the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill?

Mr. Biffen: That is an interesting speculation. Whatever I say will be read as a coded language to the world outside, but I have to say to my hon. Friend that the answer is, purely and simply, no.

Sir Adam Butler (Bosworth): May I press my right hon. Friend on the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham)? There have been newspaper reports to the effect that the Government are having second thoughts. I must ask him to recognise the very strong opposition to the Shops Bill. That opposition has been expressed to almost all Members of this House who have received many letters from their constituents, and there is also opposition within the House.

Mr. Biffen: The planned progress of this legislation is the very opposite of suggesting that the Government propose to abandon it.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Does not the Leader of the House consider it sad that the Government have not made a statement in this House on the assassination of Mr. Olof Palme, the Prime Minister of Sweden? He spent his life striving not only for the betterment of the Swedish people but internationally for peace, justice and the cause of peoples in the Third world.

Mr. Biffen: The precedents that have been observed in this case are absolutely consistent with what has happened on many occasions hitherto. I am sure that in all quarters of the House there will be deep regret about the assassination, and gratification that the British Government were represented at the funeral.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): I note that the Opposition have, rather surprisingly, chosen a different subject for their Supply day next week, but will my right hon. Friend look favourably on the possibility of a debate in which the Leader of the Opposition will have the opportunity to express his profound thanks to the High Court for doing the job with the loony council that he wanted done?

Mr. Biffen: Given the many roads that I must tread in contrary directions, the best way to answer that is to congratulate my hon. Friend on his ingenuity.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): The Leader of the House has often been asked questions about scandals in the City of London. Could he arrange for a debate to be held in the near future on the Government's competition policy, bearing in mind the chaos in connection with takeover bids, and the extraordinary decisions that are being made by the Director General of Fair Trading? I am thinking in particular of both of the Guinness bids and both of the Argyll bids for Distillers, and the Hanson bid—Lord Hanson happens to be a staunch supporter of the Prime Minister—the Sikorsky-Westland deal, United Biscuits and many other decisions. They are wholly inconsistent with the avowed policy of first taking public interest into consideration. Will the Minister look into that because it is a serious matter which smells and savours of fraud?

Mr. Biffen: Leaving aside the innuendo, which is unworthy of the hon. Gentleman, if he genuinely wishes to attend to this topic, he will certainly have a chance next week during questions to the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Has my right hon. Friend noticed that various London boroughs, including Ealing, Chelsea, and Fulham and Hammersmith, have announced substantial rate reductions following the abolition of the GLC, which doubled the rates when the present Labour group took it over in 1981? May we have an early debate on the matter, and include in it the fact that the GLC is at present giving £81,000 to Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament groups to set up spurious nuclear-free zones in London, and is fighting in the courts to give away £96 million to various other spurious groups? Would not that £96 million be handy in the hands of pensioners to assist in solving their heating problems?

Mr. Biffen: I am sorry to disappoint my hon. Friend, but I can hold out no prospect of such a debate in Government time in the near future. I hope that he will feel that he has the consolation that by the skilful way in which he put the question he has practically made the speech that would have occurred to him if such a debate were held.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): In view of the earlier comments on the surcharges on Lambeth and Liverpool councillors and in the absence of a statement or debate on the matter, the Leader of the House will not be surprised to learn that in the City debate contrasts could well be drawn between the way in which the Prime Minister and Chancellor of the Exchequer protected the villains of the Johnson Matthey bank, and gave aid and succour to the crooks at Lloyd's who are now in America and elsewhere, having got away with £13 million, and the way in which the 80 councillors stood by their promises, mandate and people and gave the services to their electors which the Government failed to provide.

Mr. Biffen: I note that the hon. Gentleman kindly gives me an indication of what I might hear if I am in my place during next Wednesday's debate, should he be called. He will do the Conservative party a great service if he sets out to be the protector of those who have recently been found guilty in the courts.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): Can my right hon. Friend say how the House is to be kept informed about the critical multi-fibre arrangement negotiations? Will there be a statement in the House next week after the meting of the Council of Ministers on Monday and Tuesday? If the House is not satisfied that the Government's attitude is sufficiently robust, will he promise an opportunity for an early debate?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend will be aware that we have frequently had negotiations about the multi-fibre arrangement and I am certain that the same parliamentary formality will apply on this occasion as has applied hitherto. I will certainly draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to the anxiety that has just been expressed.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): The last time that the Leader of the House looked at my early-day motion on Sadler's Wells he made a claim for entry in the "Guinness Book of Records" as the greatest philistine in the House. However, at the same time he said that there was a possibility that he would discuss the matter with the Minister for the Arts. Has he done so?

Mr. Biffen: Yes, and I will be in touch with the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Bearing in mind that the Shops Bill will arouse great bitterness and will be strongly contested in this House, does my right hon. Friend plan that, when the Bill comes before the House, the Government will announce that they are prepared to accept a concession of substance which, while reconciling the law with modern needs, will nevertheless preserve the special character of Sunday?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend will be the first to appreciate that that is a responsibility of the Minister in charge of the Bill. I will certainly draw the Minister's attention to that point.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I draw the attention of the House to the fact that there is an Opposition day ahead of us, and it is only a half day. A large number of right hon. and hon. Members wish to take part. Will hon. Members please put their questions very briefly?

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Has the Leader of the House seen the report in The Guardian today suggesting that Trafalgar House has been given the green light to take over Vickers of Barrow? As that has implications for thousands of jobs in the county of Cumbria, will he ensure that a statement is made next week which will set out precisely what the position is in relation to these negotiations?

Mr. Biffen: I will draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to that point. I appreciate its importance. Meanwhile, the hon. Gentleman will be aware that that Department will be answering questions on Wednesday.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): Will my right hon. Friend, in his new-found wisdom, reconsider his suggestion that the Consolidated Fund would provide an appropriate opportunity to debate the question of growing opium poppies? Will he find time for a major debate in Government time to discuss drugs misuse about which the Government are doing so much in so many ways and yet, in this particular area, are running contrary to their own thrust?

Mr. Biffen: I am grateful for the fact that my hon. Friend attributes wisdom to me, although it is slightly tarnished by the suggestion that it is newly found. However, I cannot reasonably and helpfully say more than I have about the possibility of a debate in the next few days.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): As the Leader of the House confirmed on the radio last Sunday that the buck finishes with him in the way that we run this place, will he find time next week to come to the third floor of Norman Shaw North and inspect the loos and the windows, and witness the draught from the windows and the lifts that do not work, and do something about them?

Mr. Biffen: I am not intimidated by a question like that. I will gladly do what the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it might be an instructive experience for the House and particularly for Oppositon Members to debate matters in which Government policy has been conspicuously successful? Does he feel that a few hours of Government time could be agreeably passed in debating the way in which the fall in the price of oil has been weathered without any catastrophic rise in interest rates or a collapse in sterling?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend makes an extremely pertinent point and underlines the importance of having a liberal economic structure and liberal foreign exchange rates. I will bear in mind my hon. Friend's points, although I confess that I cannot offer an immediate prospect of a debate in Government time. Whenever there is Government time available, his suggestion will be an early candidate for debate.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the Leader of the House ensure that before the House rises for the Easter recess a full and thorough debate is held on the Government's immigration and refugee policy, particularly in the light of revelations earlier this week that one Conservative Member claimed that the real purpose of the Home Secretary's proposed guidelines to immigration controls is to prevent Members of Parliament from taking up immigration cases? Does he not think that that is an extremely serious matter and that the experience of many hon. Members during the Christmas recess, when there was clearly a difference in attitude expressed by the immigration authorities, should not be repeated during the Easter recess? For that reason alone, an urgent debate is necessary.

Mr. Biffen: The way that the hon. Gentleman has put his case does not make me an immediate captive of it. I do not accept in any sense his premise. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has already said to the House that he would like an early opportunity to debate the proposals on the new guidelines on immigration. The timing of any debate on that topic is perhaps best left for discussion through the usual channels.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): When the Local Government Bill returns to the House, will my right hon. Friend ensure that steps are taken to toughen the Bill? The idea that local government proceeds in a spirit of gentlemanly co-operation is not widely shared by the Labour councillors on Leicester city council. They recently voted another £2,500 to the Labour national local government unit and a similar sum to the local peace action group.

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that my hon. and learned Friend will appreciate that his remarks are better directed at the Minister in charge of the Bill. I will draw the Minister's attention to his point. Opinions expressed in another place properly have a call upon the time of this House.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Has the Leader of the House had time to study early-day motion 500 signed by 126 hon. Members from both sides of the House and the amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner)?

[That this House expresses concern at the recently published consultation documents relating to the Disabled

[Mr. Tom Clarke]

Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill; would regret any steps that might remove or emasculate vital clauses of this Bill, including those which safeguard the interests of carers of persons leaving long-stay hospitals or leaving full-time education by providing a coherent personal plan to meet their individual needs; and while accepting the duty to avoid unnecessary bureaucracy, declares that it is inconceivable that services to meet the needs of disabled people can be adequately planned if they are not subject to prior assessment; recognises the overwhelming support for these objectives of the Bill amongst disablement organisations; and calls on the Government to allow the Bill to reach the Statute Book without weakening its provisions.]

Does he appreciate that the Government's consultation document which invited a response received that response yesterday and that the overwhelming reaction of the people consulted and chosen by the Government supported the Bill in its present form? Will he use his considerable influence to ensure that the Bill is undiluted on report and is given the Third Reading which public opinion expects?

Mr. Biffen: I believe that we had this identical exchange a week ago——

Mr. Clarke: No, we did not.

Mr. Biffen: It sounded the same. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman understands that I am obliged to take a muted view about what happens upstairs in Standing Committee, but I note what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): My right hon. Friend may recall that from time to time he receives complaints about the leaking of Minister's speeches or Minister's statements. Of course that never happens, but he does receive complaints about it. Is he aware that I have a copy of the speech which the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) will make this afternoon? The deadline for release of that speech is 3.30 pm. The hon. Gentleman has not been in the Chamber and he is not in the Chamber now. Is that an abuse of the House, or is the hon. Gentleman simply being opimistic in believing that anybody will be bothered to read his speech?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend raises an interesting point. I am stricken to know whether it has such novelty as to require consideration by the Procedure Committee or such outrage as to require examination by the Privileges Committee.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): In view of the physical attacks on Her Majesty's Ministers and Members of Parliament at universities and colleges during the past few months, will my right hon. Friend arrange a debate on that matter? Will he arrange for a statement to be made by the Secretary of State for Education and Science about discipline in universities and a statement by the Home Secretary about what assistance the police can give in such situations?

Mr. Biffen: It is obviously improper for me to suggest what may or may not be in order in the second of the debates chosen for Wednesday. I should have thought that any discussion on higher education could well cover the points raised by my hon. Friend as they are very pertinent.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): As a member of the General Synod, may I welcome, for a change, my right hon. Friend's business statement? Presumably he has read early-day motion 90, which has been signed by more than 90 Members.

[That this House, noting the strength of feelings on the issue of the liberalisation of Sunday trading laws, believes that any votes on this subjct should not be the subject of a whip.]

I assume that my right hon. Friend has also seen early-day motion 538.

[That this House calls upon the Government to seek to amend the Shops Bill [Lords] so as to preserve the special character of Sunday and to have regard for the principles and conscience of those who would be affected by the total de-regulation of Sunday trading.]

The motion, signed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Sir A. Butler), calls for a traditional Sunday. Will he ensure that the debate in the House on the Second Reading of the Shops Bill is postponed for as long as possible? In looking at traditions in society, will he spare a thought for the people of Leicester who, for 50 years, have had alternating Conservative and Labour lords mayor each year? Suddenly, because there are 42 Labour council members, the Leicester people have been told they cannot have a Conservative lord mayor again. I hope that we will return to the traditional Sunday and to traditional ways of life, with alternating Conservative and Labour lords mayor each year.

Mr. Biffen: I must say that the traditional Sunday as observed on the Welsh border never gets entangled with mayoral politics. I am sorry that that should be so in Leicester. On the wider issue, may I say to my hon. Friend that, if I note with respect and almost reverence his points about Sunday, it is not to imply that there is any alteration whatsoever in Government policy. I must emphasise that whipping is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Will my right hon. Friend be kind enough to read the eloquent speech of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) during last night's European debate in which he set out, as only he could, the procedure whereby, when we considered the European Communities Bill, the House was able to look at the legislation line by line and to amend it bit by bit, because it transferred powers from the House of Commons to other institutions? As we shall shortly consider the Single European Act, does my right hon. Friend agree that it would be totally wrong not to allow an identical facility for amendment to the House when it is considering further transfers of powers?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly look at that point.

Teachers' Dispute (Scotland)

4.11 pm

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the teachers' dispute in Scotland.

This dispute has now run for nearly 19 months. The education of pupils is suffering increasing disruption, and continuation of the dispute can do nothing but harm. The Government have made repeated efforts to find an acceptable basis on which teachers and their employers could negotiate a settlement, yet formal negotiations have not even begun.

This situation is unsatisfactory from any point of view. It is also in marked contrast to events in England and Wales, where, as the House will be aware, an agreement for the current year has been reached and constructive negotiations on pay, pay structure and related matters are about to begin under the auspices of the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service. I very much regret that there is no sign of a similar initiative in Scotland. The statutory negotiating machinery has failed to function and it is therefore necessary to find some means of breaking the deadlock. I therefore propose to set up an independent committee of inquiry with wide-ranging terms of reference in an effort to bring this dispute to an end and establish a basis for the pay, conditions of service and management of the teaching profession in Scotland which is appropriate to the conditions of today.

The inquiry will accordingly be given the following terms of reference:

In the light of the Government's education objectives and the need to observe continuing public expenditure restraint in the interests of taxpayers and ratepayers, to consider:

(a) the duties, pay structure, pay levels and other conditions of service of school teachers, with particular regard to the need to recruit, retain and motivate teachers of the right quality, to address staffing difficulties in shortage areas such as mathematics and science and in particular localities, and to improve the promotion and career prospects of effective teachers, particularly experienced teachers of proven ability who remain in the classroom;

(b) teachers' duties and responsibilities and their definition in contracts of employment;

(c) the arrangements for managing schools and the teaching service;

(d) future arrangements for determining teachers' pay and structure, duties, responsibilities and conditions of service;

(e) the mechanisms for implementing and enforcing the above arrangements;

(f) in all respects the need to take into account what can be afforded;

and to make recommendations.

I hope to announce the names of the chairman and members shortly. The committee will be asked to begin work as soon as possible and to report by the end of the summer so that its findings can be taken into account in the 1986-87 pay settlement. The committee will take evidence from all interested parties and will give the teachers the hearing for which they have asked since the beginning of the dispute. I therefore expect—I believe I shall be supported by both sides of the House in this—that the teachers' unions will call off their industrial action forthwith and allow the life of the schools to return to normal. I hope that teachers and employers will in the meantime agree on a pay settlement for 1985-86 in the normal way while they await the committee's findings on the wider issues.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): As one who complains when the Secretary of State or his Ministers make statements not to the House but outside the House, may I make it clear that I welcome the fact that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has made this important statement to the House, giving himself the opportunity to be asked and to answer questions and to recognise, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman obviously does, the serious damage that he and his Government have done to education in Scotland during the past 19 months. I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that it is incredible that teachers asked in June 1984 for an independent committee of inquiry and that it took the right hon. and learned Gentleman's predecessor, the right hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger) until November 1984—six months—to respond by refusing that request? Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that everything that has happened since is a direct consequence of the way in which the then Secretary of State dealt with the request? The right hon. Gentleman and the Government are entirely responsible for today's crisis in Scottish education.

How independent does the right hon. and learned Gentleman think the inquiry will be, in view of the fact that he has imposed two major restraints on it:

"the need to observe continuing public expenditure restraint" applied by the Government at the beginning of the terms of reference—and "the need to take into account what can be afforded"

at the end of the terms of reference? Who will tell the inquiry what can be afforded? At what stage during its deliberations will it be told? Surely the right hon. and learned Gentleman will accept that no inquiry can possibly be independent if it works within such tight constraints.

I fully accept that this is a wide-ranging inquiry. I welcome that fact. Will the Secretary of State take account of the wide-ranging nature and detail of the inquiry in determining the date by which it should report? Because of its wide-ranging nature, it may well be that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is asking too much of the inquiry in requiring it to report by the end of the summer. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman assure me that the criterion for the inquiry will be that of thoroughness rather than speed? The inquiry's recommendations may well have to endure for a long time. I assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman that I, for one, would not want thoroughness to be made the victim of speed so that he can have his report quickly.

Is the Secretary of State aware that a great deal will depend on the chairmanship and membership of the inquiry? I plead with him to take fully into account the backgrounds of the people he decides to appoint as the chairman and members of the inquiry, in terms of their knowledge of education and wage negotiations. Bearing in mind that this dispute relates to the salary year beginning 1985, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman explain why the inquiry's pay recommendations will be implemented only from the pay year beginning 1986? Why will it not be backdated to the pay year 1985, the date of the dispute?

In suggesting to the teachers and management that they should negotiate a settlement for 1985-86, is the Secretary of State asking that this settlement should be negotiated within the current pay guidelines, or is he prepared to give some of the £125 million about which he has been telling us for the past year to the local authorities to supplement a pay settlement for that year?

To put the minds of Conservative Members at ease, I make it clear that I welcome this inquiry and I welcome the courage that has been shown by the Secretary of State. However, I condemn most strongly the way in which the Government have handled this dispute, thereby seriously damaging the education prospects of our children. Contrary to what is believed, the Secretary of State looks a pretty sight standing on his head, and he should do it more often.

Mr. Rifkind: I thank the hon. Member for his welcome of my statement, although I regret that he has not yet echoed my call for the unions to withdraw all industrial action. I am sure that he will want to do that and I hope that he will find an early opportunity to do so.

Any fair-minded person would take the view that the damage caused to the education fabric of Scottish schools over the past 18 months must be the responsibility of those who have put the interests of the youngsters second to their industrial dispute. I think that the vast majority of Scottish people will believe that.

The hon. Member referred to the EIS demands over the past 18 months. He will be aware that it has been seeking an inquiry into pay. There will be one but, as I said in the statement, it is also appropriate that there should be an inquiry into conditions of employment, contracts of service and the whole range of issues referred to in my statement. That is not something that the Government alone believe; as the hon. Gentleman well knows, the education authorities, Labour-controlled as well as Conservative-controlled, have insisted that any outcome to this dispute must involve a package that covers conditions of service as well as pay. It is unfortunate that, up to today, the EIS has refused to acknowledge that fact. I believe that the whole spectrum of political opinion in Scotland has associated itself with that view, as has the hon. Member on a number of occasions.

The hon. Gentleman asked how independent the inquiry will be. The members of the inquiry will be free to make whatever recommendations they believe appropriate. He tried to take issue with the fact that the terms of reference refer to public expenditure restraint and the need to take into account the interest of taxpayers and ratepayers. The general public will not find that inappropriate or unreasonable. It is right, in determining the education objectives that we have at any given time, that we also take into account what can be afforded by the country at that time. I emphasise that the members of the inquiry will be free to make any recommendations that they feel are appropriate, having heard the evidence put to them, and that freedom will extend to all the matters within its consideration.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether the report of the inquiry had to be provided by the end of the summer. It is appropriate to try to work towards that target because teachers themselves wish an early outcome to this protracted matter. He also asked why we have not backdated any outcome or any recommendations of the inquiry to the year 1985-86. Even at this date, 19 months into the dispute, the unions have yet to put in a pay claim for 1985-86. Therefore, it would be inappropriate to take action such as that which he suggested.

I hope, if the hon. Member catches your eye, Mr. Speaker, at the end of the time allowed for questions, that he will use the opportunity to give Opposition support to the call that I have made for the unions to cease industrial action forthwith.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I again draw the attention of the House to the point that we have an important Opposition debate ahead of us, but only half a day for it, and a large number of right hon. and hon. Members wish to take part. I shall allow questions on this statement to continue for 20 minutes.

Mr. Roy Jenkins (Glasgow, Hillhead): I welcome this statement. It will now clearly be right for the unions to take all action to bring the schools back to normal while the inquiry is going on, in so far as the position can be restored to normal after the damage that I fear has been done. The right hon. and learned Gentleman did not attempt to explain in his first answer why 19 months was allowed to go by. Without wishing to go into calendar competitiveness, my hon. Friend the Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) and I put precisely those proposals for a wide-ranging inquiry to the right hon. and learned Gentleman's predecessor in October 1984. What is the reason for having allowed this delay and the damage to Scottish education over the past 19 months?

Mr. Rifkind: I welcome the right hon. Gentleman's welcome for the statement and in particular his support for my call that the unions should withdraw all industrial action and allow the schools to return to normality. As to the other matters, repeated attempts were made both by my right hon. Friend the previous Secretary of State and other interested parties to get the parties together to begin the negotiations. Unfortunately, right up to this day, the EIS has refused to become involved in negotiations. It is because the existing negotiating machinery has been seen to be ineffective in helping to resolve the dispute that it is necessary for Government to intervene to break the deadlock.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): In view of the failure of the Scottish joint negotiating committee to find a solution to this problem I warmly welcome the investigation into pay and conditions of service and structure of teaching. I hope that the teachers will also accept this package. Will my right hon. and learned Friend make it a condition of acceptance of this package that the teachers stop any further disruption of education in Scotland?

Mr. Rifkind: An inquiry is to take place, and it is not subject to the approval of any particular quarter. However, I think that the public in Scotland will find it unthinkable that, while an inquiry is going on into pay and other matters involved, such as conditions of service, teachers will take strike action, boycott exams or carry out other acts of disruption against the youngsters in their care.

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): Will the Secretary of State give assurances that any new machinery for determining the salaries and conditions of service applied to teachers will fully recognise the teachers' organisations and will not remove or diminish the teachers' right to belong to a trade union?

Mr. Rifkind: The inquiry is free to make any recommendations that it wishes, and the Government will then have to consider the recommendations. The Government attach great importance to the rights of teachers to belong to trade unions, and I cannot conceive of any circumstances in which that right would be changed.

Mr. Alex Fletcher (Edinburgh, Central): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on the robust and realistic nature of the terms of reference for the inquiry. Will he ensure that parents are also robustly represented on the committee and that those teachers, unions that do not now cease industrial action are barred from the review?

Mr. Rifkind: The inquiry will be free to take evidence from such quarters as it thinks appropriate. I consider it desirable that the individuals serving on the inquiry will be appointed on the basis of their individual contributions and not necessarily in regard to any representative qualities that they might have. One will take into account the background and experience of the individuals concerned.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman understand that I very much welcome his statement and that I appeal to the teachers to end their industrial dispute, upon one condition? Their morale is at the lowest ebb that I can remember. Unless and until the Secretary of State says that he will treat the teachers' pay claim for 1985-86 as generously as the judges, admirals and the rest were treated, I fear that there will still be difficulties ahead for him. Does he understand that in the light of the terms of reference many people think that the timetable is very tight?

Mr. Rifkind: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's call to the teachers to cease their industrial disruption. As for his qualification, I have to emphasise to him that the Educational Institute of Scotland and the other unions have insisted all along that they have no desire to put in a claim because they wish there to be an inquiry that will look into these matters and make long-term recommendations. It is appropriate, therefore, that the inquiry should proceed on the basis that I have outlined.

Mrs. Anna McCurley (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept my congratulations upon his excellent plan for an inquiry, which is worthy of Solomon? It should satisfy employers, parents and all teachers who wish the strike action to be ended and the profession to be held in the highest esteem and those who have the best interests of the pupils at heart. It is particularly encouraging to those areas that have been subjected to wholly unfair targeting. Those who reject this excellent inquiry will be judged accordingly.

Mr. Rifkind: I thank my hon. Friend for her kind words. All I would say is that Solomon is a slightly better comparison than I have been used to in recent weeks.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Will the Secretary of State accept that, although we welcome the fact that he has decided to set up an independent review, we regret very deeply that it has taken him 18 months to do it? I notice that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science is at his elbow, like the "hoodie craw"? Is it not an amazing coincidence that this offer is being made just two days after the English settlement? Why could not the Scottish Office have settled this at the beginning? A settlement could have been made then. I echo the points that have been made earlier in the light of what has been proposed. I hope that the teachers will call off their action and that the Government will honour the motivation behind it and ensure that they get a fair settlement this year and a properly supported outcome of this review at the end of the day.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman's comments were typical of a Liberal intervention: qualifying every remark in order that it might not sound too significant to any section of the community. I believe that the Scottish public will welcome this committee as a necessary and essential way of ensuring that the interests of Scottish youngsters are well protected.

Mr. John Corrie (Cunninghame, North): Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept that I welcome his statement? Will he also accept that I agree with the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) that this is a very wide-ranging inquiry, which will affect the shape of education for a very long time to come? Therefore it should not be rushed. It should be got right. In the meantime, will my right hon. and learned Friend try to get the two parties together to provide some advance for the teachers, who really need it?

Mr. Rifkind: I thank my hon. Friend for his welcome. I have no desire to see a rushed inquiry. Naturally, we shall reflect and take into account the views of the members of the inquiry. We are all anxious to ensure a suitable outcome. However, we hope that the inquiry will also take into account the desire of both the education authorities and the unions that this dispute, which has already been very protracted, should not be extended too far as a result of the inquiry.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Does the Secretary of State concede, in his wisdom, that this approach on his behalf would not have happened had the teachers not remained united in their view and if their unions had not remained fairly obdurate in pursuit of their claim? I wish to probe him a little upon the nature of the inquiry. If I heard him aright, the Secretary of State said that the inquiry would be fully independent and would be able to come forward with any recommendation. Will that include the possibility of an interim report on pay alone because of the need to allay fears and suspicions about the Secretary of State's restraint upon the terms of reference — which, as far as I can gather, are his terms of reference and not terms of reference agreed with the teacher unions? Can he assure me that if the body concerned wanted to come forward with an interim report on pay he would not place any impediments in its way? Moreover, is it the Secretary of State's intention to appoint as members of this inquiry any assessors from the Scottish Office?

Mr. Rifkind: I do not see any likelihood of assessors from the Scottish Office being appointed, although the Scottish Office will undoubtedly wish to give evidence to the inquiry. As for an interim report, along with all the education authorities the Government take the view that the ultimate resolution of this dispute has to be in the form of a package covering conditions of service and contracts of employment as well as pay. Therefore, an interim report on pay would be as inappropriate as an interim report on conditions of service.

Mr. Douglas: But it is not independent.

Mr. Rifkind: It is indeed independent, because the members of the inquiry are being requested to make recommendations on all of these matters. Quite naturally, we expect them to make these recommendations at the same time.

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): As one who has supported the teachers in their demand to be brought into line with the present salary structures of other professions, I welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's efforts to try to bring this very sad dispute to an end because of the effect that it has had on parents, teachers and pupils. When my right hon. and learned Friend forms this committee of investigation does he intend to look at the need to have representatives of the teaching profession on it to ensure that their point of view about the demands that they have already made can be fully aired?

Mr. Rifkind: The point of view of the teaching profession and the education authorities will be primarily made by the evidence that each of them submits to the inquiry. I said earlier that I expect the members of the inquiry to be appointed primarily in regard to the personal contribution that they can make to the work of the inquiry.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): Is the Secretary of State aware that in at least one school in my constituency there was a long industrial dispute prior to the present industrial dispute? This means that the education of many children in my constituency, an area of high unemployment, will be damaged. What steps will the Secretary of State take to try to ensure that these children catch up with their education?

Mr. Rifkind: Obviously we are all very concerned that that should be brought about. No doubt the Strathclyde education authority will be the most appropriate body to take detailed action in regard to a particular school.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): Although the Secretary of State's statement indicates a belated shift in the Government's attitude, will he admit that his claim that he is giving the teachers an independent hearing, for which they have been asking all along, is simply not true? His inquiry incorporates not just pay but conditions of service and contracts of employment. It is not exactly independent if at the outset it is placed in the finanial straitjacket of the Government's economic policy to cut public expenditure, particularly on education. Is the Secretary of State not aware of the obvious fact that the Government will get the education system for which they are prepared to pay? Will he come clean, therefore, and tell us whether at the very outset he is ruling out a restoration of the pay levels that were awarded by Houghton to the teachers over a decade ago?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is wrong in one respect and right in the other. He is wrong to suggest that the inquiry will be involved in some financial straitjacket. It will be asked to recommend what the pay of a teacher should be now, and in particular to take into account the various duties and responsibilities of teachers when coming to a view and making a recommendation on that matter. The hon. Gentleman is certainly right when he says that this inquiry goes significantly beyond the kind of inquiry that the unions have requested. It includes pay but it also deals with the other matters that the hon. Gentleman correctly mentioned. That is something that I believe a wide spectrum of opinion in Scotland has always maintained should be the case.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): Does my right hon. and learned Friend recognise that parents are absolutely sick to death of this dispute and that his statement will be widely welcomed? I hope that it will be noted by parents throughout Scotland that the Opposition Front Bench spokesman, the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing), is more concerned with dotting the i's and crossing the t's in the interests of the Educational Institute of Scotland than in welcoming this agreement and asking the EIS and the other unions to call off their action in the interests of pupils and parents.

Mr. Rifkind: I think that the House is still waiting with interest to know whether the Opposition will join my call and, indeed, the call of the Liberals and other parties, for the unions now to call off their industrial action.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): Since the independent inquiry team will be operating within the straitjacket that has been designed by the Government, why has it taken 18 months for them to concede this inquiry? Will the Secretary of State give a guarantee today that he will honour the financial recommendations that the inquiry team makes, and that that will be reflected in the rate support grant to education authorities?

Mr. Rifkind: I repeat that the inquiry will be free to make any recommendations on conditions of service, contracts of employment and pay which it thinks appropriate. Not only we but the education authorities and the unions will wish to see the whole package of recommendations that it may make before coming to any conclusions as to what then should take place.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East), I welcome the initiative the Secretary of State has taken and hope that the Scottish teachers will give it serious consideration. I wish to suggest three things to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. First, in view of the fact that teachers have been without an increase in pay for a considerable time and have suffered a depreciation in their salary levels in relative terms, will he make a generous cash offer now because, considering the fact that this is not a pay review but one relating to pay and conditions, such an offer would be useful? Can he also give attention to the question of consultation on the appointment of the independent committee so that the teachers' representatives know that this is not to be just a collection of friends of the Scottish Office? Lastly, can the Secretary of State give a better reply than that which he gave to the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) in relation to relativities and variations of pay levels? I think that such a statement, given the two inhibitions in his own statement, will go a long way to allay the fears and suspicions that many teachers could have that this is a con and not a serious offer.

Mr. Rifkind: There is no question of it being anything other than a serious contribution. If that were not so, I would be indicating constraints on the kind of recommendations that the inquiry will be free to make. I emphasise again that the inquiry will be free to make any recommendations — including recommendations on pay — which it believes to be appropriate. It will hear evidence from the various quarters and come to its own conclusions as to what it believes the pay and pay structures for Scottish teachers should be.

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): Has my right hon. and learned Friend noticed that the Opposition parties have begun to draw attention to the practical difficulties that arise from an independent review embracing both pay and conditions? Is it not the case that if the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) last February had been adopted and the Scottish joint negotiating committee has commissioned an independent review, some of the problems would have been overcome? Will he now ensure that the inquiry will go forward as speedily as is practicable and that in the meantime there will be urgent negotiations to determine a pay settlement for the last two years?

Mr. Rifkind: With regard to 1985-86 I very much hope that the unions and local authorities will get together to agree a settlement. A settlement has already been obtained for England and Wales for that year. There is nothing to stop an agreement for Scotland being reached. The inquiry will, of course, make recommendations on future pay levels. It would not be appropriate for me to pre-empt the outcome of the inquiry in the way suggested to me by some hon. Gentlemen.

Mr. Hugh Brown (Glasgow, Provan): Many of us recognise that this is not the place to conduct negotiations but, since we will be meeting the EIS in Perth tomorrow, I for one should like to be able to urge the withdrawal of industrial action. As the Secretary of State says that there will be no pay claim accepted for 1985-86, is he ruling out the review body going back to 1985-86?

Mr. Rifkind: As to 1985-86, it is for the unions to make a claim to the employers and for the employers and unions to negotiate and reach a conclusion. It has already happened elsewhere in the United Kingdom, and ought now to happen for Scotland. I welcome the hon. Gentleman's desire to call upon the unions to withdraw their industrial action so that the inquiry can take evidence and make its recommendations in an atmosphere conducive to the best interests of Scottish education.

Mr. Michael Hirst (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): Can I assure my right hon. and learned Friend that his initiative will be widely welcomed, not least in Strathkelvin and Bearsden, which has had more than its fair share of disruptive action? Is he aware that parents, public and most reasonable teachers will be reassured that duties and responsibilities are to be examined since it cannot be right that a teacher on full pay can boycott examination procedures? Does he agree that, if the EIS does not call off its industrial action and disruption of Scottish education, it will have rightly earned the condemnation of the people of Scotland?

Mr. Rifkind: I agree with my hon. Friend. I think that the vast majority of Scottish teachers, who are moderate and reasonable people, will expect their union leadership to indicate that they should now return to normal working in the schools so that the inquiry can proceed in the proper atmosphere. I repeat, I still wait for Opposition Members to make a similar call.

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): Surely the "Governor-General" will accept that a public inquiry is simply a device to get the Government off the hook, bearing in mind that very shortly the Tory party will suffer another disaster in the regional elections. Surely the point is that, unless the teachers see the colour of the Government's money, they should continue with their industrial action because that is the only effective action they can take at the end of the day.

Mr. Rifkind: I think that the hon. Gentleman, by his latter comments, makes it quite clear that he is not the slightest bit interested in Scottish education and simply wishes to be a troublemaker.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Will the Secretary of State accept the recommendations of the inquiry?

Mr. Rifkind: When the inquiry makes its recommendations, not only the Government but the unions and the education authorities will wish to consider the whole range of the recommendations, and naturally we shall wish to give them very great consideration. We are not setting up the inquiry purely as a cosmetic exercise. We will naturally wish, as will the unions and the education authorities, to give the closest scrutiny and considerable weight to the recommendations of such an inquiry.

Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, Shettleston): Should the inquiry recommend a retrospective pay award, will the Secretary of State accept such a recommendation?

Mr. Rifkind: I have already indicated that we envisage that the recommendations of the inquiry should take effect from 1986-87 onwards. I think that it is appropriate to look at it on that basis, particularly as the unions themselves have not put in a claim and have indicated that they want an inquiry to look to the future and not simply to the past.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Can the Secretary of State take note of the resolute support given to the teachers by the vast majority of parents throughout this long, miserable dispute? With that in mind, can he confirm that this is a genuinely independent review? If it is without any strings attached, all of us will join in calling for an end to the action.

Mr. Rifkind: Many parents have had sympathy with the teachers' claim for higher pay, but very few parents have had sympathy with the teachers' tactics of disrupting the education of their children. I am delighted to hear the hon. Gentleman's concluding remarks. I only wish that, on this occasion, he had been able to make them not from the Back Benches but from the Opposition Dispatch box.

Mr. Martin J. O'Neill (Clackmannan): Will the Minister accept that this conciliatory gesture will be welcomed by many people in Scotland? Since, from the teachers' point of view, the core of the dispute has been about pay, is he aware that if he were to indicate that meaningful negotiations could take place about the last year of pay it would be a useful start and would help the teachers in trying to reach a satisfactory end to their industrial action.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman's own Labour-controlled education authority in Central region and, indeed, other Labour regions, have indicated that they believe that the resolution of the dispute must include a package covering matters other than pay. He ought to discuss these matters with his colleagues on the regional council.

Consolidated Fund Bill

Mr. Speaker: I have a short statement to make about arrangements for the debate on the motion for the Adjournment which will follow the passing of the Consolidated Fund Bill on Thursday 13 March.

Members should submit their subjects to my office not later than 9 am on Wednesday 12 March. A list showing the subjects and the times will be published later that day. Normally the time allotted will not exceed one and half hours, but I propose to exercise a discretion to allow one or two debates to continue for rather longer, up to a maximum of three hours.

Where identical or similar subjects have been entered by different Members whose names are drawn in the ballot, only the first name will be shown on the list. As some debates may not last the full time allotted to them, it is the responsibility of Members to keep in touch with developments if they are not to miss their turn.

Opposition Day

[9TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Plight of the Elderly

Mr. Speaker: As we have started rather late, I appeal for short speeches from the Front and Back Benches. I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

4.49 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): I beg to move,

That this House, bearing in mind the cruel hardship suffered by hundreds of thousands of elderly people in the harshest winter for 40 years resulting in a 10-fold increase in deaths from hypothermia, condemns the Government for its total failure to protect pensioners throughout the second coldest February on record: deplores the Government's inactivity in the face of the manifest breakdown of the exceptionally severe weather payments system; and calls upon the Government to ensure that the most vulnerable elderly and disabled people receive adequate income to keep warm and healthy during the remainder of this and subsequent winters.

It is often said that the measure of civilisation in a society lies in how it treats its elderly people, and that is a yardstick which the Tory Government, with their record, must rue. We have just been through a long period of intense and exceptional cold; indeed, the coldest February for 40 years and the second chilliest this century. [Interruption.] There are some very childish Members in the House. I thought that the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) was a headmaster. I should have thought that he would have learnt to behave differently from schoolchildren.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North) rose——

Mr. Meacher: No, I shall not give way.

All over Britain easterly winds have kept temperatures far below freezing—down even to minus 15 deg, and to minus 20 deg in many places. Deaths from hypothermia have run into thousands. In last winter's cold snap, which was less cold than the past four weeks have been, there were 46,000 more deaths than in summer—an increase of 16,000 over the previous mild winter. Therefore, it would not be surprising if this winter there were about 60,000 cold-related deaths.

Even the Government's own figures—which grossly understate death due to the cold, because hypothermia-related deaths are classified separately as due to pneumonia, bronchitis or heart attack—tell the same story—that the death rate from hypothermia was 10 times higher last year than in 1978. They also show that in the first half of 1985 hypothermia killed 20 per cent.——

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler) rose——

Mr. Meacher: I shall give way in a moment.

The figures also show that in the first half of 1985 hypothermia killed 20 per cent. more pensioners than in the whole of 1984. It is all too likely that in the first two months of 1986 hypothermia killed more pensioners than in any comparable period this century. In fact, I have today received figures from the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys which confirm those suspicions. They reveal that in the first three weeks of February 1986, 6,011 more people died than in the same period two years ago. They show clearly that the death toll from the severity of this winter has been over 2,000 a week greater than has happened previously, even in winter time. That is a clear measure of the Government's failure to protect pensioners from the ravages of this exceptional cold.

Mr. Fowler: If I heard what the hon. Gentleman said, he alleged that there had been a tenfold increase between 1978 and 1985 in deaths from hypothermia. That is completely without foundation. What is the basis upon which the hon. Gentleman makes that charge?

Mr. Meacher: I make that charge on the basis of the figures which have been widely provided, which show that in 1977-78 just over 40 persons died in those weeks. I agree that Government figures, including the Labour Government's figures, grossly understate the number of deaths from hypothermia, for the reasons that I have given. That is true under all Governments, and it is certainly true under this one, but, on the same statistical basis, 415 people died in the first half of 1985——

Mr. Fowler: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman again, but it is important that the House understands this. The figures that the hon. Gentleman has quoted are on an entirely different statistical basis. In other words, he has compared the position before 1979, which was on one statistical basis, with the position after 1979, which was on another. That was made clear in the parliamentary reply that has been given. If the hon. Gentleman looks at that reply he will see that the worst year was 1979, and the winter months of that year. What the hon. Gentleman has just charged is completely untrue.

Mr. Meacher: What were the figures on the same basis for the period 1970 to 1978? What I am saying is that there has been a considerable increase, and this year the increase will be substantially greater than for any previous year. Does the Secretary of State deny that? Does he deny that in the past three weeks the number of deaths has been substantially higher than we have registered at probably any time since the war for a similar period?

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Gentleman is talking about additional deaths from hypothermia. We clearly have no accurate figures on that. What we have are figures which go back from 1985 to 1975, which make it clear that the worst period was the winter of 1979.

Mr. Meacher: I am sorry that the Secretary of State says that he does not have the figures. Perhaps his office has not given him the up-to-date figures. I have been given the figures for the number of deaths in the first three weeks of February 1986 compared with the number of deaths in the first three weeks of 1984, which was a "more normal winter".

There have been 6,000 more deaths than normal in the past three weeks. That suggests a mortality rate 2,000 every week higher than has previously been experienced in winter. While not all of those will be due to hypothermia, it would be reasonable to suppose that the great majority are deaths which have been precipitated by the extreme cold and the Government's failure to protect pensioners and others from that cold.

Mr. Fowler rose——

Mr. Meacher: No, I shall not give way.

Mr. Fowler rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. This is a short debate. The Secretary of State will be seeking to catch my eye shortly. Perhaps he can deal with these matters when he makes his own speech.

Mr. Meacher: In the face of this national disaster, the Government have been conspicuous by their inactivity. Responsibility for deciding whether exceptionally severe weather payments should be made was hived off to local Department of Health and Social Security officers, but no guidance has been given as to what constitutes severity in exceptionally severe weather.

Up to 10 days ago, during a period when any fool could have said that the weather was exceptionally severe, only a third of Britain's DHSS offices officially acknowledged the fact. That number suddenly rose to 80 per cent. only last week, and it is difficult to resist the conclusion that that had something to do with the Opposition's choice to make it into a central issue for this debate this week.

The Government have still refused to launch any national advertising, so the vast majority of eligible claimants are still unaware of their entitlements and the result has been pathetic. In Barry in south Wales, which I happened to visit last Friday, an area which had been designated on 7 February, only one claim had been processed in the course of the previous three weeks, paying out precisely 47p.

There has been a great deal of talk about exceptionally severe weather. I sometimes think that the real problem is an exceptionally severe Government. The human consequences of this are incalculable. Every day the media have carried stories of elderly people who have frozen to death in their own homes, such as Mrs. Edith Davis aged 83. Her Blackpool home was heated by only a two-bar fire. It was so cold when she was found that thermometers were useless to measure her temperature.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge) rose——

Mr. Meacher: No, I shall not give way. I want to make a bit more progress. I have been asked to make a short speech and I intend to do so. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to take part in the debate.

The problem has arisen not just because of the extreme cold. Part of the reason is that by deliberate Government policy the price of fuel has been kept too high for the poor to afford. Gas and electricity prices, and water charges, have all risen too fast because the Government have used them as an easy way of raising extra income. Even if special benefit payments are made, they do not compensate. The end product is overcrowded hospitals and pennywise pensioners freezing in underheated homes. That is not muddling through; it is malign neglect.

A month ago seven American astronauts were lost in an accident and the whole world was distraught. Yet 700 British pensioners die of hypothermia and the Government, Pontius Pilate-like, wash their hands and walk away. There is something sickening about a society where jobs in the City are changing hands among 25-year-olds at fancy six-figure salaries while pensioners have to make a choice between warmth and food and are given only a 1 per cent. pension increase. There is something nauseating about a Chancellor planning £1·5 billion tax cuts in a fortnight's time while pensioners are fobbed off with an insulting 40p, which would not buy more than a couple of lumps of coal. It is shameful that in Britain, the country in western Europe most richly endowed with energy resources, more pensioners die of hypothermia than in any other Western country.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South) rose——

Mr. Meacher: There is more than a twinge of rank hypocrisy——

Mrs. Currie rose——

Hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has made it clear that he is not giving way.

Mr. Meacher: There is more than a twinge of rank hypocrisy about the Prime Minister claiming that the Government are spending £140 million on heating allowances——

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West) rose——

Mr. Meacher: —when the same Government have cut pensions by £5,500 million since 1979 by breaking the link with earnings in the uprating of pensions.

Mr. Nicholls rose——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) has three more jobs.

Mr. Meacher: If Labour's formula had been carried on by the Government, every single pensioner would now get £4 a week more in pension, and all married pensioners would get £6·50 per week more. It is irrefutable that if such pensions had been paid over the last two or three months thousands of pensioners who have died would be alive today.

Mr. Hind rose——

Mr. Meacher: No doubt the hon. Gentleman will be able to speak later, if he wishes.

We can, and will, go further. Our policy is to maintain the state earnings-related pension scheme and not to emasculate it, as the Government intend. Under a Labour Government, SERPS will within the next 13 years double the pension in real terms. Under Labour policy, pensioners will never again have to make a choice between warmth and food.

We recognise, however, that over the next decade periods of intense cold will continue to require significant extra aid for the most vulnerable. We view exceptionally severe weather payments as a vehicle which will probably never provide adequate aid to those in need at the time they need it. Last year's system depended on Meterological Office readings round the country by arbitrary associations. They have been declared illegal by social security tribunals. This year's system, after the change that the Government made, depends on arbitrary decisions by local officers, without national guidance about when, how, or at what level payment should be made. Far too few people in grave need have received help. The help has come too late and the amounts paid would be a farce, if the situation were not so tragic. Because the payments are limited to those on supplementary benfit, they rule out many other poor pensioners and widows.

The Government may make something of the fact that the weather is now less cold, but the bills have not yet come in. Even now not enough has been done to reassure pensioners who are afraid to turn on the heating because they may get into debt. It is a bad system that encourages people to get into debt. Pensioners who pay their bills do not get help. The present system creates particular hardship for those who have "pay as you go" slot meters, or who use coal or paraffin. They have to prove that the money would otherwise have been spent on, for example, food or clothing. It is diabolical that in order to get help pensioners are subjected to such a system.

For all those reasons, we reject the system as a cruel deceit for those who need urgent help in the bitter cold. Our policy has two aims. First, there is an urgent priority to organise a national programme for better home insulation. One indictment of current policy is that in Sweden and Canada, which suffer much colder winter weather, far fewer of the elderly population die of hypothermia. A campaign for home insulation makes sense on every count. It is a labour intensive operation, which would provide a big increase in jobs, at a time when building workers are suffering one of the highest rates of unemployment of any occupation. Home insulation would be energy saving. Once it was installed the consumer would pay less for heating. Above all, it would play a key role in reducing hypothermia.

Secondly, despite the much bigger pensions that we would pay, significantly increased help must be given to the most vulnerable in the cold winter months. If an extra £5 per week were paid automatically to all pensioners on supplementary benefit, it would cost £8·25 million a week. If we included also, as we believe we should, another 1 million pensioners and widows with resources slightly above the supplementary benefit qualification, but who are still in real need and who are unable to warm themselves adequately, that would cost another £5 million a week. If that aid were given every week from mid-December to the beginning of March, it would cost about £130 million. The investment of that sum each winter is the least that those who have worked for the country in peacetime and who, when the call came, fought for the country in wartime, have a right to expect from a civilised society. That is our pledge.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will my hon. Friend comment on the news that was reported in The Guardian earlier this week, that Liberal and Conservative councillors in the London borough of Hammersmith and Fulham had decided to sell an old people's home, known as Stewart's Lodge, together with the pensioners within that home, to a private company? They have been stopped from doing that only by the positive action of Mr. Derek Prentice, the leader of the Labour group on that council, who has saved those people from the clutches of private enterprise.

Mr. Meacher: I saw that report in The Guardian yesterday. That proposal to sell off not only the home but the 29 people in it as a single job lot was typical of the privatisation initiatives taken by the Government. I also noticed that the proposal was voted for by Tory and Liberal councillors.

Mr. Nicholls rose——

Mr. Meacher: In a debate on the plight of the elderly that shows the attitude of the Government, who regard old people and their welfare simply as a means of increasing profit.

Mr. Nicholls rose——

Mr. Meacher: I hope that those who will uniquely have an opportunity in the coming weeks to vote on the matter will take account of that.

We have given our pledge. Never again must this country endure a winter when the poor and the elderly freeze to death for want of help with heating bills. That is our objective. We will not only will the end; we will also will the means.

5.9 pm

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof,

"recognises the difficulties faced by elderly people during periods of severe weather; commends the Government's record of paying higher retirement pensions to more pensioners than ever before, of increasing the supplementary benefit scale rates, of providing for the first time automatic heating additions of £2·20 per week for all supplementary pensioner households over 65 years of age, and of introducing a higher rate of £5·45 per week for such pensioners over 85 years of age; notes with approval that payments under the exceptionally severe weather scheme are now available throughout mainland Britain; and observes that the present relative stability in fuel prices demonstrates the value of firm control over inflation and is in stark contrast to the increase of 170 per cent. in electricity prices over the period of the Labour Government between 1974 and 1979."

I agree with the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) that this is a profoundly important subject and that policy must match its importance. I entirely reject, however, the type of speech that he made, which, even on his record, is one of the worst that he has ever made. I also entirely reject the charges that he levelled at the Government. The Government are now directing record resources to heating additions. In real terms we are directing £140 million more than the Labour Government. The facts make it crystal clear that the Government have given more help through heating additions, that we have given it more effectively and that we have directed it in such a way as to ensure that it goes to the people who need it most.

As we saw again today, nothing has been more disgraceful than the way in which the human problems of the elderly have been exploited by the Opposition during the past few weeks. No charge has been too extravagant. No care has been taken about the fears that have been aroused or about the information that has been employed. We had a profound example of that today. I should like to give two examples of what I mean.

On Tuesday, the Leader of the Opposition asked my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister:

"Why . . . has our death rate during the winter been three times that of the United States of America and four times that of Sweden?"—[Official Report, 4 March 1986; Vol. 93, c. 149.]

We have checked on that statement, and for what period the latest international figures are available. The latest evidence that we have was given in the November issue of Health Trends. It did indeed show that the increase in the death rate in winter in the United Kingdom—not of course the death rate itself—was higher than in the United States or Sweden, but the period taken for the international comparison was the three-year period 1976 to 1979, and for the crucial winter months of those years the Opposition were in power. It seems to me to be an exercise in cynical trivialisation to suggest that the problem of winter deaths is somehow the responsibility of this Government and that the problem has not arisen before.

The second example comes from the speech by the hon. Member for Oldham, West and from the motion, which condemns the Government on the basis of suffering during the winter

"resulting in a 10-fold increase in deaths from hypothermia"

There is absolutely no evidence of a tenfold increase. The only basis on which that statement could have been made is a total misreading of figures which compare 1975 with 1985, but those figures were on an entirely different statistical basis.

What is worse is that any comparison of the past 10 years—1975 to 1985—shows that it was during the winter of 1979 when most deaths in England and Wales with mention of hypothermia occurred. In the first three months of 1979, there were 585 deaths with mention of hypothermia in England and Wales. That is more than in any year in the period 1975 to 1985, and in those winter months of 1979 the Labour party was in power.

My fundamental objection to the Opposition's case is that they are devaluing the argument and have no concept of what the real debate is about. It is not just about spending money, and it is not just about hypothermia, serious and tragic though that is. The issues go far wider and are infinitely more difficult and complex than the hon. Gentleman has even hinted at.

It has been a long established trend in Britain that, when the weather is exceptionally cold, there have been increases in the number of deaths from or associated with hypothermia; but there is also the wider problem of the substantial increase in the number of deaths from all causes which are associated with the winter—strokes, coronary heart disease and chest infection.

As it happens, matters have improved. The excess mortality associated with winter has diminished. I take the example of men. In the period 1959 to 1963, the average excess was 27 per cent. In the 1970s, the average excess was 16 per cent., and in the period 1982 to 1984, the average excess was 13 per cent. There has been an improvement, although I am the first to say that we cannot be satisfied until the figures have been brought down even further.

The evidence is that—as the 1976 to 1979 figures show—circumstances in Britain are worse than in some other countries which have severer climates, and the reasons for that are anything but clear. There appears to be no substantial difference between people living in institutions, such as old people's homes, and those living at home. Central heating does not seem to be the crucial factor. No correlation has been found between the percentage of households with central heating in nine different regions of England and the seasonal variation in mortality. Nor is the problem concerned solely with the elderly; it applies to virtually all age groups.

This is self-evidently a serious and complex issue. It is not remotely an issue just of social security. A whole range of other issues are involved, not least the attitudes which society takes towards the problems of elderly people and how it reacts and responds to cold weather.

I also accept that proper social security provision is fundamentally important in enabling elderly people to cope with severe weather. This is where I return to the remarks of the hon. Member for Oldham, West. If the debate on social security is to be informed and responsible, it is also important that the true background is well understood.

There are three points on social security that I want to emphasise. The first concerns pensions. In November, pensions went up by £4 a week for a married couple and £2·50 for a single person. That was an increase of 7 per cent. when inflation was 5·5 per cent. In the interim July uprating, the retired couple's pension will rise to £61·95 a week. That compares with £31·20 per week in November 1978. In the autumn, the Government will announce a further increase, to be paid from April 1987. In other words, there will be three upratings in 16 months. That means that this Government have more than honoured their pledge to maintain the value of pensions by protecting them against inflation.

In fact, at November 1985 prices, the pension was worth £3 a week more in real terms than it was in November 1978. During the same period, the number of pensioners has risen from 8·5 million to 9·5 million. That means that we are paying higher pensions and paying them to more pensioners than ever before. Spending on retirement pensions has thus risen from £7·5 billion in 1978-79 to £16·5 billion in 1985-86—a rise of £2·5 billion in real terms.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): In spite of those figures, does the right hon. Gentleman not think it odd that our pensions are below average wages, unlike pensions in Scandinavian countries and among our European partners? Our pensioners have a far smaller cut of national wages.

Mr. Fowler: I understand the point made by the right hon. Gentleman. However, I would say that, despite what has been a difficult economic period throughout western Europe, we have not only increased the real value of pensions but paid those pensions to about 1 million more pensioners than previously. We have also done one more vital thing for pensioners in this country. It is not enough simply to say that we shall increase pensions. Inflation must also be kept under control if the security of pensioners is to be fully assured. That was the crucial failure of the previous Labour Government. During the five years of the Labour Government, inflation rose by 112 per cent. Not only were savings destroyed, but the value of any increase in pensions was eaten away at an alarming rate month by month. Therefore, the control of inflation is crucial, and that is one of the Government's most important achievements for pensioners and all those on fixed incomes.

Secondly, I want to deal with the position of pensioners requiring supplementary benefit. The most important additional help that goes to pensioners on the lowest incomes is the regular guaranteed income that is provided week by week. The supplementary benefit scale rates are aimed at meeting normal living expenses, including heating. The higher, long-term rate of support goes automatically to pensioners in recognition of their extra needs. The real value of the scale rates has risen by 6 per cent. between 1978 and 1985.

Thirdly, in addition to the regular help that is provided through supplementary pensions, there are specific further heating additions. As the House will know, they are received by those who need extra warmth because of age, ill health or disability or whose homes are exceptionally difficult to heat.

The Government have made heating additions automatically payable to supplementary pensioners who are householders and aged 65 or more. The result is that over 90 per cent. of all supplementary pensioners now get a heating addition, compared with only about 70 per cent. in 1978. Between 1978 and 1985 the basic rate of heating addition has gone up by about 20 per cent. in real terms.

The higher rate of heating addition of £5·45 a week goes to the very old—those over 85, who are increasing in numbers—as well as to the severely disabled. That is worth over £230 a year extra to someone on the long-term rate. Taken together with the help in the weekly benefit rate itself, it means about £600 a year to help with heating costs.

The position is that 2·5 million people in this country are now receiving extra help with heating, and predominantly that help is going to the elderly. In terms of the amount of money spent, the Government are devoting £400 million a year to heating additions—an increase in real terms of £140 million since 1978.

The right way to help with heating costs is through a regular weekly income which is related to needs. That is how help has been given by successive Governments. In addition, limited help has been given by successive Governments. In addition, limited help has been available with extra expenditure in times of severe weather. This help, which goes back to the days of the National Assistance Board, has always represented a very small part of help with heating costs. The fact is that arrangements of this sort cannot by their nature be an adequate substitute for a regular weekly income on which people are able to plan ahead.

I should make it clear to the hon. Member for Oldham, West that the Government have already taken steps to ensure that those who need help through the exceptionally severe weather payments system receive it. In an advertising campaign, which begins tomorrow and will go on over the weekend, we shall again seek to ensure that people know how to claim the money. That is exactly what the hon. Member for Oldham, West was asking for.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) rose——

Mr. Fowler: I shall not give way again.

We have made it clear that we are reviewing this scheme for next winter. We are also examining future policy overall. In the reform of social security in the Social Security Bill, which is at present in Committee, we have made it clear that overall at least the same level of resources will be devoted to helping with heating costs. We shall also be considering whether, within the new structure, there are more effective ways of deploying those resources.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) rose——

Mr. Fowler: I think that the hon. Gentleman may find this attractive.

I have it in mind that in the income support scheme there may be a case for winter premiums which would recognise in a more straightforward way the extra winter needs of certain vulnerable groups. I am certainly prepared to examine the case for that.

I shall also be considering the role of the social fund. Even those who are not supporters of the social fund—

[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) will be able to address the House later if she catches the eye of the Chair. I think that we must recognise that the existing regulatory framework has not served us well on the severe weather payments system. If one wants to relate extra help sensitively and flexibly to individual personal needs, the best basis for achieving that aim is not to try to define that help in every detail in advance in regulations. The general approach of the social fund is a much better starting point.

Mr. Frank Field rose——

Mr. Fowler: This debate goes beyond social security. For example, the Health Service is crucial for elderly people. Over the past six and a half years the actual amount of patient care provided—both in hospital and in the community—has increased. Those advances have been recorded in areas of particular importance to old people. Between 1978 and 1984 in England the number of geriatric in-patient cases increased by 47 per cent., the number of geriatric out-patient cases increased by 35 per cent., the number of regular geriatric day patient attendances rose by almost 20 per cent., and the number of elderly people treated by district nurses rose by about 26 per cent.

At the same time, there has been a steady increase in the numbers of key staff providing geriatric services. Between 1978 and 1984 the number of consultants increased by almost 30 per cent., while the number of other hospital medical staff increased by 22 per cent. The trend is also clear in personal social services. Spending has risen from £1,062 million in 1978-79 to £2,417 million in 1985-86. That is a real increase of over 20 per cent. That expenditure is shown by increased services on the ground. The number of places in day centres is up by over 20 per cent., the number of home helps is up by 14 per cent. and the total number of meals on wheels provided has risen by over 1 million on levels achieved by 1979.

What matters is the message behind the figures. More old people are getting more services under this Government than they got in the period 1974 to 1979. That is a clear message, which reflects credit and achievement on all concerned in the National Health Service, local authorities and personal social services. The number of very elderly people in our population is rising and there will be major challenges in the years ahead.

The central point that I want to make is that the House should address the problems on the basis of the facts, not on the basis of the totally bogus catalogue of charges made by the hon. Member for Oldham, West. The Government stand on the basis of the facts. We are committed to the welfare of elderly people. We have proved that commitment by our record so far, and we will maintain that commitment to the growing numbers of elderly people in this country in the years ahead.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the House of Mr. Speaker's appeal for short speeches.

5.30 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I would like to make a short contribution to the debate. In all these debates about the plight of the elderly we are inclined to become wrapped up solely in the problems that confront the elderly and our perception of the elderly is that they are a problem. That is a wrong-headed approach to the issues and difficulties that face us. The elderly members of our community should be considered as a positive resource. They have experience and they have a real contribution to make.

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham) rose——

Mr. Kirkwood: No, I shall not give way. I do not have time to do so.

Of course, the elderly need basic essentials, and they need additional resources. In some specific instances and areas they need more help and assistance generally. As the Secretary of State said, that straddles issues like money —which is of prime importance but not the only factor — health care, housing, transport, social support and energy needs.

Ms. Harman rose——

Mr. Kirkwood: I am sorry but I do not have time to give way to the hon. Lady.

It would be wrong to consider the problems that confront the elderly outwith the broad context that I have set out. I agree with the Secretary of State about that.

In this debate we are seeking to react to a real need and an emergency that has resulted from the exceptionally severe weather we have experienced. It is right and proper that the debate is taking place, but there is a more important need, which is to engage in long-term planning. There must be a good deal more long-term planning so that we are not merely reacting to emergencies.

Mr. Frank Field rose——

Mr. Kirkwood: As I have said to the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman), I do not have time to give way to interventions.

I listened carefully to the Secretary of State. He contended that the statistics that he provided—I have no way of refuting them — suggest that health and community care services are actually improving and are not merely under control. That is not the evidence that comes to me through my eyes and ears. More important, that is not the evidence that is related to me by my colleagues and by those who actually work in health and community care services. Such people are not especially politically motivated and they report to me that there has been a tremendous increase in demands upon them because of an increase in the number of people that they serve and the new and improved quality and standard of service that they are expected to provide. The statistics that the Secretary of State provides are not what really matter. He must measure up to the increasing demands that are being made on our services. If he hides behind statistics all the time, he will never get round to measuring up to that demand. I hope that he will consider that carefully.

Ms. Harman rose——

Mr. Kirkwood: What is the extent of the Secretary of State's co-operation with other Ministers and their co-operation with him, and what consultations take place on issues such as fuel conservation? The Right to Fuel campaign recently drew attention to the immense difficulties that are experienced in the conjunction of the Departments of Health and Social Security, Energy and the Environment, all of which are directly involved when it comes to trying to initiate sensible schemes. Some pilot projects have been extremely successful and could be built upon, but there have been immense bureaucratic difficulties in trying to co-ordinate that activity. I hope that the Secretary of State will consider that carefully.

Basic resources and basic pension rights are related factors and I understand that we are talking about potentially massive sums. However, I ask the Secretary of State to bear in mind that the Social Security Advisory Committee has observed that if he does nothing more than peg benefits and pensions to prices, it is inevitable that the gap between benefits and pensions and earnings will widen as earnings leap ahead year after year. That prospect is not acceptable to us and it would not be acceptable to those outside the House. If the gap is allowed to widen too far it will lead to the disintegration of the fabric of society. That will be inevitable if it is allowed to continue over a long period.

The Government give me the impression that they are complacent.

Mr. Norman Fowler indicated dissent

Mr. Kirkwood: The Secretary of State shakes his head. I listened to the right hon. Gentleman's statistics with interest but I did not receive the feeling from him that he is pulling out all the stops to deal with the short-term and long-term difficulties. He should give the House a commitment that he will set up an interdepartmental working party to consider some of the problems. He should enter into urgent discussions about the short-term problems with his colleagues outside and within the Department.

The severe weather single payment regulations are subject to three tests. The first test involves the period of severe weather and that is where the real difficulty arises. There is no definition of "period" and there is no definition of "severe". the Secretary of State could abandon the first condition and rely on the remaining two. They provide that fuel costs have to be shown to be greater than the savings that are available to meet the costs and that the amount of additional consumption has been greater year on year. I accept that the scheme has to have some qualifying features but I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman could abandon the first test. He could go even further than that next year. It is clear that we shall have to face these problems next year and the right hon. Gentleman could declare the whole period from December to March as a period of severe weather qualifying for benefit. He could put the onus on the Department to show that there has not been severe weather. If these changes were made, we might produce a system that could be seen to be capable of delivering sensible amounts of resources in a way that would meet needs.

The Government have shown complacency recently by withdrawing heating allowance moneys from the elderly poor by changing the supplementary benefit available scale margins and by reducing central heating allowances. These acts have compounded the problem.

Increases in fuel costs in relation to increases in the retail price index have been disproportionately high. The figures that appear in the United Kingdom Energy Digest —they are the most recent that I can find—show that the RPI increased by 67 per cent. from 1979 to 1984 while coal and coke prices increased by 100 per cent., gas charges by 121 per cent. and electricity charges by 79 per cent. Heating oil, including paraffin, feature in the list. The majority of my constituents who have difficulty in meeting fuel bills use this source of heating, which causes condensation problems and leads to housing and environmental difficulties. The figures suggest that the RPI is not a sensible measure for pensioners who face large increases in fuel prices. That is something else that the right hon. Gentleman should consider carefully.

My view is reinforced by the family expenditure survey of 1984, which showed that the average family in 1984 was spending 11 per cent. more of its total budget on fuel than in 1979 and 9 per cent. less on food. These statistics are frightening, and it should be recognised that they refer only to absolute costs. The most recent figures that I can find that relate to the proportions of the budgets of the retired single pensioner and retired couple that are spent on heating appear in the family expenditure survey of 1982. That survey showed that the single pensioner spent 15 per cent. of his total budget on fuel each week. That is a considerable proportion. If the Secretary of State or any of us had to spend 15 per cent. of our income each week on fuel, something would be done quickly to alleviate the burden.

I do not underestimate the difficulties that face the Secretary of State, but he must sort something out for next year. The exceptionally severe weather payments scheme is causing great heartache and distress and I look to the right hon. Gentleman to put matters right before we are hit by the next winter.

5.39 pm

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): I will comply, Mr. Deputy Speaker, with your request to be brief.

Everybody grows old—that is a fact of life. There are three groups of elderly people. The first group of people are those who are able to look after themselves, who have made provision and have an occupational pension to supplement their state pension. The second group are those who have nothing but the state pension but are able to look after themselves. They take precautions and read the leaflets such as those published by the Health Education Council and Age Concern. The Age Concern leaflet entitled "Warmth in Winter" contains a number of useful tips and I recommend it to all hon. Members. It discusses money and how to obtain extra supplementary benefit. It discusses home insulation grants. Last year, the city of Nottingham's Labour-controlled council did not take up the full allowance on home insulation grants. The document gives tips on how to save fuel, the right clothes to wear for warmth and tips on safety. It gives sensible, practical advice which the elderly can take on board and states where such advice can be obtained.

The third group of people—with whom the debate is concerned—are those who cannot look after themselves. It is a matter of personal distress that, last week, someone died of hypothermia in Nottingham and that others are suffering and are in hospital. It is reported that two patients went into hospital with their temperatures as low as 26 deg. C—the definition of hypothermia is 35 deg. C. I am pleased to report that both patients survived.

The Opposition blame the Government as though this were a phenomenon which has arisen only since 1979. However, the social services correspondent of The Times said in an article on extra payments:

"It is an issue with which no Government in the 40 years of the welfare state has come to terms".

I care about the elderly and we all must work hard for them but one must not turn the issue into a political football. One cannot play politics with the elderly.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South) rose——

Mr. Ottaway: Recently the Government's statisticians said that for every 1 deg drop in average temperature, winter deaths rose by 8,000. It therefore comes as no surprise when the Opposition spokesman says that the number of deaths will rise when the temperature drops.

The figures which are published are different from the number of deaths. Why is this? It boils down to two reasons. First, families do not report deaths from hypothermia because of the shame it will bring to the family. Secondly, it is reported that almost all the hypothermia cases in Nottingham are related to another illness, which lowers the resistance to cold but which has nothing to do with hypothermia.

What can we do to help people who are in distress? The services in Nottingham are excellent and I am pleased to pay tribute to the local services and the Government services. I know of no case in Nottingham of someone being let down by these services. I was told by a local reporter that, last Friday, when the reporter told the social services department that an old person was suffering, within one hour food and bags of coal were given to that person.

Old people's perception of cold tends to diminish as they grow older and they do not realise the danger that they are in. The problem that faces us is finding those people who are suffering and who need our assistance, especially those aged 80 and over. We need reports on such people. Relatives should phone the services when an old person needs help. The charities must be encouraged to carry on with their work. Recently, I went to a presentation by Help the Aged for the introduction of their emergency bleeper Lifeline. If an old person falls over, the bleeper is triggered and the emergency services will check on that old person. They will get the old person into hospital if necessary. I pay tribute to the work of Age Concern in Nottingham, which gives help to people in distress at all hours of the day. Nottingham's Evening Post runs a column "old and cold". It raises money from the public which it can dish out to those who need a little extra. The role of neighbours is important—we need a nosey neighbour scheme rather than a neighbourhood watch scheme. Such a scheme could look after old people.

It is easy to blame the Government. Anyone can say that we should spend more. The pensioners who came along today to put their case, and who did so eloquently, said the same. However, I believe the Government's record stands up to scrutiny. I believe that by keeping inflation at such low figures the Government are doing more to help the elderly than any other campaign. I have no hesitation in supporting the Government's amendment.

5.45 pm

Mr. Reg Freeson (Brent, East): At the beginning of the Minister's speech he said that "policy must match the importance of the subject." Nobody would disagree with that. On the contrary, we, and I trust Conservative Members, would advocate that and seek to practise it. However, if we seek to put those words into practice rather than treat them as rehetoric, we must match the objective with the resources. That is where the Government are falling down.

It is acceptable for any Government to take any period in the past 40 years and say that according to the latest available figures more was being done in the various services and areas which the Minister quoted than had been done five years earlier, 10 years earlier or indeed 20 years earlier. All Ministers of successive Governments do the same thing. That is not the test. The test is whether more should and could be done, but is not done. That is the test, and that is where the Government are failing.

I intend to concentrate my remarks on an aspect which was briefly touched on by the Secretary of State and then virtually set aside. He vaguely mentioned the failure to correlate deaths from hypothermia with the levels and extent of central heating systems in Britain, region by region. It was not an effective response to the call by my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) for more effective insulation in British homes, especially the homes of the elderly.

I shall pursue the Minister's point about housing. If it is the case that policy should match the importance of the subject and resources need to be applied for that purpose, the Government have continuously failed on housing. They have failed to provide decent homes for the elderly. From figures that I have obtained from the Library it appears that in 1980 about 40,000 additional dwellings were provided for elderly people in the form of sheltered accommodation or single bedroom flats of an appropriate nature. In 1985 that figure dropped to 15,000. These figures are for the public sector, local authorities and housing associations. The figure of 40,000 in 1980 was reduced to 15,000 in 1985 and there is the prospect of a further reduction in 1986. In percentage terms that represents a 60 per cent. drop in the provision of housing for the elderly by housing associations and local authorities.

How, then, can it be said that policy and practice are matching the importance of the subject? I am not interested in arguing whether fewer elderly people live in decent accommodation in 1985 than was the case in 1979 or 1969. Clearly that is the case because housing conditions steadily improve. The test is that of need, and I shall quote some more figures which I hope the House will not find boring, because they represent people in need.

At the same time as that decrease, about 300,000 elderly people are on waiting lists to move. They are prevented from moving into suitable accommodation which would be well heated and insulated during the winter months. The figure of those waiting to move is increasing, while the level of construction and provision of dwellings is decreasing. Moreover, thousands of public sector dwellings are being sold. Fewer public sector dwellings are available today than were available five years ago, not by a few hundreds or thousands, but by hundreds of thousands.

Older people are much more likely to occupy old local authority and private accommodation and less likely to be able to carry out repairs. These public sector properties, which the elderly occupy in disproportionate numbers, need about £19 billion expenditure on repairs and modernisation. How much have the Government provided? I am sorry that the appropriate Minister from the Department of the Environment is not present to listen to the debate. The Government have provided less than £200 million.

[Mr. Reg Freeson]

According to the Government's condition of property survey, 480,000 dwellings classed as unfit are occupied largely by elderly people. The more unfit they are, the more likely it is that elderly people will live in them. Under this Government, public sector housing starts, whether in new build or buying and modernising old properties, have fallen sharply year after year. That is the reality, not the rhetoric or statement of intent, and something needs to be done about it.

Something must be done to increase the resources available for public sector housing, no matter which party is in government. I do not say that as a party-knocking exercise. Whereas a few years ago local authorities were providing each year 150,000 to 200,000 dwellings by new build or by buying and modernising old properties, today, because of Government restrictions, they are providing about 30,000 dwellings. Who are affected? Large numbers of elderly people, among others, are affected.

In the late 1970s the housing associations were providing 40,000 dwellings a year, the vast bulk of which consisted increasingly of rehabilitated properties. Today the figure is below 20,000 a year, and is likely to fall even further. All the information is available on the record. Again, a disproportionate number of elderly people live in those properties.

The provision of housing is urgent, and it is not merely a matter of making fine speeches. It is not merely a question of the number of dwellings, whatever that number may be, but of their standard. The standard is decreasing, and the first item to be hit is heating and insulation. I challenge any hon. Member to visit the few purchase, conversion and modernisation schemes that are being undertaken by housing associations and local authorities today to see the standards to which they are being compelled to fall. A few years ago, property was being well insulated and central heating systems were being installed, which is important for elderly people and others, no matter what the Secretary of State says. Now, such properties depend for heating on plug-in electric fires because the Department of the Environment prevents authorities from spending money to maintain decent standards. That pushes up costs, reduces heating and insulation standards, and increases the rate of ill health, hypothermia and the expenditure of far too restricted pensions.

The Government have it in their power, as from this afternoon, to do something about two further matters. Besides increasing resources to housing associations, increasing local authority provision for elderly and other people, and improving the standard of provision to ensure decent heating and insulation, the Government should bear in mind the Homes Insulation Act 1978, which enables them to introduce further schemes of insulation grant, well beyond the loft insulation scheme, which was first introduced and is now petering out. The Departments of Health and Social Security, of Energy and of the Environment should get together to improve standards and ensure that resources are available. We are talking not about chucking money away but about investment in decent buildings and homes to help thousands of needy elderly people.

In addition, the Government should enable housing associations to do what the Treasury is stopping them from doing, which is to match public money with private money, which they could borrow from building societies and banks to enlarge their housing programmes. Because of Government instructions, housing associations are not permitted to introduce private capital to match public capital to increase the rate of construction, purchase and modernisation of houses. Unless such action is taken, this year, next year and for years to come, no matter how many people may benefit from improved conditions, many thousands will not.

In Brent, 20,000 dwellings need modernisation or replacement—that is between 20 and 25 per cent. of the total housing stock—and a disproportionate number of them are occupied by elderly people, who are suffering from draughts, bad heating, bad insulation and bad conditions. If the Government would will the necessary resources, instead of indulging in rhetoric, they could improve the conditions of my constituents and thousands of elderly people suffering from the cold in winters such as this. The Government must take action, not merely quote past statistics. Future needs require to be met, and they are not at present being met.

5.58 pm

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I speak as the proud and active president of Age Concern in my constituency. All our members have a proud and brave story to tell of their lives, as do pensioners who are not members. Each must be, and is, valued for himself or herself.

The first point that I should like to make is one on which I have campaigned for a considerable time. It continues to concern me very much, and I hope that it causes concern to all hon. Members. I refer to the resources available for pensioners. I accept the point made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services, that pensions are now 6 or 7 per cent. better than they were when the Government came to office. That is a matter for congratulation, not for chiacking.

We must remember that a month's pension is taken up by standing charges. If I could improve one area for pensioners, I would remove standing charges. I hope that all hon. Members would support me in that. We must press British Gas, the electricity boards and all others concerned to remove standing charges. That would make an immediate and important impact on pensioners and their standards of living.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Greenway: No, I will not give way, but I will be brief.

We must examine the need for more resources for pensioners. The terms of the motion and the speech by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) remind me of the demands that are made on the resources of pensioners in my constituency in London and beyond. Happily, with the abolition of the GLC, rates are being reduced by the Conservative-controlled borough of Ealing and by other Conservative-controlled boroughs across London. That will substantially help pensioners. Pensioners were badly hit when the Labour-controlled GLC doubled their rates and fares in 1981. Pensioners are not helped by the GLC in its current legal battle, wanting to spend £96 million of ratepayers' money. Why could that money not be given to pensioners, if the GLC professes to support Londoners? Labour members of the GLC, Labour Members of this House, and Liberal Members for all I know, will go across to the great fireworks parties that the Labour-controlled GLC is setting up to commemorate abolition. That will cost hundreds, thousands, millions of pounds of ratepayers' money. That money will come, in part, from the very elderly who are struggling to pay their rates and heating costs.

Mr. Corbyn rose——

Mr. Greenway: Labour Members should remember that waste of money when they shed crocodile tears about pensioners. They should tell their colleagues across the river to divert that money into pensioners' pockets. They would then be doing something right for pensioners. Opposition Members should boycott those parties; they are a disgraceful insult to pensioners. All pensioners will suffer and have to pay more rates than they need because of the money that the GLC will waste to mark abolition. Pensioners have already suffered as a result of the huge, expensive campaign that the GLC has run to save itself. That campaign included expenditure of between £10 million and £25 million on the promotion of pensioners' travel passes. Those passes were never in doubt. That campaign was conducted long after the passes had been guaranteed in law.

Mr. Corbyn: They knew what was happening.

Mr. Greenway: Opposition Members do not like to hear this, but they will have to listen to it. Pensioners were mendaciously told by the Labour leader of the GLC that they were going to lose their passes. More resources for pensioners would be available if wasteful campaigns were stopped. If Opposition Members had any sincerity, they would back me on that point.

What would it be like if we had another Labour Government? The Labour Opposition have already stated that their projected programme, if they are elected to office, would cost £24 billion. That would immediately raise VAT to 41 per cent. and so affect pensioners. Pensioners' families would not be able to help them, as the wage earners would be paying 20 per cent. more on the standard rate of tax. Pensioners would have a terrible time if a Labour Government were ever elected. The Labour party's crocodile tears had better return to where they came from. Labour Members need to be more honest and sincere about pensioners.

Last Saturday, in my constituency, I had the pleasure of attending a conference for carers of the elderly and carers of others. I congratulate the Government on the tremendous progress that they have made in creating schemes for carers to relieve those people who have a 24-hour-a-day responsibility looking after the elderly. The carers scheme has grown enormously in the past five years at considerable Government expense. It has not been mentioned today. I must say that that scheme is helping to keep elderly people in reasonable dignity and allowing their carers to have a break. That scheme helps enormously as it oftens allows the carers to go to work and earn a little money to help the very elderly for whom they are caring.

I should like to make a regional and somewhat partisan point. We have heard much from Scottish Labour Members about the need for extra heating allowances for pensioners and others in Scotland. A steady study of weather charts over the past few weeks will show them, as it has shown me, that the worst of the cold has been in London and the south-east. I hope that there will not be a big diversion of resources to Scotland. If there is, hon. Members with London constituencies will fight against it.

Pensioners always want and need higher pensions. My grandmother lived to be a very old lady and died in her late nineties. She rightly said that no one ever has enough money, no matter whether one is poor or rich. If hon. Members reflect on that they will see the truth in it. My grandmother meant that everyone can conceive of a need. I hope on that basis that the Government will maintain their excellent record of improving pensions in real terms. I hope that the Government will never, as the Labour Government did in 1975 and 1976, take away the pensioners' Christmas bonus. That was a mean thing to do. Only the Labour party would do that and then have representatives stand at the Dispatch Box and shout their mouths off as if they were the pensioners' friends.

The motion refers to this winter as being the worst for 40 years. In 1947 Mr. Emmanuel Shinwell was Minister of Fuel and Power. I remember then, as a small boy, what a terrible time the pensioners had under the Labour Government. They could not buy coal, the lights were off and there was no heating. Why is tonight's motion so arrogant? The Labour party has no record of which to be proud and much of which to be ashamed. That record goes back to 1947 and beyond.

Labour Members should remember what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said about 1979. Old people then, like everybody else, could not bury their dead. Conditions were arctic, and they could get no help for love nor money. Those were the conditions that existed when the Labour party was in government and the country will never forget it.

6.8 pm

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): If pensioners, as a group, are worse off than other sections of the community, Scottish pensioners are even worse off than those in England and Wales because climatic conditions are such that 20 to 30 per cent. more fuel is needed to heat a home in Scotland than is needed in southern England. Hypothermia and cold-related illnesses are common in areas with severe climatic conditions. Deaths from hypothermia in Scotland represent 25 per cent. of the United Kingdom total. Whether the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) likes it or not, Scottish hon. Members will still bring these points to the House and remind him of them.

The difference in climate in Scotland, which the Government have recognised, bears out the demands that Scotland's pensioners had been making unsuccessfully until last week. The pensioners believe that, as they live in an agreed cold climate, that does not mean that they have become acclimatised to the cold. In practical terms, the problem is that Scottish pensioners are facing more severe effects from underheating their homes, given the colder climate, than their counterparts who live in southern England.

Our old people experience many problems with respect to their heating costs. There is concern about those at risk from hypothermia and other illnesses because of excessive economising on fuel. There is concern about those who live in cold conditions but, fortunately, do not die. There is concern about the hardship sufferred by those paying their bills, but with great difficulty. There is concern about those who fail to claim the benefits to which they are entitled. About 150,000 Scottish pensioners claim supplementary benefit, but 75,000 Scottish pensioners entitled to receive supplementary benefit fail to claim it. These are the elderly among us who are losing out, not only on supplementary benefit but on the extra help available for heating.

We all know pensioners who will not claim supplementary benefit because of the stigma attached to means-tested benefits. They have been brought up during the years of the parish, the free books and the free school meals and in their retirement are not prepared to go with the begging bowl asking for more. Throughout their lives, those elderly people have contributed to our wealth as a nation only to witness its sale by the Government for a short-term, highly dubious financial gain from which they will not benefit. That is a massive sale of assets which should have been retained to provide the national income that would have protected our pensioners, giving them the peace of mind to enjoy a retirement not only of dignity but, just as important, of reasonable comfort.

Many pensioners deny themselves the means-tested help available because of their pride. Many others are unable to obtain help through the supplementary benefit system because their modest occupational pension takes them above the needs level set by the Government. As a group, pensioners have a lower than average income. The Government's duty should be to ensure that pensioners are made aware of their entitlements and that the highest priority within the social security system is given to ensuring that those entitlements are taken up.

It is not just whether they can heat and feed themselves that now concerns our elderly in Scotland. Pensioners in Scotland are equally concerned and puzzled about the Government's rate reform intentions set out in the recently announced Green Paper "Paying for Local Government". They are puzzled about where the Government imagine the sudden affluence will come to meet this new demand. The purse is already empty. How many single pensioners are living in the four-bedroomed house in Scotland which is the much-quoted example to show who will benefit from the change in the method of gathering rates?

The reality is much more stark and frightening. For every pensioner in receipt of housing benefit, 400,000 in Scotland will be worse off because they will have to pay 20 per cent. of their rates. Just what do the Government think pensioners should now give up to meet this extra financial burden? Perhaps our pensioners will shortly be reminded that they have a Christmas bonus which could be used. Perhaps they will be told that soap coupons could be saved and exchanged or that the stamps from Brooke Bond tea packets could be collected in a book to pay for the new rate demands. This is a mean-minded decision by a penny-pinching Government who show their disregard for those members of our society who have contributed to its wealth and health and ask only that that contribution should be recognised by allowing them to be equal members of our society now that they have retired.

It is not just a matter of whether pensioners can heat their homes. Some of our pensioners are living in underheated houses because they have money in the bank to bury them when they are dead. On 5 February 1982, I introduced a private Member's Bill to increase the death grant from £30 to £190 in January 1983 and to require the Secretary of State to review the death grant on 1 January in each subsequent year so that it would retain its value in relation to the general level of prices. The Bill aimed to abolish discrimination based on age.

Conservative Members talked the Bill out. They would not wish to be reminded now of the part they played in sabotaging that modest attempt to give security and peace of mind to our pensioners. The hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), who, unfortunately, is not with us, spoke from the Front Bench on behalf of the Government. He said:

"I might have preferred to debate the issues before us after the Government had completed the review of death grant arrangements which has been in train since 1980. Unfortunately, that was not possible. Once the review is completed, I or my right hon. Friend will make a statement on the outcome, which I am sure will give us a full opportunity for constructive debate."

He concluded:

"We are more than conscious of the cases that are brought to our attention where hardship is experienced, because of the ever-widening gap between the level of death grant and the basic cost of a funeral. I assure the House that we shall come forward with our proposals as soon as possible." — [Official Report, 5 February 1982; Vol. 17, c. 692-8.]

Now we know—the Government's proposals, after four years' deliberations, are straight out of the monetarists' top drawer: "It is so meaningless. We cannot cut it any more, so we will just abolish it." There speaks the caring, sharing Tory Government.

The picture of an elderly person sleeping on a sofa piled high with blankets in the only room with a heater is not an unusual or extreme one. The reality of life in Scotland for pensioners on low incomes is that their activities are severely curtailed. Winter days may be shorter for all of us but, for many of our elderly people, these days are shortened out of necessity. They stay in bed until midday and go back to bed after teatime. They deserve much more from life than enforced periods of bedtime.

I hope that many of our pensioners are around on that real day of accounting when the Government go to the country. They will not forget the way in which the Government have treated them in the past six years. They will repay the Government through the ballot box.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): The last few weeks of intense cold have been a nightmare for those on the lowest incomes. The poorer pensioners have to endure much suffering because of their inability to keep their homes anywhere near adequately heated. Gas and electricity prices have increased substantially over the years, at well above the rate of inflation.

When listening to the complacent speech of the Secretary of State, it was difficult to understand why there was so much anxiety in the House and outside. At least the Opposition have tried to explain the justified concern about what has been happening. Since the Conservative party has been in office, the retail prices index has increased by just under 76 per cent. However, in the same period, gas prices have increased by 131·6 per cent. and electricity prices by more than 101 per cent.

I am strongly opposed to large increases in fuel prices. As we know, that is a way for Government to raise revenue through indirect taxation. The burden falls most heavily on those with the smallest incomes. That policy is wrong. If fuel is so expensive, where is the sense and justice in the fact that all people pay the same, regardless of income?

If it is right to give help with rent and rates, why not introduce a fuel rebate scheme during the winter months for those on the smallest incomes and limit the amount that is rebated in price?

It is wrong that many of our constituents—the poorer pensioners and those on the smallest incomes earning perhaps £50 or £60 a week—should pay precisely the same for gas and electricity as Cabinet Ministers and those who earn more than those Ministers. That is why there has been so much hardship and suffering during the past month. People on small incomes have not been able to keep themselves properly warm.

Pensioners on supplementary benefit face much uncertainty. They must obviously wonder whether the exceptionally severe weather payment will be made in their area when a really cold spell starts. In many parts of Britain that payment has been authorised two or more weeks after the very cold weather spell started. I understand that in most cases the payment will be backdated to 6 February. Until the announcement was made, the elderly on the smallest incomes did not know whether they could use more fuel, because they did not know whether any extra assistance would be given. What is more, until the bill arrives they are not in a position to apply for the extra assistance. They do not know how this year's bill will compare with last year's. Altogether, there is a great deal of uncertainty, which has led to much suffering.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) said, retired people are frightened to keep the heat on anywhere near to the level that it should be. They fear not disconnection but receiving a fuel bill which they simply will not be able to afford. Thousands of retired people living on the smallest incomes leave their homes cold, and heat only one room. They go to bed early, and when they are up they often wrap themselves in blankets, simply because of their justified fear about the fuel bill.

We must not forget the many retired people whose incomes are just above supplementary benefit levels. In some cases it is only a few pence above; in others a few pounds. They receive housing benefit because of their inadequate income. It is important to bear in mind—I hope that the Secretary of State does so—that these pensioners do not receive any assistance with their heating bills. What are they supposed to do? Ministers who have been interviewed on radio and television have not been able to give an adequate reply to that question. The plight of about 2 million pensioners receiving housing benefit but not in receipt of supplementary benefit is acute.

As we know, all heating additions as such are to be abolished, and although the Government argue that at the end of the day people are not likely to be worse off, some will be. The Government have admitted that some will be losers and some will be gainers. I fear that some of the people about whom we are particularly concerned will also lose as a result of the Social Security Bill. We make strong criticisms of the mechanics of the exceptionally severe weather payments, but the Government intend to abolish it.

I listened carefully to what the Secretary of State said, but the Social Security Bill now in Committee will mean that somebody in a winter such as this will have to apply to the DHSS local office. Any assistance will come out of discretionary cash or limited social funds. It is likely that any assistance given will be by way of a loan. What good will that be to people who are counting every penny of their small income? I cannot see these pensioners being keen to obtain a loan, and certainly not one that is likely to be paid off out of their weekly benefit. However bad the situation is now, it will be even worse as a result of the changes that the Government have introduced.

Furthermore, by undermining and eroding SERPS the Government are ensuring that future generations of pensioners will be faced with similar problems facing those of today. If SERPS had been allowed to continue, there would have been a reasonable chance that a large number of people now in employment would, once they retired, have an adequate income. However, because the Government are undermining and eroding the scheme, more generations of poverty-stricken pensioners will have to endure the hardship and suffering that so many have endured during January and February this year.

The Government have shown little or no concern for the acute problem of many people on the smallest incomes, particularly pensioners, in the harsh winter months. They have quoted figures, but the Tory Front Bench, and the Tory Back Benches too, have shown little understanding of what is needed. It is a disgrace that people in our society should have to experience such conditions, especially as many of them served in the last war, as my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) said. Is this their due — that they should have to endure such suffering? What sort of society are we when we cannot organise such matters properly, and when we allow so many people to live out their lives in such misery, when extra help should be given when needed? The Government should be condemned, and I hope that all my hon. Friends will support the motion.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand that the first Front Bench speech will begin at a quarter to 7. Five hon. Members still wish to take part in the debate, and if they all speak briefly I hope to be able to call them all.

6.26 pm

Mr. Lewis Stevens (Nuneaton): We have heard from the Opposition Benches the inevitable cry that nothing is being done and the Government are uninterested. However, that is belied by all the facts about what the Government have done in managing to keep control of inflation, which is so vital, and in recognising their commitments to increase pensions and to provide heating additions. The Opposition still claim that the Government have done nothing.

The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) spoke about fuel prices, but he should recall that it was distortion of fuel prices to the domestic consumer that caused the readjustment of prices, to bring about equality, and forced up the prices. That subsidy was indiscriminate and went across the board. Even the benefits that it produced were not going to the most deserving people.

I congratulate the right hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Freeson) because he spoke about the important topic of the insulation of houses. This Government, not the Labour Government, put great emphasis on increasing the take-up of improvement grants on houses. When some improvement grants were increased to 90 per cent., the take-up also increased.

I am glad that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that advertising of the heating allowances for special conditions would be introduced, and that the Government will look into economic support and the social fund to see how we can tackle these problems. That is important in this complex problem. It is not automatic that the people who suffer in the severe weather are those on housing benefit, or in the worst housing conditions. The upturn in the number of deaths in bad weather applies almost irrespective of whether the victims come from inner cities or deprived areas or better accommodation in other parts of the country.

We have to ask ourselves exactly what the problem is and how we can best alleviate it. Sadly, money is a problem but, as my hon,. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway) said, it is also important to identify those who are in genuine need and do not have the heat, warmth comfort and other facilities that they need. Although the social service and other departments have expanded, and the voluntary services also do a great deal in that identification process, much still needs to be done to make the best use of the existing facilities. Anything that can be done to improve the publicity about benefits generally should be seriously considered.

The hon. Member for Walsall, North referred to those with incomes slightly above the qualifying figure for housing benefit. These people are not used to turning to the Department of Health and Social Security for social security. They will be wary about using their limited incomes to heat their homes. My experience is that many people could obtain rate rebates or housing benefit but that they do not apply. The help that is already available to them is not being fully taken up. Advertising would play a major part in persuading them to take up the help that is already there.

The Opposition scare people by saying that the state earnings-related pension is to be abolished. The Government have given a guarantee that those who retire during this century will not be affected by the changes to the state earnings-related pension scheme. The Opposition, however, say that the SERPS reduction is imminent and that it will create immediate difficulties. The Government have not let down the pensioners.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services will look at all possible ways, through the social services and the voluntary organisations, of making known the help that is already available to those who may need it.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): It is generally accepted that the poorest sections of the community include the elderly. Precisely because they are poor they are much more vulnerable to the effects of winter weather than are other people. Most hon. Members have visited African villages and other undeveloped countries where one finds that the dignity of old people is much more prevalent and obvious than it is in this country. The community collectively regards the poor as its responsibility and looks after them as a family.

Party political points have been scored in this debate. I have no objection to that. I make such points, and I shall probably make one or two before I sit down. However, it is important to remember that the difference between basic pension and average earnings is far greater now than it was a few years ago and that it is getting worse. That is why the Labour Government introduced the state earnings-related pension scheme. The drop from average earnings to basic pension was so great that it meant almost immediate poverty. SERPS was designed specifically to reduce that drop, if not to eliminate it.

The great tragedy is that this Government quickly got their eye upon SERPS. They thought that it would prove too costly. Therefore they sought to abolish it, but public opinion was almost unanimous in attacking the Government's proposals, so they watered them down. Nevertheless, the Social Security Bill exercise is designed drastically to cut public expenditure upon social services.

The Secretary of State for Social Services said that the total provision for social security had been increased from £7·5 billion in 1979 to £16·5 billion in 1985. That is true. However, the implication was that that provision must be cut. I take the opposite view. If the will is there the means are there, whatever Government are in power. They can do exactly what they like with the cash. They can spend it upon defence, agriculture, education, roads or housing.

I come back to the proposition that I have always put forward whenever the House has debated matters such as this: that if the will is there and adequate, basic pension can be provided. That proposition is fundamental to this debate. If there were an adequate, basic pension we should not be talking about heating allowances or subsidies of one kind or another. The basic pension would then be at least double what it is now. Public opinion polls have proved that if people were asked to pay increased national insurance contributions, or more income tax, or a combination of both, to achieve that end they would be prepared to do so.

I hope that the Government will take on board the fact that it is no good fiddling around with heating allowances, giving one kind of dribble and drabble here, there and everywhere, by which I mean the voluntary bodies and the local authorities. Give them a basic pension that is adequate for their needs and all these problems will be solved.

Mr. Roy Galley (Halifax): How easy it is to come to this House time after time and cry for more. It would be understandable if the Opposition cried for more only for the pensioners, the disabled and one or two specific categories, but they come to this House and cry for more for every conceivable subject under the sun.

It is clear from the speeches of some Opposition Members that they recognise that there has been some improvement in the position of pensioners. The right hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Freeson) said that that is not relevant to this debate. I suggest to him that it is relevant and that the position is improving. But that does not mean that there are grounds for complacency and that we should not seek greater improvements. Pensions are higher now than they have ever been before and their purchasing power is higher than it has ever been before. Nevertheless, we should seek to increase them. However, Opposition speeches would lead one to believe that there has not been a considerable improvement during the last few years in pensions or in health services.

If one is not responsible for setting the priorities it is easy to cry for more for everything. This Government have given the highest priority to health and pensions. When the Labour Government gave in to the clamour for more from every single group in the community the result was bankruptcy and massive inflation. The Opposition have to ask themselves how that helped pensioners. Many pensioners have small savings, upon which they place great store. They want to have a few hundred pounds with which to deal with emergencies and to cope with their funeral arrangements. Because the last Labour Government gave in to the demands for more for everything, their savings were eroded by half.

There has also been much weeping about energy costs. However, during the period of the Labour Government the price of electricity rose by over 170 per cent. That is not caring for the elderly. Caring for the elderly means keeping inflation under control and creating a real improvement in their standard of living. That is what this Government have done.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) referred to the social services. In my part of the country those services are absolutely superb. That does not mean that they cannot be improved. There are groups in our society, for example the physically disabled, in particular the young physically disabled, for whom we ought to do more. We ought to look at what can be provided for them. The number of home helps has been increased. Furthermore, the number of day care places has risen and the amount of sheltered accommodation has been increased. The number of main meals that are served has risen, as has the number of luncheon clubs. The voluntary effort that enables a more flexible response to be made to the changing circumstances of the elderly has also improved.

Do Opposition Members put into practice what they preach when the money is available? The answer is no. At present the West Yorkshire metropolitan county council has £15 million in the kitty, money that could go back to the ratepayers or to the district councils to assist in the provision of better social services. Is it going to do that? Not a bit of it. It is going to fritter away that money on all sorts of ludicrous schemes, such as building a theatre for £1 million in Huddersfield. When it comes to the crunch, what we get from the Opposition are words, not deeds. The fact is that the pensioners' position when the Labour party was in power was much worse.

I must make one important point to my right hon. Friend which picks up a comment made by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire. When we abolish the heating addition and institute a pensioner premium, there will be a psychological and perception problem. It is important for my right hon. Friend to look at the possibility of tailoring that pensioner premium more closely to the costs and overall needs of the elderly and tying it, not necessarily to the RPI, but to a more specific index.

The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) said that in the present weather crisis the Government had shown little concern. That is a travesty of what has happened. There was a ready response in that practically the whole country is now covered by severe weather payments, which will be backdated.

The situation for pensioners has improved, it is improving, and it must improve more. We must continue to give a high priority to pensioners, but one cannot do everything overnight. If we try to do everything overnight, we shall end up with very large cuts in health services and draconian measures in social services such as were taken by the Labour Government in 1977.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): In answer to what has been said by the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Colley), if society cannot afford to pay its pensioners, who can it afford to pay, and what are we not paying them?

Pensioners in this country receive almost the lowest pension paid in any country in Europe. They live in the coldest homes with the highest rate of death through hypothermia, and have the worst possible conditions of all pensioners. Is that because the country is so poor that it cannot afford the pension, as Conservative Members seem to be saying, or is it because the Government prefer to spend money on other things, such as Trident submarines and the nuclear missile programme? It is question of choice. If we wish to end the monstrous death rate of pensioners every winter, something else has to go. I suggest that it is the arms programme, and I suggest the nuclear arms programme at that.

There are at present 9 million pensioners in the country, and the number is increasing. Roughly half those pensioners are below the official poverty level which is 140 per cent. above supplementary benefit level. Half are pensioners living in a state of penury and half in a state of extreme fear. We should stop looking upon pensioners as a problem in society, and we should start looking at them as people who have made an enormous contribution throughout their working lives and still have a contribution to make; they do not wish to be patronised, but they do wish to be able to live in some decency.

In areas such as the one I represent, a whole plethora of cuts in various aspects of Government spending is hitting the pensioners' living standard. There is a lack of a decent basic pension. That is the first requirement. Secondly, there are cuts in the health services, which fall disproportionately on pensioners. If Conservative Members think there have been no cuts in the Health Service, they should come to my constituency and see the closed and boarded-up hospitals. The same thing is happening in every other inner urban area.

There is also the loss of the Greater London council and the metropolitan counties and of the assistance that they have given to pensioners' organisations. They have managed to bring in subsidised or free travel for the elderly which is not available in many Conservative and Liberal-controlled county authorities.

The immediate issue to which the motion addresses itself is hypothermia and the cost of fuel for pensioners. A great deal can be done. The Government choose to use the fuel pricing mechanisms of gas and electricity as a form of taxation on the population of the country. Because of the way that system operates, the smallest consumers pay the most. Because of the system of standing charges pensioners are penalised for being old and for wanting warm homes. Because they cannot afford to pay the bills they do not heat their homes properly, and many of them die each winter. I find it nauseating, to put it mildly, that Conservative Members should be concerned about hypothermia yet do nothing about fuel prices, and that they have not supported the measures to abolish standing charges for the elderly or done anything to alleviate the plight of pensioners.

Unless something is done very quickly, the wringing of hands that has happened in the last hour and a half will happen again next spring and the spring after that when we see again the monstrous death rate for pensioners. We must stop patronising pensioners. We must start by working with those splendid pensioners' action groups and others that are politically organising and seeking decent pensions and living standards for themselves. They are the people whom I believe will decide the outcome of the next election. I very much hope that they will have the opportunity to do so.

6.45 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): This has been the coldest winter for 40 years. It is therefore as stupid as it is irrelevant for the Secretary of State and many of his hon. Friends to come here and bleat on about what previous Labour Governments have done in other years. We are talking about this year, which is the coldest for 40 years and in which the Government's own medical statistician has said that 200 pensioners are dying every day.

The hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) said that the Government had made a ready response to the problem. It is a year since we last had these debates, a year since the Minister of State said that the system of paying exceptionally severe weather allowances was "a shambles". What did the Government do about it? Damn all, quite frankly, is what the Government did about it.

It was December 1985 before new guidance was issued, the guidance that is now in place. All that the Government can say about it is that heating costs are met and that they have been doing a good job because they have put up the regular sums that people get through heating additions. But those are payments for normal heating for normal needs, and are not intended to cope with conditions of extreme cold. I understand that the Department used to recommend 21 deg C as a suitable temperature for the elderly and had to abandon it because it found that over 90 per cent. of pensioners could not afford to heat their homes to that temperature. Even on the basis of normal need we know that there is a problem, never mind on the basis of exceptional need. The Secretary of State said that special help cannot be a substitute for the payments. Nobody is asking for this as a substitute; we are demanding the payment in addition to the sums normally paid because people need heating in additional ways over and above what is normal.

The implication of the Government's attitude is that the system is now working all right with the new guidance. Can they really believe that? I spoke to a pensioner from Kent last week who told me that he rang his area office when the temperature was minus 22 deg F, and the office said that it was not making exceptional severe weather payments. He rang the office the week after when the temperature was minus 12 deg F. By then the office had worked out the system, and was prepared to make such payments. Even the Government's own local offices do not understand the system as the Government well know.

The Government commissioned some research fairly recently to evaluate these schemes. It showed that 90 per cent. of the pensioners who should be entitled to the allowance do not receive it because they do not know about the allowance, because they cannot find out or because they are turned down. The research showed that this is because of the complexity of the system.

I have a copy of the questionnaire which is sent to anybody who applies for the allowance. It has 20 separate questions. It includes, for example, a request to forward the bills for the same period for the last two years, how much savings people normally hold, what they would normally expect to pay for their fuel, whether they have had any recent period of illness and, if so, for how long, whether they have had to use more fuel and how they have managed to buy the extra fuel they have needed. There are 20 such questions which have to be answered satisfactorily when people make the claim. The complexity of the system saves the Government about £25 million a year in supplementary benefit.

The Government say that it is up to the chief adjudication officer to suggest to local offices what action to take. But it was crystal clear that local offices had been waiting for a lead. The day that the chief adjudication officer put out his guidance, Ministers were delighted to tell us that local offices were falling over themselves to declare that theirs was an area in which payment could be made. I think that it was the Under-Secretary who said, "As I speak, fresh news is coming in of more tens of offices which are making this payment."

Does the Secretary of State imagine that the chief adjudication officer was not paying attention to what was going on in the House when, day after day, Labour Members, and occasionally Conservative Members, raised the problems of their constituents and the only answer that they received was that heating allowances had been increased and that the Government thought they were doing a good job? Where were the moving pleas from the Government Front Bench, the expressions of concern and the hope that the chief adjudication officer would be listening to what was said and might take some action? Not a word. Then the Minister says that it was up to the adjudication officer and there was no need for Government action.

We called on the Government to publicise the allowances. Only a week ago they resisted that idea and said that they were sure that the scheme would be all over the papers and that everyone would know. We welcome the Secretary of State's belated decision to go for some Government advertising.

Let me draw the Government's attention to the research that they commissioned, which points out that it is completely unnecessary to go through the farrago of making people fill out a questionnaire with 20 different questions and apply to the local office. The report says:

"The department knows exactly who needs help and there is no need for this bureaucratic system at all."

The Government have been advised that about 3·5 million pensioners could get that help simply by the Government looking through their own records.

Several hon. Members have suggested that we cannot find the money for everything and they talked about throwing money around, and so on. Let me draw to the attention of the hon. Member for Halifax the fact that in 1984-85 the gas levy—the special payment demanded by the Government from the gas industry—was £500 million. The electricity levy was £406 million. That is an example of money being thrown around. It is an example of money put on fuel prices by the Government.

At least the Secretary of State acknowledged that there is a serious problem in this area. Nevertheless, the Government have cut funds for the home insulation scheme, which seems a rather strange way of recognising the problem. He suggested that in future it would be better because people may be able to make claims from the social fund. He did not remind the House that they will be able to apply for loans from the social fund only if they are already drawing income support. He did not point out that if they have as much as £500 saved for their funeral, they will not be able to claim a penny. Nor did he remind the House that, under the Social Security Bill, which establishes a social fund, the Government are cutting people's pension entitlement by half, bringing it down to less than the basic pension will purchase today. Through that proposal and others in the Bill millions of pensioners will be losers in the short and long term.

As the motion says, the plight of pensioners is great, but unless and until we remove the Government they will find no remedy.

6.52 pm

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): The Opposition have done a genuine service by bringing the subject to the House for debate and enabling at least some more serious contributions to be made to what is undoubtedly a serious and difficult issue. I pay tribute in that respect to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) and to a number of my hon. Friends who have spoken.

But from the Opposition Front Bench we have not only not had a serious contribution to the debate of a serious subject, but we have had the most disgracefully misleading use of statistics that I have heard in the House for some considerable time. I shall give my figures. They are exactly the same as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's figures which are good enough to bear repeating. Indeed, they are important enough to bear repeating.

Let me remind the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) what the Leader of the Opposition asked my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister at Question Time earlier this week. That too is worth repeating. Any team that has the Leader of the Opposition on its side needs a jolly good goalkeeper. He asked the Prime Minister:

"Why . . . has our death rate during the winter been three times that of the United States of America and four times that of Sweden?"—[Official Report, 4 March 1986; Vol. 93, c. 149.]

That is a very good question, but as soon as we looked into the data on which it must have been based we found that it could only have been based on those for the three years between 1976 and 1979 when the right hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends were in office.

Then we had the misuse of statistics about hypothermia deaths this winter by the hon. Member for Oldham, West. He referred to a tenfold increase in deaths from hypothermia. Let me repeat what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said:

"There is absolutely no evidence of a ten-fold increase. The only basis on which that statement could have been made is a total misreading of figures which compare 1975 with 1985."

When one looks at the figures properly it is clear that it was the winter of 1979 when most deaths with mention of hypothermia took place during the first three months of the year. I hope that in due course the hon. Gentleman will apologise for the way in which he sought to mislead the House and the country tonight.

Let me move on quickly because I want to be nice to the hon. Gentleman as far as I can. I want to congratulate him—I would be grateful if I could have his attention for a moment.

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman did not listen to him.

Mr. Newton: I listened with great care to the hon. Member for Oldham, West, which is why I have been refuting some of the points that he made. However, I want to congratulate the hon. Gentleman because it is nearly an auspicious anniversary in his life. In March 1976 a report in The Times said:

"Old age pensioners shouted down Mr. Meacher, Under-Secretary of State at the Department of Health and Social Services, yesterday as he tried to explain the Government's record on pensioners."

That was 10 years ago.

Something else happened roughly 10 years ago and I was put in mind of it by the strictures of the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) on the complexity of the exceptionally severe weather payment regulations and the problems associated with it. I am certainly not going to defend those regulations as a miracle of simplicity, but I have here a booklet published by the Department of Energy in December 1978 on the electricity discount scheme 1979. That was the Labour Government's answer to not dissimilar problems at that time. It is 17 pages long. It contains some 60 questions and I can convey something of its flavour by quoting one or two. One question reads:

"I am in dispute with my electricity board about my bill. If this is not settled before the scheme ends how can I make sure I claim my discount?"

The answer was:

"Write immediately to the electricity division, the Department of Energy."

Question:

"I applied for a Rate/Rent Rebate/Rent allowance but did not hear from my local authority until after 30th June. What should I do?"

Answer:

"Write to the Department of Energy Electricity Division".

What a farce that was.

It is a pity that we cannot use visual aids in the House. I have here the visual description of the electricity discount scheme sent to the post offices to try to tell them how to operate it. It was a nightmare of complexity which nobody understood, which was ineffective, and which the incoming Conservative Government got rid of in favour of a policy of systematically and substantially increasing the regular weekly payments of heating addition to greatly increased numbers of people.

That is the point that the hon. Members for Oldham, West and for Derby, South have persistently refused to focus on in this argument. Wherever one looks, there has been a substantial increase since 1979 in the regular extra weekly help given to virtually every pensioner in receipt of supplementary benefit—far more than those helped by Labour Members—to the severely sick and disabled and families with young children, to the point at which, on any reasonable reading of the combination of what is in the basic supplementary benefit rate and the heating additions, any supplementary pensioner householder over 85 receives about £600 a year—£150 a quarter—to help with paying the heating bills.

That is the right way to be giving such help. That is the record on which we stand and on which we shall seek to build. We have no need at all to apologise to Her Majesty's Opposition in the light of their miserable record in the self-same subject.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 33 (Questions on amendments) and agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House recognises the difficulties faced by elderly people during periods of severe weather; commends the Government's record of paying higher retirement pensions to more pensioners than ever before, of increasing the supplementary benefit scale rates, of providing for the first time automatic heating additions of £2·20 per week for all supplementary pensioner households over 65 years of age, and of introducing a higher rate of £5·45 per week for such pensioners over 85 years of age; notes with approval that payments under the exceptionally severe weather scheme are now available throughout mainland Britain; and observes that the present relative stability in fuel prices demonstrates the value of firm control over inflation and is in stark contrast to the increase of 170 per cent. in electricity prices over the period of the Labour Government between 1974 and 1979.

London Docklands Railway (City Extension) Bill (By Order)

Order for Second Reading read.

7.13 pm

Mr. Neil Thorne (Ilford, South): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: I should announce that I have not selected any of the Instructions.

Mr. Thorne: London's docklands have been in decline for many years. An early proposal to help with the regeneration of the area by extending the London Underground through the docklands to Thamesmead had to be abandoned because of the high cost—more than £400 million at today's prices.

A start has been made to revitalise the docklands. By 1985 more than £1 billion had been invested. More than 200 companies have set up businesses, 4,700 new jobs have been created and 1,300 jobs have been preserved. Moreover, 2,000 private homes have been built, of which 42 per cent. have been bought by residents of dockland boroughs.

There has also been a considerable improvement in the road structure. Most important of all, London Regional Transport is constructing a new light railway through the area. Canary wharf is a site of some 71 acres in the Isle of Dogs, two miles to the east of the City. A £1·5 billion development of 10 million sq ft of offices and supporting accommodation is planned by an American consortium. The need for an extension of the City is well known and arises principally from the limited amount of space left to expand it as a financial centre. The consortium has insisted that the development will not go ahead without a rail link from Canary wharf to the Bank, as the existing terminus at Tower Gateway will not tie in with the development physically. Nor will it tie in with the City in the minds of those who would wish to set up business or work at Canary wharf. Hence the promotion of this private Bill.

The Bill is promoted by London Regional Transport. Its powers and responsibilities are set out in the London Regional Transport Act 1984, section 2 of which provides that it shall be the general duty of London Regional Transport, in accordance with principles from time to time approved by the Secretary of State, and in conjunction with the British Railways Board, to provide or secure the provision of public passenger transport services for Greater London. The Act also confers a power to promote Bills. A private Bill has been promoted by LRT and its predecessors in almost every Session since 1963, when the London Transport Board was set up. The present Bill has been modelled on the earlier Acts of LRT's predecessors.

Powers to build the initial railway from Tower Gateway to Island Gardens and from Stratford to Poplar were acquired by the then London Transport Executive through the normal parliamentary procedure for railway construction—the London Docklands Railway Act 1984 and London Docklands Railway Act 1985. Responsibility for funding the railway, cash limited by the Government at £77 million outturn, was through the London Docklands Development Corporation and the Greater London council. The GLC role has subsequently been assumed by London Regional Transport. A small project team, locally based in Poplar, and reporting to a joint LRT-LDDC board, is supervising the design-and-construct contract which was let on a fixed price basis to the General Electric Company/Mowlem railway group. The contract is in the form of a single package covering design and construction and nearly all of the equipment. There are severe penalties should the railway not be ready for opening in mid-1987.

The initial railway links the Isle of Dogs with the important regional centre of Stratford to the north and the eastern side of the City. Much of the route makes use of disused railway line and is re-using existing materials where possible. In the Isle of Dogs, much of the railway is on new viaduct, including new bridges across the West India docks. Progress has been rapid—75 per cent. of the contract work has already been completed and the project is both on time and to budget. Much of the civil engineering work is already complete, even on the northern leg to Stratford, which received parliamentary approval less than one year ago. Track laying is now progressing.

The City terminus, Tower Gateway, in Minories, is adjacent to the British Rail line to Fenchurch street station. It was not possible to link with the Underground at Tower Hill without the expense of tunnelling, and this could not be afforded within the £77 million project cost. A terminus within Fenchurch street station was not possible because the capacity was needed by British Rail and an alternative, a tunnel to Aldgate East, was prohibitively expensive. Proposals have been put forward to improve Tower Hill Underground station to handle the interchange traffic but London Regional Transport recognises the inadequacy of the interchange.

The trains are much faster than buses, they are smaller and faster than conventional rail vehicles and generally serve closely spaced stations. They are automatically driven but each will have a member of staff on board who will check tickets, assist passengers and be able to deal with emergencies. Although the stations are unstaffed they will have closed circuit television surveillance and facilities for passengers to contact and talk directly with the control centre. All stations will be fully accessible to disabled passengers with lifts for wheelchair access.

In the late summer of last year London Regional Transport was approached by the American consortium which is proposing a multi-million pound property development on Canary wharf in the Isle of Dogs. The consortium sees transport as a fundamental requirement for the success of the development and approached LRT with proposals for a westward extension of the docklands light railway to Bank. The view of LRT was that the City extension would be a major advantage to London's public transport infrastructure and would resolve the problem that had been highlighted by the late Martin Stevens of the far from ideal City terminus at Tower Gateway.

The Bank extension proposed by the Canary wharf development consortium leaves the initial railway just east of Tower Gateway and goes into tunnel before reaching the precincts of the Tower. The lines continue in deep level twin tunnels beneath Tower Hill, Byward street, Great Tower street, Eastcheap and King William street. Those tunnels would have a side walkway for emergency evacuation, maintaining the docklands light railway facility of full access for the disabled. Traffic on the extension is estimated at 9,500 passengers in the busiest hour when the development is complete.

A link with the City and the major development at Canary wharf would increase traffic from 6 million to 44 million journeys a year. Inevitably some aspects of the initial railway would need to be changed. Trains and platforms for example would be longer and some of the structures would need to be strengthened to accommodate the longer trains. There would be more trains and more frequent services. Other technical changes would be necessary to the track layout at Crossharbour and near Stratford, to accommodate the stepped-up services. A larger station at Canary wharf is also envisaged. The extension would substantially increase jobs on the light railway from about 100 to 200.

LRT sees the scheme as an opportunity to overcome the weakness of the initial docklands light railway City terminus, and to provide an excellent new addition to London's public transport infrastructure in partnership with the private sector.

The principal function of this Bill is to authorise the carrying out of railway works. The authority of Parliament provides protection for the builders of the railway against actions for nuisance. Since statutory authority is required for work, it is also convenient to obtain from Parliament any compulsory purchase powers required. This follows the usual practice.

I do not intend to describe the contents of the Bill clause by clause. However, there are certain features that the House may wish to be aware of. I also wish to mention some significant changes suggested by the promoters which they hope will meet many of the criticisms levelled against the Bill as originally drafted.

In part II details of the works are shown on the plans and sections, which were deposited with Parliament at the time of the deposit of the Bill.

The scheme in the Bill comprises a twin track railway branching off the railway authorised by the London Docklands Railway Acts 1984 and 1985. The extension leaves the initial railway immediately to the west of the bridge over Leman street descending deeply into cut and cover under Mansell street and then into bored tunnels in front of the Tower to pick up an alignment beneath the District line to the west of Tower Hill station. The line then continues westward on a downward gradient following the District line tunnels beneath Great Tower street and Eastcheap to King William street. The tunnels would have walkways which could be used to evacuate trains in the event of emergencies and the platforms are to be long enough ultimately to accommodate trains of three articulated units.

The line of the railway has been planned so that the tunnels are, for the most part, constructed at a depth below the streets so as to avoid any problem of interference with the existing building foundations and inhibition of future building developments.

The arrangements originally set out in the Bill for the terminus at Bank and for an interchange at Tower Hill have provoked a good deal of concern. In particular the City corporation has petitioned against the Bill on the grounds that the Bank station and associated proposals are unsatisfactory and unsuitable.

London Regional Transport acknowledges that the least satisfactory feature of the scheme currently before Parliament is the passenger movement within the station at Bank, which already handles 26 million passengers a year. The light railway extension would increase total traffic at Bank by a third. LRT and London Underground Ltd. were concerned about this and although the original scheme would have worked, LRT decided to re-examine the options available, with the help of consulting engineers, Mott Hay and Anderson, which has considerable experience of tunnelling in this part of central London. It assisted in the Northern Line construction in the 1920s and work on the Waterloo and City line in the 1950s. As a result, a revised arrangement has been proposed for Bank station with the docklands light railway platforms in a different location.

The scheme envisaged in the Bill has docklands light railway platforms below the Mansion House, with the main entry and exit route to a new ticket hall near the top of the Waterloo and City line travolator, below Queen Victoria street. A deep level subway connection is provided to the Central and Northern lines, but passengers to and from the Circle and District lines would need to walk the full length of the Northern Line platform, which is a key concern, and along the existing escalator and subway link to Monument station. The Bill allows for a station at Tower Hill which would meet the needs of passengers interchanging with the District and Circle lines, but there would still be considerable movement along the Bank Northern line platforms. The proposed station at Tower Hill has itself attracted petitions against the Bill.

In the revised proposals the platforms are below the Northern line platforms under King William street. The overrun tunnel would be transferred from Cheapside to Princes street. There would be a new escalator exit to an extended Northern line ticket hall, a facility which would also be available to Northern line passengers. A separate escalator route at the southern end of the station would take interchange passengers to Monument avoiding the Northern line platforms and the present escalator link and would obviate the need for a station at Tower Hill.

The new scheme also has a new deep level subway from the docklands railway and the Northern line through to the Waterloo and City line, with a branch to the Central line. This new route would bypass the existing congested routes via the ticket halls, which are used by 30,000 passengers a day. As with the original scheme, there is provision for lift access to the surface for people with disabilities. The revised proposals would meet the requirements of a number of petitioners against the Bill in its present form.

Despite those major advantages, the revised scheme would cost no more than the earlier proposal. It is against that background that LRT will be asking Parliament for permission to amend the Bill by an additional provision to acquire the land needed. At the same time it will be possible to delete certain powers from the Bill, including the need for any access under the Mansion House. Discussions are taking place with the City corporation which has been supplied with drawings of the revised scheme.

Part III deals with lands powers. This empowers LRT to acquire land or take temporary possession of it. The Bill does not contain provision for compensation for land authorised to be acquired, as the Land Compensation Acts 1961 and 1973 apply automatically once Parliament authorises the compulsory acquisiton.

I should point out that clause 17 provides for LRT to take temporary possession of land in Trinity square, but this provision would not be necessary if the revised scheme is adopted.

I hope that it is clear from what I have said that the Bill would provide a means for London Regional Transport to carry out a valuable development of the public transport network of London. As promoters, London Regional

[Mr. Thorne]

Transport has shown a willingness to amend the scheme when that was shown to be sensible and I am sure that it will do all that it can to ameliorate any remaining fears or problems facing the petitioners.

Much has been made in the press and elsewhere of the connection between the Bill and the Canary wharf development. However, we should not lose sight of the more general benefits of the extension. The improved connections that it would provide would greatly improve ease of access to and from a large part of docklands for the benefit of industrial and commercial regeneration throughout the area. I am sure that hon. Members whose constituencies are served by the railway are well aware of the potential benefits to their constituents in terms of quicker and more convenient travel. I believe that it is in everyone's interests for the Bill to be given a Second Reading so that the opportunity to secure these benefits is not jeopardised.

7.30 pm

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): I should make it clear at the start that I do not intend to vote against the Bill. I shall not do so for the good and simple reason that was touched upon in the last few words of the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne). The extension of the London docklands light railway from Tower Hill on the edge of my constituency to the new terminal at Bank would greatly improve travel facilities for many of my constituents, especially those in the whole docklands area south of Commercial road, who have long suffered from inadequate public transport.

However, in the interests of my constituency, and having regard to my wider duties as a Member, I feel bound to protest at the astonishingly scanty and contradictory information that we have been given about the proposed railway extension. The hon. Member for Ilford, South need not reproach himself when I say that he has not begun to answer most of the questions that are in the minds of my hon. Friends and myself. I think that the answers to our questions inevitably must be found in what Ministers have to say, and the confusion arises from a great deal of what they have already said.

On the face of it, the Bill is about extending the London docklands railway for a relatively short but important distance from Tower Hill to the Bank Underground station. That extension raises important questions of finance and engineering, the positioning of the Bank terminal to avoid congestion and rail management and control.

However, the Bill is about much more than that. It is about another and related proposal. It is about the massive development, as a major offshoot of the City of London, of Canary wharf on the Isle of Dogs. It is also about major changes in the capacity and design of the London docklands railway. I refer to the stretch between Tower Hill and the Isle of Dogs, which is now being built and is due to be completed next year. So close is the relationship between the proposed development of the offshoot of the City at Canary wharf and the Bill that it is true to say that for the Government and the financial interests that are backing them the two projects are mutually dependent. If there is no Canary wharf development, there will be no City extension of the docklands light railway. Equally, if there is no City extension, there will be no Canary wharf development.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) had that put on the record clearly when he questioned the Secretary of State for Transport on 13 January. He asked:

"Will the Secretary of State confirm that the westward extension will go ahead only if the Canary wharf project goes ahead first?"

The Secretary of State replied:

"Yes, sir."—[Official Report, 13 January 1986; Vol 89, c. 757.]

We are concerned with two problems. First, there is the railway extension, which is the immediate subject of the Bill. Secondly, there is the Canary wharf development, about which we have virtually no information other than that which has been provided by the public relations advisers on behalf of the financial sponsors of those projects. It is strange, indeed ludicrous, that the relevant information should be kept from the House and our constituents, but for that we must blame the Secretary of State for the Environment, to whom I wrote some months ago as soon as I heard of the Canary wharf development, for his refusal to hold a public inquiry.

The scale and importance of the development at Canary wharf is not in doubt. The proposal is to build up to 10 million sq ft of purpose-built office accommodation to house the latest information technology and to serve a massive banking and financial service complex at Canary wharf. According to the promoters, this will have an estimated work force of 49,000 in executive, clerical and associated jobs, and at least another 8,000 workers to provide off-site support services.

The promoters' claim has been backed by the preliminary findings of the independent Henley Centre, which claims that about 21,000 of the 57,000 jobs would go to local residents in the docklands boroughs. I believe that it is the largest office development ever proposed in the United Kingdom. But, incredibly, simply because Canary wharf lies within the Isle of Dogs enterprise zone, where industrial and commercial development is exempted from the national regime of town and country planning, the Secretary of State for the Environment feels able to refuse to hold a public inquiry.

What the impact will be of this vast additional work force, if the estimates turn out to be true, on the Isle of Dogs and on the borough of Tower Hamlets, what effects there will be on land use and land prices throughout the area, what additions of rail and road transport will be required to service this vastly increased working population, and what the environmental effects of making this massive additional transport provision will be on the residential community, we simply do not know.

I have urged the Secretary of State to call in the development, to appoint an inspector and to hold a public inquiry. In spite of his previous refusals, I repeat that call tonight. There is no reason why, with an energetic Secretary of State and a well-chosen inspector, such an inquiry should take more than six months to hold. If the Secretary of State had accepted my plea last October, the inquiry would by now be more than half way over and be concluded by the early summer—well ahead, I suspect, of the conclusion of the legislative processes affecting the Bill.

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Poplar): Or of their getting the money.

Mr. Shore: Indeed, that may be true, as my hon. Friend says. Without such an inquiry and the information that it would provide, we cannot make any real sense of the Bill. If the Secretary of State continues to refuse an inquiry, the instruction that I have tabled today, which calls upon "the committee to consider the economic social and environmental effects of the provisions of the Bill on persons living and/or working in the area served by the dockland light railway" will be a poor but next best thing, together, of course, with the committee proceedings on the Bill.

I shall turn direct to the proposed City extension. Can the Minister confirm that since the Bill was published a major change — of course he can confirm this — has already taken place? The hon. Member for Ilford, South has told us that London Regional Transport has agreed a new layout of the Bank terminus. The intention now is to bring it out at King William street, with direct connections with the Northern line, as opposed to what seemed to be the Waterloo and City line connection and a ticket hall below Queen Victoria street. This is a substantial change in a matter of four months, and I would like to know whether it has been fully researched, and whether it has met the objections laid by the City of London corporation. In any event, as the hon. Member for Ilford, South fairly reminded us, it will require what is called an additional provision to the Bill.

Can the Minister tell us about the control and financing of the proposed City extension line? We have had a series of statements, mainly in written answers to questions, from both the Secretary of State and the Under-Secretary of State. On 11 November 1985 the Under-Secretary said:

"I understand that London Regional Transport is currently examining proposals for a privately financed extension of the Dockland light railway westwards to Bank." — [Official Report, 11 November 1985; Vol. 86, c. 78.]

A fortnight or so later, on 27 November, the Secretary of State for Transport said:

"An understanding has now been reached with it"— the Canary wharf consortium—

"that it will contribute £30 million towards the construction of the extension and, unless others can come forward, secure underwriting of an agreed privatisation scheme. My right hon. Friend"—

I assume that he is referring to the Secretary of State for the Environment—

"and I have endorsed this understanding."

He added:

"There will be opportunity for other people who are interested in owning and operating the extended railway to put forward alternatives to the consortium's proposal."—[Official Report, 27 November; Vol. 87, c. 565.]

The following day, 28 November, the Under-Secretary spelt out the Government's approach when he said:

"The Government believe that any further investment in the docklands light railway should be privately funded, and that the railway should be owned and operated in the private sector." —[Official Report, 28 November 1986; Vol. 87, c. 674.]

As recently as 13 January the Secretary of State, replying to an oral question, said:

"it is a very important breakthrough that the provision of public transport can now be contemplated in the private sector."— [Official Report, 13 January 1986; Vol. 89, c. 757.]

The intention is clear. Such an extension should be privately financed, privately run and privately managed.

The idea of spatchcocking a privately owned railway into a publicly owned and run London Regional Transport rail system is bizarre. It raises incredibly complex questions of integration with the surrounding public transport system, not to mention the major problems involved in financing its operating costs. Is this still the Government's intention? Is it the intention of the Canary wharf consortium? According to my information, the consortium neither wishes nor intends to turn itself into a railway operating company.

I am informed that the consortium has discussed making a financial contribution with the Secretary of State. That is why the Secretary of State referred to the contribution of £30 million in the statement of 27 November. Are we correct in believing that that contribution has been increased, by negotiation, to about £45 million? If that is so, what form will it take? What form will any other financial contribution take? Will it be a grant, a fixed interest loan, a share in the equity, or what?

What is the Secretary of State's current forecast for the total cost of the City extension? Is it still the estimated £70 million, the figure quoted last November when the Bill was first published? These are important questions. Unless the financial arrangements are satisfactorily concluded, and unless it is clearly understood that this extension line will be a publicly financed operation, there will be no certainty that, when the Bill is passed, the work will be successfully concluded or that the line can be kept solvent in the years ahead.

We are entitled to ask about the implications of the City extension line for the rest of the docklands light railway, the stretch that will run from Tower Hill to the island garden on the Isle of Dogs. The implications are both financial and physical.

With regard to finance, is it still the Government's intention — I quote once again from the Secretary of State for Transport's statement on 27 November 1985—

"to offer . . . to any appropriate person who is prepared to construct the City extension" the management, ownership and control of the rest of the London docklands railway? We are entitled to a reply to that question. We need to know because, if I have understood correctly the Secretary of State's statement, the go-ahead for the City extension line is "subject to final agreement between LRT and the consortium on the detailed design and costs of the City extension, and on the particulars of the privatisation scheme, and to the completion of a master building agreement between the consortium and the LDDC on the Canary wharf development, as well as to the consent of Parliament to the Bill" — [Official Report, 27 November 1985; Vol. 87, c. 565.]

We have no information on the physical implications of the City extension for the London docklands railway, a large section of which is now under construction, except an explanatory note issued in February by London Regional Transport. I think that the hon. Member for Ilford, South drew on this document in his speech. The explanatory note states that the City extension link and the major development at Canary wharf will increase traffic from 6 million to 44 million journeys a year, with an hourly peak of about 9,500 passengers along the proposed City extension line. That is a massive, sevenfold increase in the carrying capacity required of the London docklands railway now under construction.

London Regional Transport's brief modestly states:

"inevitably some aspects of the initial railway would need to be changed. Trains and platforms for example will be longer and some of the structures would need to be strengthened to accommodate the longer trains. There would be more trains and more frequent services. Other technical changes would be necessary to the track layout at Crossharbour and North Stratford to accommodate the step up service. A larger station at Canary Wharf is envisaged."

According to my rough calculations, instead of two-coach trains, at least three coaches would be required and the frequency would increase by seven to roughly one train every one and a half minutes during the day.

The initial railway, now under construction, has been designed for far lower capacity and frequency. What are the expected costs of this vastly increased train service? What figure can the Secretary of State put upon it? What will these major modifications of platforms and rolling stock do to the estimated date when the new service will come into operation? Large stretches of the new service will run through residential areas in my constituency. What estimates have been made about the likely environmental effects? Most important, what is the likely increase in noise disturbance?

What are the implications of the proposed new developments for road traffic in the area? If Canary wharf generates about 57,000 new jobs on the Isle of Dogs, what proportion of the employees working there can be expected to come by car, as opposed to rail? I have seen estimates of the use of the rail link as high as 35 to 40 per cent., and as low as 20 to 25 per cent. On the first assumption, about 30,000 people will travel to Canary wharf by car, and on the second assumption it will not be far short of 40,000 people. This takes no account of the delivery vehicles and messenger services that would also be involved.

Has any estimate been made of the capacity of the road system between the City and the Isle of Dogs to cater for this vast increase in road traffic? Is the highway wide enough? What are the implications for the use of the so-called docklands northern relief road and for Cable street, which lies between? What are the likely environmental and noise effects of such a massive increase in road traffic? How will a horrendous bottleneck be avoided on the Isle of Dogs, and what parking facilities have been planned for this great mass of commuter cars?

I do not know the answers to those questions, nor, I suspect, does the Secretary of State. Sensible planning is not an optional extra, a luxury, a bureaucratic exercise. It is an essential requirement for making sure that we can avoid a monumental snarl-up of traffic, with attendant great and unnecessary disturbances to residential communities that lie on the route of the proposed road and rail routes.

I had hoped to be able to move the motion that I tabled:

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the Bill to consider the economic, social and environmental effects of the provisions of the Bill on persons living and or working in the area served by the Docklands Light Railway."

That is not to be, as the Instruction has not been called. However, I hope that these matters will be considered as the Bill proceeds.

7.48 pm

Mr. Michael Heseltine (Henley): I listened with great interest to the speech of the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore). He asked a bewildering range of questions about the impact of the extension of the railway or the proposal to build offices in the east end of London.

I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman would have been able to contribute to this debate like no other man because he was Secretary of State for the Environment for many years and has represented an east end constituency for many years in this House. If it had been possible to make these great calculations and to work them out with the precision that his questions implied, if there is a sort of planning environment and if there are answers, why did he never find them? What did the right hon. Gentleman do with that opportunity? There was no shortage of consultation, investigation or analysis. The whole environment of the east end of London was about inquiry, discussion, forecast and planning, but it was not about anything that mattered. Nothing happened. The right hon. Gentleman, who presided over the whole fortunes of the area and one of the most exciting reclamation schemes in the world, left a desert for this Government. That was the legacy that the Government inherited.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heseltine: I shall not give way at this stage. Indeed, the hon. Gentleman was equally guilty.

When the Government at last began to grapple with the problem of bringing hope and life to the east end of London, two people were conspicuous in seeking to frustrate the Government's endeavours. The Government decided that the time for dialogue, consultation and planning was over and that it was time for results, and the first step that we had to take to get results was to wrest the decision-making capability from the hands of the right hon. Gentleman and the Labour party.

Mr. Spearing: I remind the right hon. Gentleman of the day when he and the present Secretary of State for Northern Ireland visited my constituency and the whole of the Beckton area. The London Docklands Joint Committee, which was established by the right hon. and learned Member for Hexham (Mr. Rippon) under the previous Conservative Government, had a Beckton district plan, under which the Thames water authority installed more than £20 million-worth of drainage works, and land reserved for public housing has now largely been taken over by private developers. When the right hon. Gentleman visited the area, were not those works in full swing?

Mr. Heseltine: I have no doubt that there were infrastructure works such as the hon. Gentleman described, but I remember the open spaces and the unforgivable dereliction which characterised the east end of London for most of the post-war period.

Mr. Shore: The right hon. Gentleman's account is a travesty of what happened. He knows perfectly well that the docklands area was allowed to rot. Under the right hon. and learned Member for Hexham (Mr. Rippon), nothing happened. It was not until I came to the Department of the Environment and made the docklands area one of the six partnership areas, including Liverpool, that inner-city policy was given a whole new impetus and things got moving. The right hon. Gentleman merely took the credit for the foundations that we had built, and imposed on the area an alien and unwanted London Docklands Development Corporation.

Mr. Heseltine: I do not dispute the right hon. Gentleman's claim that it was a partnership area. It was a partnership of the various Labour-controlled east-end London boroughs, which suffocated the area and denied access to the private sector for more than a decade. The Government brought about a partnership—not a wholly private sector-inspired operation—between the east-end boroughs and the private sector. The consequences of that can be seen today from one end of the east end of London to the other, not just within the urban development corporation area, but in the peripheral areas that surround it. It is alive with building activity.

We started with homes. At that time Opposition Members said that people in the east end could not afford and did not want homes in that area. They were content to see those people go to the new towns in order to buy their homes, leaving behind increasingly under-provided areas of housing and inadequate public-sector housing. Today, in the east end of London, the private sector is leading the most exciting new home explosion in any inner city.

Mr. Mikardo: Homes that cost all of £250,000.

Mr. Heseltine: If I remember correctly, when I went to Beckton to open some of the first houses, they were priced at less than £30,000, and they were sold principally to the council tenants whom we were told did not want to buy them. Therefore, the Government alone unleashed the aspirations of the east enders which had been denied them during the post-war period. The credit for that goes to the Government, and to no one else.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heseltine: I shall not give way. I do not wish to take up the time of the House for more than a few minutes.

The issue if simple. Having now begun this exciting reclamation in partnership with the public and private sectors, do we intend to back the commitment that we unleashed upon it, or to return to dialogue, consultation, planning, further figures and more investigations, which we had to get rid of when we took over the reponsibility? My view is 100 per cent. clear: we must make and fulfil every commitment we know how to that exciting regeneration of the east end.

If I were to make only one potentially adverse criticism of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, it would be that I do not believe that there should be any long doctrinal discussions about whether the link must be financed by the public or private sector. It is unrealistic to think that railway connections must be financed privately, and there is hardly any precedent for it. The infrastructure for regenerating inner-city areas or opening up regional areas is usually provided in the public sector. If my right hon. Friend can do a good planning deal with those who wish to develop Canary wharf, I should be the first to praise him for it. To risk losing the development would be wholly unacceptable. There is a horse trade to be done, and I have complete faith in my right hon. Friend's ability to do just that. We must not allow the deal to be prejudiced.

I support the view, which is more closely related to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment than to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, that the Canary wharf project should not be called in. One of the purposes of establishing enterprise zones was to give certainty and clarity to people who wanted to develop so that they would develop quickly within the environment of the urban development corporation, and jobs would come on stream quickly. Once again, the Labour party is returning to its original position of frustrating the dynamism that the enterprise zone has unleashed.

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): My right hon. Friend, as a former Secretary of State for the Environment, was the begetter of the special development order implementation. Will he confirm that the Secretary of State would have to be satisfied that all the real issues to which the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) referred, were solved before he issued the special development order, and that in any case the special development order would come before the House? Essentially, the only difference between that route and a public inquiry is that a public inquiry would take not six months but years, as the record and experience of major public inquiries show.

Mr. Heseltine: As my hon. Friend kindly reminds me, I have experience of the special development order. It can be a relatively speedy and thorough process, opening up wide discussion of the plans under consideration. It can be processed quickly through Parliament, if Parliament is prepared to allow that to happen. On one occasion I used that technique, and it led to a successful conclusion of the planning process, although, sadly, the building was never built. That is one of the ill fortunes of life.

What is on offer in the east end of London today may be the most exciting urban reclamation anywhere in the western world. It exists because the Government have created a partnership between the public and private sectors and funded the public sector, where necessary, and because the private sector has responded on a scale beyond the wildest dreams of those of us who believed in the project only a few years ago.

I hope that the Government will give all the support necessary to my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) and that the Bill will get a Second Reading. Any difficulties that need to be ironed out can be dealt with expeditiously in Committee, and this additional resource can be put behind the dramatic success already under way in the east end.

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Poplar): I shall not waste time or abuse the patience of the House by commenting on the distorted rewriting of history to which we have just listened, and which is highly characteristic of the one who did the rewriting.

The achievements of the London Docklands Development Corporation have been funded with money taken from local authorities. I do not know what the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) calls a partnership when, from 110 acres of housing land in Tower Hamlets, 102 acres were given to the docklands corporation, leaving the borough council with only eight acres. That is a bit of a one-sided partnership, is it not? If that money had been made available to the London Docklands Joint Committee, I am sure that all that has been done would have been done and would have been done in the greater interests of the area.

[Mr. Ian Mikardo]

One thing, however, would have been different. Any action would have been carried out in the knowledge that there are tens of thousands of people living in the area. The great trouble with the docklands corporation and the proposed Canary wharf project is that the people in charge believe that they are building on a green field site. They ignore the fact that there are 15,000 people on the Isle of Dogs. When road transport is considered, those in charge of the two bodies I have just referred to simply try to find ways of coping with the 50,000 people who come on to the island every day. They think that they can solve that problem with the Canary wharf scheme.

Nobody seems to have noticed that half the working people go off the island to work. They must use the same narrow, winding and inadequate roads. There are also many secondary schoolchildren who leave the island to attend school. There is a good secondary school on the island, but some children leave the island to attend denominational schools. Those children must use the same narrow, winding, and, in one case, highly dangerous roads. Housewives also leave the island to shop. They go to Chrisp street market, Roman road market and Stratford market. They must use the bus facilities, which will be swamped by the people using the Canary wharf.

None of those considerations has been taken into account. The right hon. Member for Henley dismisses talking to people as contemptible consultation. He considers it to be dreadful, abject and most reprehensible to take the interests of people into account. That would be a reprehensible tendency of a Labour Government to consider people's welfare. The right hon. Gentleman would obviously believe that that could not be sufficiently condemned. All that the hon. Gentleman is concerned about is property and money.

Having passed over the right hon. Member for Henley, I should like to thank the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) for the careful and patient way in which he expounded the contents of the Bill. I have great sympathy for the hon. Gentleman. The poor chap has been pitchforked into the job of moving the Second Reading of a Bill which is concerned with a part of London with which he has no constituency connection and which therefore he does not know very well. There is no earthly reason why he should know it well. He has also been pitchforked into moving the Second Reading of a Bill which he, unlike some of us with constituency interests, comes to at very short notice.

Some of us have been involved in great detail in this Canary wharf lark for many months. I think that the hon. Member for Ilford, South performed well to enter this new world which he knows nothing about, making it sound as if he was on relatively safe ground.

As the hon. Member for Ilford, South and my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) said, the Bill is not simply concerned with the railway; it is also concerned with Canary wharf. They are, as my right hon. Friend quoted the Secretary of State for Transport as saying, "inseparably linked." I repeat what my right hon. Friend said: if there was no Canary wharf, there would be no City extension and we would not be having this debate about the Bill.

The House has a responsibility in this debate to consider the wider effects of the Bill and to take them into account. The House must consider the effects that the Bill will have on the lives of the people who live on the Isle of Dogs —if the right hon. Member for Henley will forgive me for that impertinence—and of the people who do not live there. Many people already come from other parts of London to work on the Isle of Dogs.

The House must also consider the effects that the Bill will have on the operation of the rest of the light railway. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney made that point. The affected parts of the light railway will be the section running from the eastward end of the City extension through the borough of Tower Hamlets and the northern part of the borough of Newham through to Stratford East station.

Like my right hon. Friend, I must make it clear that I am not, in principle, opposed to the railway, to the City extension or to the Canary wharf project. The railway and the City extension, as my right hon. Friend said, will provide a valuable transport facility. Of course, anything, absolutely anything within reason, that will create employment is warmly welcomed. The Opposition do not oppose these matters in principle.

Why, then, did we table a blocking motion to the Bill? My right hon. and hon. Friends and I did so for several reasons. The first was to precipitate the debate and to get, as my right hon. Friend has said, more information from the Government and the sponsors about what is to happen. We have not been given much information so far. The explanatory statement from the sponsors, part of which the hon. Member for Ilford, South read out this evening, is rather arid, thin, contentless and colourless. Our first object in precipitating the debate therefore, was, to learn more.

Our second purpose was to create time to consider all of the effects and implications of the project. A lot of thinking remains to be done. Many of the problems that arise from these developments have not yet been thought through.

Another purpose was to enable us to use the time made available to enable our constituents whose lives will be changed by the projects to have a say about the proposals and how they want to see the projects develop. I am sure that the right hon. Member for Henley will dismiss that with contempt, as he does not care about people.

It is important that we should provide time to allow the people whose daily lives will be changed to have a say. None of our lives will be affected, but some tens of thousands of people will be affected and it is important and an essential part of our democracy that they should have an opportunity to express their views.

The Bill, even in its narrowest interpretation, has aroused opposition from many people and organisations who believe that their interests may be prejudiced by it. That is why no fewer than 20 petitions against the legislation have been presented. They are a pretty formidable and rather interesting lot. They include Barclays bank, the Midland bank, the National Westminster bank and the Bankers Clearing House Ltd. In addition, there are 10 other companies, mostly either finance companies or property companies.

There are also some rather different petitioners, such as the corporation of the City of London, the Wardens and Commonality of the Mistery of Fishmongers of the City of London, the Commonwealth War Graves Commission, the trustees of the London Parochial Charities for the City Parochial Foundation, the right rev. and right hon. the Lord Bishop of London, the London Diocesan Fund, the Rev. Prebendary Dr. Hugh Fearn, the Rev. E. Chad Varah, the Rev. Peter A. Delaney and, last but by no means least, the Master, Wardens and Assistants of the Guild, Fraternity or Brotherhood of the Most Glorious and Undivided Trinity. If I had that lot up against me, I would give in gracefully for fear of what might happen to me in the afterlife! The House will readily see from that list that the Bill's sponsors have brilliantly succeeded in doing what few people can do—uniting in opposition to them both God and Mammon.

One petitioner in particular, MEPC plc, a property company, is curious and intriguing. Its vice-chairman and managing director is Mr. Christopher Benson, who is also the chairman of the London Docklands Development Corporation. His position with MEPC plc is one of his 18 company directorships, which, I suppose, might be why we do not see so much of him these days around the docklands.

It is curious that the LDDC is one of the three progenitors of the Bill, yet its chairman is petitioning against the Bill. I understand that that anomaly may soon be resolved. Mr. Benson may not be in charge of MEPC plc for much longer because, according to a report in one of the Sunday newspapers, the company will be taken over by Trafalgar House. Trafalgar House is run by Sir Nigel Broackes, who preceded Mr. Benson as chairman of the LDDC. Truly, the world of the big property tycoons is very small. The appointment of two chairmen of the corporation from that small world is one reason why, in all its operations, the corporation cares a great deal about property and money and does not care very much about people.

As the hon. Member for Ilford, South pointed out, in addition to that formidable list of petitioners, there may be some more objectors. As the hon. Gentleman explained, an amendment to the Bill is proposed. This has been made necessary by the revised plans for the Bank station. The Bill's sponsors need the consent of the House for an additional provision. To allow for the further objections to that additional provision, the sponsors will have to allow for more time. This will provide some breathing space to enable some sort of inquiry to be conducted. I do not necessarily think that it should be a statutory planning inquiry. I agree with the right hon. Member for Henley that that would take so long that it would be inappropriate.

I should like to give the House and, at the same time, the Bill's sponsors, the LDDC and the Canary wharf consortium a list of the matters which they will have to consider in detail before the Bill can complete its passage through the House and the other place. Those matters fall into two groups. The first concerns the light railway and the other concerns the Canary wharf scheme which the railway and the City extension are built to serve.

The first group presents some difficulties, for the reason that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney expounded with such exhaustive clarity. The problem is that we do not know for sure who will operate the railway. As I understood it, the Secretary of State intended first — my right hon. Friend quoted the references — to privatise the railway. He proposed to give away, for nothing, a railway worth £77 million of public money. That would have been a greater rip-off of the nation than selling British Telecom for half its true value.

The Secretary of State discovered, to his horror, that he could not privatise the railway because no one was willing to take it off his hands within the straitjacket of the rigid limits he had imposed on its capital expenditure. He therefore passed it back to London Regional Transport, where, as I understand it, it is for the moment and where some people — including, I was glad to hear, the right hon. Member for Henley — want it left. There are persistent rumours and reports that the Secretary of State intends some sort of privatisation, if he can manage it, and that he is even prepared to put in a lot more taxpayers' money to enable him to give away this public asset.

That leaves us not knowing where we are. The sponsors of the Canary wharf project — the consortium and the LDDC — also do not know where they are. They are very unhappy about this indecisive waffling by the Secretary of State from one policy to another. I have a copy of a report presented by the chief executive of the LDDC to the meeting of his board on 21 February. I obtained it through a leak—it is not just the Ministry of Defence and the Department of Trade and Industry that have become leaking vessels. The chief executive told the board that the indecisiveness of the Department of Transport about the ownership and, consequently, the financing of the railway, including the City extension—that waffle by the Secretary of State—had been "exasperating for the Consortium and indeed for us"—for the LDDC.

I look forward to the Minister's reply. Perhaps he will throw some light into this murkiness. If he can, all concerned — not only I but the docklands consortium, the London Docklands Development Corporation and all those who live in the area—will be grateful to him. He should do his best to put at rest all the doubts and worries that have been created by the Secretary of State.

As I said, the problems fall into two groups, of which the first group concerns the railway, and there are five difficulties concerning that aspect. One is the cost of the first stage railway—or, as the sponsors call it, the first and second stages; there were two Bills, Nos. 1 and 2. As we have heard, the cost of that has been limited—come what may, said the Secretary of State—to £77 million and not a penny more.

That sum was originally for one two-coach train running every seven and half minutes. Under this measure, with a City extension, we shall have a much higher frequency — one every one and a half minutes or thereabouts—and the trains will be 50 per cent. longer. That will mean more rolling stock, but it must all come out of the £77 million. That additional rolling stock will mean a larger maintenance organisation, necessitating more maintenance equipment, and that will cost money. We shall also need bigger stations, and that will mean some of the existing stations being structurally altered.

Although I am not an expert, I understand that the main change as a result of the greatly increased frequency will be in the signalling and control system. The trains will be automatic; a member of staff will be on board, but they will not be driven by a driver. They will be controlled from a central point. That is why the signalling system is the key to the whole business.

A signalling system that will do for one train every seven and a half minutes—because, in layman's terms, it has a time gap in which to unwind and reclock on—will not do for a frequency six or more times greater. All that will involve a lot of money, and nobody has said where it will come from. Theoretically, it must still all come out of the £77 million.

[Mr. Ian Mikardo]

I suspect that the Canary wharf consortium turned its nose up at the idea of taking it over, because it was being asked to buy a pig in a poke. The consortium knew all about the piglet, but it was suddenly told that it was no longer a piglet but a whacking great pig, and nobody would say how big it was. The poke was not to be any bigger, anyway, so that the consortium did not know whether it could get the pig into the poke. I suspect that that is why it gave the thumbs down to the Secretary of State when he tried to offload the railway on to it.

I come to the noise factor. It is true, as others have said, that the noise of automatic light railways — in some respects they are not much more than tramways — is much less than the noise of conventional trains. But three coaches going by every minute and a half, in many cases at the level of bedroom windows, is still a noise nuisance. There is a great difference in the noise level between a three-coach train every one and a half minutes and a two-coach train every seven and a half minutes.

I regret to say that people who have been dealing with the noise problem of the eastern part of the docklands light railway do not have much confidence in the willingness of the DLR to meet their valid objections about noise.

In the northern area, at the point where the railway, having gone northwards from the Isle of Dogs, turns east towards Stratford, there is a change of level and the railway moves up what is called the Bow incline. At that point there is a row of nice houses belonging to the Victoria Park housing association. The plans cut a little off the gardens of some of the houses there and place the railway virtually along the back walls of all of them.

I tried to help the people living in those houses, and the Victoria Park housing association, by convening meetings at the time of the No. 2 Bill, and we thought all was well. When the new Bill was presented I received a letter from the director of that association. In it he recalled how we met in July 1984 — when the No. 2 Bill was in Committee—and went on:

"I have been pressing DLR for further information about the likely noise levels and for improvements in noise reductions, so far without any success whatever. In particular, I have been asking for the following:

(1) Assurances that the noise specification will be achieved and enforced;

(2) Revised noise prediction calculations now that the details of the design have been finalised. It would be reassuring to know if the predictions were better than those presented at the hearing. Equally, if the predictions are worse, we are entitled to know;

(3) Assurances that maintenance standards will be adequate."

One would have thought that they would not be difficult assurances to give.

"(4) The noise barrier to be raised, preferably to two metres. It is quite clear that this would have significant benefits, but no reason has been given for not including it;

(5) A copy of the simulation tape that has been prepared; and

(6) Details of the noise reduction measures included in the final design."

He cannot get that information. It does not augur well judging how tender the light railway authorities will be with the huge volume that will be involved.

Some of the requests made by the Victoria Park housing association and the owners of the houses have the full support of the surveying team of the London borough of Tower Hamlets. That does not make a ha'penn'orth of difference. The docklands railway board, if it does not want to tell, does not. It is not right that residents should not be able to get the information. Even worse, it means that there will be a great deal of scepticism about how far the railway will have managed to cope sensibly with the increased noise problems arising from longer trains and higher frequency.

My third point of concern is whether there will be, between the light railway, the rest of LRT and the London area of British Rail, harmonisation of the ticketing system, fares, travel cards and concessionary fares. If the railway is to remain with LRT, that will be relatively easy, although we would still want an assurance that it will be done. If it is to be privatised, then, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney pointed out, the harmonisation will be difficult.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): This is an important point on which I back the hon. Member to the hilt. He must, make sure that this is written into the contract. Such a provision was not written into the contract when Sealink was privatised and now there is considerable trouble with concessionary fares, through booking and the rest.

Mr. Mikardo: I am grateful to the hon. Member for his support. It is a pretty obvious point. There is nothing very clever or difficult about it and it should be attended to.

The fourth of my five points is that the people of the area should be provided with a proper system to handle passenger complaints. LRT has its arrangements, so if the railway stays with that body, there will be no difficulty, but if it is privatised, the people of the area will have no recourse, except through the expensive mechanism of the courts, against being badly treated, low safety standards or a failure to honour any undertakings. I should like to hear from the Minister about that as well.

The fifth and last point is about the extension of the railway into the southern part of Newham. If, as I hope, my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am sure he will have a great deal to tell us about that. I apologise for having gone on for so long, but 20,000 of my constituents are affected by this proposal. I have been living with it since the beginning of last year, and I have been trying to learn something about it.

The second group of matters that concern my constituents derive from the Canary wharf scheme, where the rail extension is to be built. Everybody in the area —I not the least—warmly welcomes any possibility of creating jobs in an area of low employment. There have been a number of wide-ranging estimates on how many jobs will be created. I strongly suspect that all of them are exaggerated. The highest estimate is shown by the report produced and widely advertised, including in The House Magazine, by a consultancy firm called Henley. I do not know who is responsible for commissioning the report. The company kindly sent me a copy, but I received it only yesterday evening, perhaps because it did not want me to have the time to read it too carefully. Now that I have read it, I am discovering that the methodology behind its conclusions on job creation is not merely flawed and naive, but laughable.

If any of us were setting out to estimate the number of jobs that would be created in Canary wharf, we would do it by first discovering what firms were to be located there, secondly, what they would be doing there, thirdly the work load that would be generated when firms are there, and fourthly, how many workers would be required to carry that work load. There is nothing clever about that—it is the way to go about estimating how many jobs are required.

However, this was not what Messrs. Henley did. Almost incredibly, in its lovely glossy booklet—I bet the cover is worth more than the content—the firm said that there will be so many million square feet of office space, and that each worker requires so many feet of working space. The company then divided the one into the other and, hey presto, calculated the number of workers who will be given jobs. QED. Can anyone conceive of anything more rubbishy than that as a methodology for a serious piece of economic analysis? Whoever paid for that report should be trying to get his money back, because he has been conned.

If anybody should think that all that I have said is just my personal view, I point out that the LDDC attaches no more credence to the report and its estimate than I do, because it has just commissioned another report from a major firm of accountants, on exactly the same terms of reference, so obviously it does not believe a word of what the Henley report says. It is a fairy tale, and it would be wrong to make any plans based on that so-called analysis.

None the less, however unsoundly based the estimates of new jobs are, however exaggerated they may be, if we can get only a quarter as many of the jobs that it suggests will be created, and if only a quarter of that quarter will be jobs for local people, that will be a godsend in an area in which unemployment is double the national avearage.

However, there still remain four causes for concern about the effects of those developments on the quality of life of the people who live on the island,. The first is the environmental blight of those three phallic symbols stuck up in the middle of the island, which will be pretty ugly. They will destroy the best view in London—the view across the river to those lovely buildings at Greenwich. I am not speaking of my say-so when I say this. It is noteworthy that the Royal Fine Art Commission, which gave a modified welcome to the Canary wharf design, is rapidly retreating from its position and beginning to question the design.

Secondly, there is the road congestion to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney referred. As hon. Members will know, the Isle of Dogs is shaped from north to south like a pear, with the stem at the top end and the bulbous bit at the bottom. A single road goes round the outside like a great "u". It is wider at the bottom than it is at the two prongs at the top. The western side enters from the roundabout in West India Dock road. The eastern side enters from Preston's road. The whole of the road is narrow. The western entrance to the island is narrow and winding and there is a swing bridge. It will be great, will it not, if the swing bridge is opened when 30,000 people are coming on to the island. There are already tailbacks from there to the mainland. There are considerable tailbacks at both entrances. One may imagine what it will be like with all this lot coming through.

The western side is even worse. The road is narrow, winding and dangerous, and it curves. There is a very high wall along one side of the road, which creates blind bends. They are terribly dangerous. Huge numbers of people—30,000 a day—will be coming to the island on that road, in addition to the people who already come to the island. Some of them already have to wait quite a long time on public transport before they can get there. With a contraflow of islanders going off to the mainland to work, housewives going off to the mainland to shop and children going off to the mainland to school, there will be absolute chaos.

Improvements can be made, but what is the time scale? No borough programme has been approved for road improvements. No projects have been approved which could be implemented in the near future. There is much talk of a new link with the island from the east of the A13. However, there will be great problems to overcome. It will not be possible to get away from a planning inquiry there because it is not in the enterprise zone—or a large part of it is not in the enterprise zone. That is years and years away.

The third of the four matters that cause concern is the displacement of existing business. I shall trouble the House with one more letter from a constituent. I should not do so if it were not germane to the matter under discussion. It is the most pungently practical letter that I have received from a constituent in all my years as a Member of Parliament. It comes from the managing director of a small company that is located in the London docklands development zone on the Isle of Dogs. I ask the House to listen to what this chap says. He writes:

"A little over five years ago we moved into a primitive disused PLA warehouse, part of what had been grandly re-christened 'Quayside Industrial Estate'. The dilapidated state of the area was reflected in the low rents but we were promised future landscaping, car parks and all amenities. Regardless of subsequent increases in rent and rates, none of these things materialised."

This is the great London Docklands Development Corporation that the right hon. Member for Henley was lauding to the skies.

My constituent went on to say:

"none of these things materialised and the environment has continued to decline rapidly. However, in spite of all the difficulties we have prospered and now give work to some 24 full and part time employees. On Wednesday 20 November 1985, the right hon. Nigel Lawson MP presented us with an award 'for contribution to the regeneration of Docklands.' Only a few days earlier we had received notice to quit from the London Dockland Development Corporation who wished to re-develop our site. They say they are prepared to compensate us to some degree for loss or expenditure incurred in the enforced move, but they are not prepared in any way to assist in our relocation. Unfortunately, now that the developers can see rich pickings on the horizon the prices and rents being asked for the new units are completely beyond the likes of our modest enterprise and we are effectively being booted out of the very area that we helped to resuscitate. We feel"— this is a real cri de coeur—

"that we were pioneers, we belong here and have every right to remain part of Docklands future. The 20 or so people we employ are the real east enders, not middle class software analysts and finance brokers moving 'out east' from Weybridge and Gerrards Cross. We are in the last throes of our battle to remain in Docklands. Unless we find some help within the next few weeks, the LDDC will have won and the people of the Isle of Dogs will have sadly lost another 2,000 jobs."

That is the great London Docklands Development Corporation which the right hon. Member for Henley lauds.

Mr. Spearing: Will my hon. Friend note that the great LDDC has put compulsory purchase orders, in very similar circumstances, on a dozen or more units in my constituency, including land owned by the London borough of Newham? It is not just happening in Tower Hamlets and on the Isle of Dogs.

Mr. Mikardo: That is absolutely right. I should not be surprised if it were happening on the south side of the river as well. We shall possibly hear about that if the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) speaks this evening. Certainly it is happening all over this area. But what worries me is that what has happened up to now is only a tiny fraction of the amount of disclocation and removal of existing businesses that will take place as a result of the Canary wharf scheme. It will be 10, 20 or 30 times as great as it is now.

The strangest part of the story that I have just read out from this letter is that some time ago the London Docklands Development Corporation gave an undertaking that all businesses being thrown out of their premises would be not only compensated but resited. That undertaking was given to this chap who wrote to me and to everybody else, including the companies that have just been mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South.

A local newspaper reported an undertaking that had been given by a spokesman for the corporation. According to the newspaper report, he said:

"The businesses have our assurance that they will not be financially disadvantaged. They will receive full disturbance compensation."

He added:

"All tenants are to be offered alternative accommodation in the docklands area and possibly within the Enterprise Zone."

That clear and unequivocal undertaking has been flagrantly and, I am sorry to say, characteristically dishonoured by the corporation.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The problem is even worse for those of us who are in those parts of the docklands area that are not in an enterprise zone. We suffer not only from the relocation, for which we are also seeking undertakings if we are to support other schemes, but from the natural sucking of jobs into areas which are included in an enterprise zone. That is a double pressure which militates against those of us who represent constituencies to the south of the river. They have identical problems, identical high levels of unemployment and identical employment needs. We are willing to get on with dealing with those problems if we are given the chance and also the guarantees that I hope that the Minister can start to give us tonight.

Mr. Mikardo: I am absolutely sure that the hon. Gentleman is completely correct. The enterprise zone creates problems at its edges and by the drawing of its boundaries. The only people who are benefiting from the enterprise zone are the landlords, not the entrepreneurs. The concessions that are given to those who rent industrial premises on land within the enterprise zone make the land more valuable. There are large capital profits being made not by manufacturing companies, but only by property companies.

Finally I turn to the question of an inquiry. As I have said, one could understand genuine resistance to a formal planning inquiry. If my right hon. Friend is right in saying that it could be done in six months, we could do it even starting now because it will be all of six months before all the petitioners are dealt with, it will be all of six months before all the questions are answered and it will be all of six months before Credit Suisse First Boston will be able to raise the huge amount of money which is involved. As I understand it, that money is not turning up as quickly and as easily as it had expected. I think that there would be time even for a statutory inquiry if we could be sure that it would take six months. I am bound to say, although I differ from him on other matters, that I think that the right hon. Member for Henley was right in casting doubt on whether a statutory inquiry could be that quick.

I cannot for the life of me see why the consortium, in co-operation with the development corporation, should not hire a hall on the Isle of Dogs for a week and appoint one person of a type who would carry public recognition—an authoritative person, a person who would be recognised as being impartial and fair—or perhaps a bench of three. They could sit there for a week and all those who have anything to say about how their lives will be affected or how their businesses will be affected or what their worries are about the Canary wharf scheme could come along and say it. Then, when those on the bench had listened for a week, they would write a report, and they could do it in two or three weeks, I am sure, and publish their findings—not statutory, not binding on anyone, not involving the Secretary of State, but it would be a big step forward. I think that it would do a great deal to get over some of the difficulties and frictions which exist and which I fear will intensify in the next few months.

The right hon. Gentleman said that the whole purpose of an enterprise zone was to avoid the delay of inquiries. One understands that. However, the Canary wharf scheme is quite different from anything that was envisaged as escaping public inquiry. This is sui generis: it is a one-off; there has never been anything like it. It will have effects on a large community. It will have effects not merely in the borough, but all the way from the City to the constituency of the hon. Member for Ilford, South and equally on the south side of the river. Many people are potentially disadvantaged.

Consultation by the development corporation up to now has been a sham. It consists of its making up its mind what it is going to do and sometimes telling people what it has made up its mind to do. That is not consultation. There was set up—I was very pleased about it, I wanted it, and I was delighted when it happened—a joint Canary wharf working party between the development corporation and the docklands forum, which is the umbrella organisation of all the community groups in the area, and what happened? The critical meeting of that joint working party had to be cancelled because the corporation did not produce the documents which it had firmly promised for that meeting as a basis for discussion at the meeting. It just treats everybody with absolute contempt in that way.

I end as I began, by thanking the hon. Member for Ilford, South for his introduction to the debate, but I must tell him and the sponsors of the Bill that between now and Report we shall monitor carefully how far the sponsors have gone towards meeting our constituents' reasonable requests before we decide what should be our final attitude to the further progress of the Bill.

8.55 pm

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): As there are still several hon. Members who wish to speak in the debate, I should start by assuring them that it is not my intention to speak for quite as long as the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) spoke.

I should like to declare an interest as warden of the Ancient Mistery of Fishmongers, but neither that petitioner nor any of the other petitioners, so far as I know, is petitioning against the Canary wharf development. All they are doing is petitioning against some aspect or consequence of the London Docklands Railway City extension.

The hon. Member for Bow and Poplar spoke with his usual charm and humour. Justifiably, he has expressed concern, explicitly and implicitly, about the welfare of people, but surely people will be best served by the new jobs, the new opportunities and the new facilities which will come with such an exciting development as Canary wharf. Even if the Henley Centre is a little wrong, I suspect that the benefit that the development will produce in jobs will be considerable. I have no doubt that many hon. Members would be thrilled to bits if they had this kind of development in their constituencies. I can tell the House that my hon. Friend the Member for Calder Valley (Mr. Thompson) has been getting steadily greener in the course of the debate, as it has become clearer how many jobs are going to result from the development.

Hon. Members may with some justification wonder why the Member for Devizes is speaking in the debate. In truth, I am speaking in place of my Friend the Member for the City of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke). I should emphasise that I am not delegated by him to say anything that I shall say but, as his representative in the sense that at weekends he is my constituent and as therefore I am the person to exercise judgment as to what is in his best interests, and since, as a Minister, he is debarred from taking part in the debate, my objective to try to speak to some of the interests of many of those people and institutions which he represents. My hon. Friend attended the beginning of the debate, but he had to depart, to his regret and chagrin, on ministerial business.

In particular, I speak for the corporation of the City of London and some others of those who have petitioned against the Bill. That stated, I want at the outset to emphasise again, and to make it abundantly clear, that I am strongly in favour of the Canary wharf development. I am fully aware that in order to achieve the success that that development deserves, it is essential that it should have good connecting transport and railway connections. However, those railway connections cannot be constructed without full account being taken of the interests of others. Thus, it is not my intention—far from it—to oppose the Bill in principle.

Furthermore, I am fully aware that negotiations between the sponsors of the Bill and those concerned about certain aspects of it are continuing. Indeed, I had hoped that the negotiations would have been brought to a successful conclusion before the Bill came before the House. If that had happened, I would have withdrawn my name from the motion in the names of the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar and others. But the Bill has come forward rather more quickly than I expected and the negotiations are not concluded.

My aim tonight is to ensure that doubts which have been expressed to me by the City corporation and others are given consideration. The revised terminus scheme at the Bank, first canvassed by London Regional Transport on 20 February, leaves unanswered a fundamental, if implicit, objection voiced in the City's petition against the original scheme that a Bank terminus approach of any kind would not serve the long-term interests of those using the City as their place of employment or those envisaged to be using the railway from the docklands area.

The City corporation's preference for a Cannon street/Monument new station is directed to ensuring that those whose destinations lie west beyond the City do not further exacerbate the critical congestion above and below ground in the Bank area. Even though I am not a regular visitor to the City, I am well aware of that congestion.

If a future Blackfriars extension were allowed for, some of the through passenger traffic would not interchange in the City at all. Moreover, the unrealised part of the east-west vision of the 1970s Jubilee line would be preserved for the benefit of Londoners generally. Particularly preserved would be the future extension from Blackfriars to Charing Cross to meet the existing terminus of the Charing Cross/Stanmore/Jubilee line, being the section already constructed. However good the interchange arrangements claimed for the revised Bank terminus proposal, it is at an unacceptable penalty to those working in the City and to the proper east-west strategy of London Regional Transport for the future.

The danger is that the promoters are so absorbed — perhaps understandably — in achieving a business and commercial link between the Bank and the new financial centre at Canary wharf that they totally ignore the wider community interests of those who will live and work in docklands in travelling any further westwards than the City.

In addition to that major strategic criticism, I want to bring to the attention of the House the City's concern about the following main detailed considerations. There is a severe reservation about the closeness of the new tunnels at one metre underneath the existing Northern line tunnels and stations. The proposed pedestrian link from the Waterloo and City line to the Central line is too close to the foundations of the Mansion House. I am sure that the Canary wharf developers would be horrified if anything ever happened to the Mansion House. The new option at King William street proposes the complete stopping up of Lombard street and Bucklersbury, and that, not surprisingly, is completely unacceptable. That option would lead to increased congestion at Monument and along the south side of Cannon street. It does not tackle the problem of passenger flows from Cannon street to the Bank.

The corporation of the City of London's preferred option remains the one identified by its engineers at Cannon street. That would allow the traveller on the Docklands Light Railway to continue westward to interchange with the District and Circle lines and to join the southern region of British Rail at Cannon street or to take a travolator link to Bank station. It should be emphasised that from Cannon street to Bank would take no more than five minutes by travolator.

Comparing the latest London Regional Transport scheme with the City's option, the last report of the corporation engineers says:

"Firstly, although both schemes are quite complex in engineering terms, there are far greater risks associated with the construction of the LRT scheme. The proximity of the proposed DLR step plate junction and the new southern escalator tunnels to the existing Northern Line running tunnelsa gives rise to serious concern about the continuous operation of services along the Northern Line during the construction of the DLR.

Secondly, the LRT scheme pre-empts any possibility of a further westward extension, whereas the Cannon Street Option is capable of extension. It is based on the design for a Jubilee Line station at Cannon street, and so the DLR could be extended along the route of the Jubilee Line if it has been preserved. This is of particular importance at a time when extensions to London's overcrowded underground system are being sought. Following the introduction of travel cards and the simplified fare structure, there has been a considerable increase in public transport demand. Furthermore, should predictions for rapid increases in the City's employment transpire . . . a system that is capable of extension would be of great merit."

Mr. Mikardo: I am most grateful, as I am sure the whole House is, to the hon. Gentleman for giving us the up-to-date view of the City Corporation, which is a very important element. May I suggest that the Cannon street solution has one additional advantage, in that a roofed-over Cannon street would make an ideal site for a heliport?

Mr. Morrison: That is a very interesting suggestion, which will no doubt be taken into account by the corporation and by the promoters of the Bill.

Although the City corporation is pleased to note the willingness of London Regional Transport to consider alternatives to the original proposals, it is not happy about the latest London Regional Transport scheme. That is why it is continuing to petition against the Bill.

I turn to the concern of those petitioners who wish to obtain a more satisfactory basis for compensation. Some of those petitioners would be partly, or perhaps wholly, relieved of that concern if the City corporation's preferred scheme was adopted. Be that as it may, I should like to remind the House that the normal basis for compensation payable by an acquiring authority — for example, in cases such as the construction of an underground railway by London Regional Transport—is the same as for other compulsory purchasers of land or interests in land.

First, there is compensation for the land actually taken. In this case the land that would be taken is merely subsoil at a depth of about 100 ft. The value of that is almost nominal; it might be a few pounds per metre run of tunnel. In addition, however, where an owner retains land contiguous to the land taken, he is entitled to claim compensation for injurious affection if the land retained is reduced in value due to the acquisition and the works.

To establish a claim for injurious affection, one has to demonstrate that the market value of the land retained is reduced. That is difficult enough when there is clearly immediate damage and it is merely a matter of deciding how much the potential sale price is reduced. It becomes much more difficult when damage may or may not be felt at some indefinite date many years hence. For example, when a perfectly sound building is leased and produces a good income for a term expiring in perhaps 25 years' time, at that date it may or may not be found expedient to arrange for a redevelopment, the cost of which may or may not be increased due to possible complications arising as a result of the presence of a tunnel a long way below the surface of the land.

By the time that one has taken into account doubts about the amount, if any, of the extra costs of development and whether the development will take place and one has deferred the estimated extra cost for 25 years, the answer is that compensation for injurious affection will be very low. Furthermore, it is extremely difficult to demonstrate by market evidence that a purchaser of the property today would pay any less for the building because of that possible future problem.

My basic point is that a developer should not be permitted to enhance his scheme by damaging other people's property without paying to the full for that damage. The fair solution might be to require the developer to provide for compensation to be paid in future when the damage occurs and can be assessed properly. I have no doubt that this matter can be thrashed out in Committee, but it is of great importance to several petitioners. I cannot believe that it is beyond the wit of the promoters to meet most of the arguments being put forward by the petitioners. I certainly hope so, as I believe that the Canary wharf development is of tremendous importance and holds out great hope for the future.

9.11 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): It might be helpful if I give the Government's view of the Bill.

When the Bill was deposited in November, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made a statement explaining the Government's views on matters as we then saw them. We had reached an understanding with the Canary wharf consortium that it would contribute £30 million to the construction of the extension and secure underwriting of an agreed privatisation scheme. The understanding was subject to final agreement between London Regional Transport and the consortium on the detailed design and costs of the City extension, and on particulars of the privatisation scheme. It was also contingent on the completion of a master building agreement on the Canary wharf development between the consortium and the London Docklands Development Corporation. The whole understanding was, of course, subject to parliamentary approval of the Bill.

In making our statement, we expected the design and costing exercises to be completed before tonight's debate. I am pleased to be able to tell the House that since then good progress has been made in refining the design, specification and estimated cost of the extension of the docklands light railway to the City. In the light of this work, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) has explained, amendments are to be sought to the Bill to improve the interchange arrangements with the existing Underground network. I am sure that this will be widely welcomed, and I hope that the amendments will be accepted. More generally, the Government are satisfied with the progress which has been made by LRT in developing a workable and soundly based design for the new extension.

In parallel with the work on the design of the railway, LRT and the Government have been discussing with the Canary wharf consortium detailed proposals for the privatisation of the whole railway, as envisaged in the November agreement. The consortium has recently told us that it no longer feels able to secure the underwriting of a privatisation of the railway. Instead, it has suggested going forward on the basis that the railway will be built and subsequently operated within the public sector, but with finance being provided by the consortium for its construction.

My right hon. Friend has told the consortium that, subject to acceptable terms being agreed, he is prepared to see the extension built and operated in the public sector. We have not ruled out the prospects of privatisation for all time, but the thorough consideration that this has been given in our detailed discussions with the consortium suggests that it is not a practical option at the present time.

Negotiations are in hand with the consortium to explore the mechanisms for financing the construction of the railway extension, taking into account projections of profit and loss on the combined railway. The LDDC is also engaged in negotiations with the consortium on the wider aspects of the Canary wharf proposals. The Government will wish to take an overall view of progress on all fronts before agreements are finalised by LRT and the LDDC. Needless to say, the project will not go ahead unless the Government are wholly satisfied with the deal.

The proposed City extension to the docklands light railway would provide an additional impetus to development, not only at Canary wharf, but elsewhere in the docklands. It should also benefit local people by giving them improved connections to the Underground network.

Mr. Spearing: The Minister has just said that the Government will not go ahead until there is a successful conclusion to the deal. Therefore, will he confirm that further discussions need to take place between himself, the promoters and the Canary wharf consortium, and also, possibly, in respect of the master building agreement? Is the hon. Gentleman saying that the principle of going back to the public sector has been agreed, but the financial details have yet to be agreed?

Mr. Mitchell: Broadly speaking, what the hon. Gentleman has said is correct. I shall spell it out a little more in a moment.

The Government have considered the content of the Bill and have no objection, in principle, to the powers sought by LRT. A number of matters have been raised in correspondence with the promoters by the Department, and I would expect these to be cleared up satisfactorily. In particular, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is somewhat concerned about the impact of the proposed redevelopment of Tower Hill station and the effect of tunnelling and other works on the historically and archaeologically important areas immediately surrounding the Tower of London. Also, for a temporary period during construction, the movement and management of the many tourists in the area will be seriously disrupted. Therefore, although my right hon. Friend is not against the scheme in principle, he wishes to reserve his position on that aspect for the time being.

During our earlier discussions, the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) sought clarification of the current state of play and was worried about what he called "indecisiveness". That matter was also raised by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore). He drew attention to parliamentary questions which were answered last November and contrasted them with the current position. The fact is that, as negotiations proceed, the situation is one of constant change. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has been very forthcoming. Perhaps in retrospect, if he had waited he might not have been faced with this particular charge today.

I am sure that no hon. Member would expect me or any other Minister to conduct any part of these negotiations on the Floor of the House. I can say that there has been no indecision. We are still in the process of negotiating the best deal for the Government and the public. That does not mean giving the consortium just what it wants. I have explained that the consortium felt unable to underwrite the privatisation of the whole railway. It is the consortium which has changed its mind. We have responded positively to the new situation.

The hon. Member for Bow and Poplar also mentioned noise. That is a matter for LRT, and no doubt it will explain it to the Committee. The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the harmonisation of the light railway's and LRT's concessionary fares and pensioners' passes. I can give him the assurance that he sought. It will be fully covered by LRT.

The hon. Gentleman asked also about a public complaints system. I can confirm that the LRPC will apply, as to other parts of the public network. I believe that Dr. Eric Midwinter and his colleagues on the LRPC will be happy with that.

Mr. Mikardo: I am grateful to the Minister for the precise answers that he has given to some of my questions. However, I am a little worried about the parts that he has not answered. I hope that I am not attaching undue significance to the omissions. I asked about fares and fare structures being harmonised with LRT.

Mr. Mitchell: Those are matters for LRT. I hope that I shall be able to conclude by leaving sufficient time for my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South to respond to issues which have been raised concerning LRT.

The hon. Member for Bow and Poplar asked about safety standards, which is really a matter for LRT. However, I can tell him that rail safety legislation will apply. He asked a number of questions about jobs, but this issue is somewhat outside the scope of the Bill.

Both the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney addressed themselves to traffic and environmental effects on the road system. The LDDC undertakes transport planning in its area in conjunction with the Department of Transport and the boroughs, and it is currently examining the highways implications of the Canary wharf proposals. This work will reveal whether it will be necessary to extend and rephase existing plans for road connections to Canary wharf, and whether substantial on-site parking provision, as planned by the developer, will be sufficient.

The hon. Member for Bow and Poplar warmly welcomed the prospects of job creation, but drew attention to many petitions, including a number from City institutions, both spiritual and temporal, and expressed anxiety about the effect on his own life in the hereafter. I am sure we all hope that he will remain here long enough to see many jobs created as a result of the initiatives that flow from the introduction of the enterprise zone by this Government.

The hon. Gentleman drew attention to the interlinking between the Canary wharf development and the western extension. As he rightly said: no development, no DLR extension. It is only the request from the consortium for the rail link that has caused the expenditure to arise in the first place. The hon. Gentleman complained that there was no planning inquiry. I cannot speak for Mr. Travelstead, but I feel that if there were not an enterprise zone and the projects had to pass through the normal planning consent arrangements, it is highly likely that Mr. Travelstead and any other substantial developers would run to the other side of the world before even considering undertaking the development.

The hon. Gentleman will know that the consortium has made a series of presentations of the scheme to the docklands boroughs, local Members and community and environmental groups. In response to the views expressed at these meetings it has modified the scheme to move one of the towers further east to take it out of the line of Wren's Greenwich axis.

[Mr. Mitchell]

The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney talked about the cost of modifications to the existing DLR arrangement. It will be between £7 million and £10 million. The right hon. Gentleman asked who would pay. The answer is that that issue is part of the negotiations with the consortium. It is included in the estimated cost of £92 million. The right hon. Gentleman talked about the effect on the environment. That is a matter for LRT. He asked whether modifications could be carried out to the existing railway without delay to its opening, and I assure him that they could be. We still expect the opening to take place in July 1987.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) demonstrated the arid failure of the old methods of planning blueprints, Socialism and bureaucracy to create the jobs and the rebirths that are so necessary. In contrast to that is the bustling activity that has been brought about by the lifting of planning and other restraints in the enterprise zone. I am sorry that Opposition Members have learnt nothing and still hanker for the old methods which failed so miserably in the past. My right hon. Friend the Member for Henley was right—the enterprise zone and the LDDC have unlocked the opportunity which Mr. Travelstead and his colleagues are now seizing. I am glad my right hon. Friend supports this significant United States investment in the docklands area.

My hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) recognised the difficulties of my hon. Friend the Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke), who, as a Minister, is unable to participate in this debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Devizes raised a series of questions on behalf of the City, including the linkage into the LRT and BR network, structural matters between the docklands light railway and some of the existing tubes, the closeness to Mansion House foundations, the effect on Bucklersbury, and compensation matters. These are matters for consideration not by me but by LRT and the promoters of the Bill, but I have no doubt that they will be dealt with when the Bill proceeds, as I hope it will, to Committee.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South demonstrated, in his introduction to the Bill, the benefits to the dockland areas and the preparedness of himself and his fellow promoters of the Bill, so far as practicable, to meet legitimate points made by petitioners.

There are 20 petitions against the Bill and they relate to property interests along the proposed route of the railway. The petitioners will have an opportunity to present their objections to the Select Committee. The Committee will be in a better position than we are tonight to examine the issues involved in detail. It will have the added advantage of hearing expert evidence. I therefore recommend to the House that the Bill be given a Second Reading and allowed to proceed in the usual way to Committee for its detailed consideration.

9.26 pm

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): The Bill before us deserves our wholehearted support. I have been guilty of repeatedly boring hon. Members over the years by my support for the railway industry and railway schemes, especially new ones.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) on the detailed manner in which he introduced the Bill. However, although his speech was detailed and outlined many of the Bill's provisions, we are bereft of some vital information. I attach no blame to him because vital financial information is lacking. To use the words of the Minister, "negotiations are still taking place" at the Department of Transport.

The problem with the Bill is not that negotiations are not being conducted "on the Floor of the House" to use the words of the Minister—none of us would expect that—but that negotiations appear to have been conducted in the habitual manner of this Secretary of State. That is by nod, wink and leaks from Marsham street. The odd off-the-record remark and semi off-the-record briefings to various journalists and others are regarded as a suitable way of charting the advance, or otherwise, of this project over the past few months.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) rightly described the Bill as scanty and contradictory. That point was emphasised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) in his drawn-out, but nevertheless extremely informative, contribution. My hon. Friend mentioned that the original estimate, approximately £77 million, was for a railway consisting of two-coach trains running every seven minutes. The more detailed project which is before the House tonight envisages a train every one and a half minutes. That, as my hon. Friend correctly pointed out, involves more rolling stock and a fairly complicated signalling and control system which would allow the trains to run automatically.

It is some years since I had anything to do with signalling control systems on British Rail mainline, but even more years have passed since the Secretary of State played trains on the nursery floor, which is presumably how he qualified for his present post. I hope that the Minister will agree that new signalling schemes are fairly expensive, and that if all the costs are to be contained within the original estimate of £77 million——

Mr. David Mitchell: No.

Mr. Snape: Perhaps the Minister will tell the House what the costs are likely to be.

Mr. Mitchell: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman was, not only in deep conversation when my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) introduced the Bill but was not listening when I replied to that precise point. I gave a figure of between £7 million and £10 million, and said that it was covered by the existing negotiations and would be in addition to the £77 million.

Mr. Snape: I apologise if I missed that part of the hon. Gentleman's speech. However, he has still not answered the central question, which is where the money is coming from and how the scheme is to be financed.

A mixture of leak and innuendo has surrounded the scheme. First newspapers reported that rich Americans were descending on our shores, anxious to caste as much largesse as possible into docklands, to build and operate a railway system. I hope that I am not sceptical by nature, but I find the scenario envisaged by some of our more sensational newspapers rather surprising. I noticed at the time that the Secretary of State looked rather pleased with himself, so I thought that he may have got it wrong again but that, on the other hand, he may have got it right, and that that would happen. Then we heard that only £30 million of private capital would go towards the overall cost of the project. Again, the Marsham street rumour machine went into action, and we heard that the Secretary of State had threatened to cancel the whole project because not a penny of public money was to be used on it. He is not overfond of railways at the best of times, and new ones in docklands are guaranteed not to appeal to him.

Then, in a Cabinet Committee—those things that do not meet because we never hear about them — the number of jobs involved was pointed out to the Secretary of State, and the ante was upped to £45 million for additional costs. I hope that I did not miss this part of the Minister's speech, but we still do not know who will own the railway, if it is ever built. There are some gaping holes in the project, as we see from the Bill. Will it be the Department of Transport, the London Docklands Development Corporation or London Regional Transport? We are entitled to know.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): My hon. Friend the Minister made that clear.

Mr. Snape: In that case, the Secretary of State can stand up and tell us. After all, this is his pet project, and none of us knows who will eventually own the project, including hon. Members with a direct constituency interest and involvement. If the information is available, we should like it now.

Mr. Mitchell: If the hon. Gentleman had listened to what I said earlier, he would have discovered that LRT would own and register the project. I made that clear in my speech, and I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman was not with us.

Mr. Snape: That was not how I interpreted the Minister's remark. I heard that part of his speech, and he made it clear that LRT was responsible for operating the system, but only because our rich Americans, unlike some of the Conservative party's less enlightened Back Benchers, know full well that dollars, pounds and profits are not normally to be made from running a railway system. The benefits of running the docklands railway are not immediately quantifiable. They are similar to those with which we justify the nation's road building programme—that is, that time is saved, life is saved because of the lack of accidents, and better communications are achieved, giving a boost to the economy. One cannot stuff such profits in one's pocket and walk away with them.

As I have said, no one particularly wants to operate the railway as a private enterprise operation. That is why the Secretary of State and his hon. Friend the Minister of State must still satisfy us as to where the cash is coming from and in whom the ownership will eventually be invested if the project goes ahead. I am only sorry that the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) was not in his place tonight, as he might have learned a salutary lesson that privatised railways do not appear in the whole of capitalist United States of America. Even there, they believe that the running and operation of the railway system is best left to professional railwaymen.

Mr. Shore: My hon. Friend has brought from the Minister of State an astonishing set of facts. In his statement the Minister of State confirmed that the City extension and the dockland railway is to be run by London Regional Transport. The Minister of State said that it will be a publicly owned and publicly financed part of the railway system. Throughout the whole of November 1985 and January of this year the Minister of State and the Secretary of State told the House and the people that they insisted upon a privatised railway scheme. We now want and are entitled to know whether the building of the City extension is dependent upon the consortium making a particular contribution to the total cost otherwise we are discussing a measure which may never see the light of day.

Mr. Snape: I think that my right hon. Friend has encapsulated the whole dilemma facing the Department of Transport. If the project goes ahead, a considerable amount of public money will be involved.

We all know that the Secretary of State is reluctant to use public money in such areas and the changes that we have seen over the past half an hour, since the Minister of State rose to speak, included an admission which was consistently denied throughout the later months of last year and has only just been revealed.

There is one other matter that I wish to raise.

Mr. David Mitchell: Did the hon. Gentleman also miss the point in my speech when I referred to the fact that it was the consortium that had changed its mind on how to proceed in the matter?

Mr. Snape: I am well aware that there have been some changes of mind in various areas in connection with this scheme. I will swap one change of mind by the Secretary of State for one change of mind by the consortium. We will be no more enlightened about the likelihood of the scheme if we do that, but at least some reality will have entered the corridors of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Mitchell rose——

Mr. Snape: Is the Minister of State seeking to proffer violence or does he simply want to intervene?

Mr. Mitchell: I ask the hon. Gentleman to read my speech as he did not hear me when I delivered it.

Mr. Snape: I always read the Minister of State's speeches with great interest as they are usually more factual than those of his right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State.

I would like to draw the Minister's attention to a petition from the War Graves Commission. I understand from some communications that I have received from my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), who takes a deep interest in these matters, that the War Graves Commission is petitioning against the Bill because it cannot get a satisfactory reply about the fate of Trinity Gardens where the terminus will be built. I further understand that the Tower Hill war memorial is on the site of Trinity Gardens. That is a war memorial to the 36,000 seamen who died in the two world wars.

The main point in the War Graves Commission's petition against the Bill is that it believes that it would not get satisfaction if London Regional Transport were to take over the development of the area. The House will be aware of a private Member's Bill which is going through the House and which has the support of both sides of the House. It proposes to make all military vessels war grave areas. Regrettably, it does not include the Merchant Navy. The National Union of Seamen and merchant seamen generally feel that, in the Government's eyes, merchant seamen are second-class people in death as well as in life.

Mr. David Mitchell indicated dissent

Mr. Snape: That is certainly why the War Graves Commission has petitioned against the London Docklands Railway (City Extension) Bill. The commission suffers from the same lack of information as hon. Members about the Government's intentions.

There is some justification for the Government's attitude. I understand it—once again, the Secretary of State has got it wrong. This happens frequently. Let us hope that, this time, he does not finish up in court as a result. Unless we receive proper information, I for one do not believe that the Bill will go ahead. As one who believes in railway extensions generally and in new railways in particular, I think that that would be eminently regrettable.

9.40 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I am grateful for having been given the opportunity to speak in the debate, because I have responsibility in my party for general planning matters and have a constituency interest as a docklands Member. I speak conscious of the interests of my colleagues who form the opposition on the Newham council and on the Tower Hamlets council and who are directly involved in and may, indeed, be running Tower Hamlets after May, when they will make their views more clearly known.

We welcome the announcement that the railway will operate in the public sector. The Minister of State must accept that that is a complete change of Government policy. Three options are available, none of which is ideal in its management. We welcome the fact that of the three groups—the Government, the LDDC and the LRT—the LRT will run the railway.

We still need answers to the questions that have been asked. If the debate has done one thing, it has revealed a certain amount of information. It has confirmed that what was always going to be a loss-making project, according to the Minister's analyses in the answers given in the House since November, will be financed generally, because it is a matter of general interest to London, and to east London in particular, that we should have this railway. It will not serve just the the people going to work at the Canary wharf scheme. As hon. Members representing constituencies north of the river have said, it has much wider employment implications. We welcome that. It will be helpful to know at an early stage the new arrangement between the consortium and the LRT, and the contribution that has been negotiated.

I am concerned to ensure that this scheme and others are properly integrated within London's transport systems. Various assurances are needed. We need to know whether, as the site development goes ahead, there will be substantial disruption.

Mr. Ridley: Why does the hon. Gentleman always refer to himself as "we"? Only the editor of The Times and the Queen are allowed to call themselves "we".

Mr. Hughes: I think it is safe to say that I normally manage to speak for a united group of colleagues. Indeed, our unity is manifested by the presence of my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright), whose views I think I reflect adequately.

We want an assurance that, as building takes place, there will not be massive disruption at the bridge crossings —especially Tower bridge, which is raised from time to time—as this would clearly disrupt commerce in central London. We need to know whether that aspect has been taken into account.

We will need to know——

Mr. Ridley: "We"?

Mr. Hughes: The House will need to know, and the public interest requires that we know, exactly what is likely to be the view of the Government and the promoters in response to the views expressed by the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Morris). The hon. Gentleman appeared to be saying, unless we on this side of the House misunderstood him, that the City is not happy with the revised scheme as now proposed, that it does not find it acceptable and that, therefore, it has not reached agreement with the promoters on the right way forward. This is a second go at the scheme. Clearly there is not agreement, and I hope that the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) will bear that in mind.

The matters of substantial concern are reflected in the Instructions that have been tabled. People living in my constituency and in other dockland areas north of the river appreciate that a development such as this can have massive benefits. We hope that that will be so, and that is why my hon. Friends and I will not oppose the measure on Second Reading.

At the same time as producing a properly integrated transport system in south-east London, it must be acknowledged that there are still bits of the jigsaw to be put in place—the Minister knows of my interest—and we look for links between this scheme north of the river and access to similar development sites south of the river, with proper integration between the two. I say that because at present, in the area south of the river, my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich and I have a white hole in our transport system, with no light railway, let alone extensions, proposed.

May we be reassured that land values will not escalate, pricing local firms and housing interests out of the market? We must feel certain that local firms and jobs will not continue to be relocated as part of a scheme which, though acceptable and advantageous as a development, could be a substantial threat to other interests. I hope that we shall receive those assurances, in part from the promoter tonight and, later, from interested parties. Without those assurances, my hon. Friends and I will not be satisfied.

9.47 pm

Mr. Neil Thorne: By the leave of the House, I will——

Mr. Spearing: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it possible for other hon. Members to be called prior to what will be the second speech from the promoter of the Bill?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne), speaking for the promoters of the Bill, rose. It would at this point normally be his turn to speak, and I think that the House would now wish to hear him.

Mr. Mikardo: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would think it wrong if my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), an objector to the Bill, a proposer of an instruction which was not called and an hon. Member with a great constituency interest were not allowed to speak in the debate. On those grounds I urge you——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That does not arise.

Mr. Mikardo: With respect, Mr. Speaker, it does.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Member for Ilford, South, who began by asking for the leave of the House does not have the leave of the House, he cannot speak. Does he have the leave of the House?

Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: In that case, I call Mr. Spearing.

9.48 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I assure the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) that I understand why he rose. About 10 years ago I was responsible for a private Bill on behalf of what was then London Transport. That Bill was concerned with buses. I appreciate his predicament, knowing what it is like to be the promoter of a measure of this type, and I hope that he appreciates my position.

This has been a remarkable debate. It has shown how the Standing Orders of the House in relation to private business do their work. We have had two surprises, both within the last hour. The first was in relation to the principle of public transport. My hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) is usually accurate. On this occasion he got it slightly wrong, in that I am not opposed to the principle of the Bill. It could be a valuable addition to the infrastructure of rail transport in London, something which I have for long championed, and it is refreshing, after some vacillation, to see the Government Front Bench apparently agreeing with that.

Secondly, I have discovered that I am to some extent attracted to the Bill because it promises to provide more employment, increased opportunities and a degree of regeneration in east London, perhaps affecting the London borough of Newham. We have to ask ourselves what type of employment and whether it will be an advantage, on balance, to the whole of east London.

I have some doubts about the nature of the desire for increased employment. My hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar has already explained that, surprisingly enough, the LDDC is giving notice to quit to people on the margins of the enterprise zone, people who are providing a service to the City. The firm that he mentioned is thriving because it is there, handy for the City, but the LDDC is asking it to get out, despite the fact that 25 people are working there, no doubt on relatively modest incomes. The same thing is happening in my area, in the Silvertown viaduct, where the LDDC has sent letters to my constituents telling them that it wants to acquire the area by compulsory purchase, so they will have to get out.

We hear that the railway will increase employment for east London, and the LDDC has agreed it in principle, but I then look to what is happening in Silvertown, particularly the compulsory purchase orders on small firms. These are the very enterprises that the Government, day after day, say that we should have, the firms that are very much in favour with the Prime Minister, and with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who went to give the firm in my hon. Friend's constituency a certificate. In principle — the words that encapsulate our feelings—we are in favour, but we want to know what the practice will be.

There are also problems with the line that is already being built. The London borough of Newham wants a station built at Pudding Mill lane, but the map issued by London Regional Transport says of this site:

"Future stops when funding permits."

We want the stops there, and at Carpenter's road, to serve an area of employment. If the line already being built cannot have extra stations — it is only a fast track, however useful a form of transport—what real concern has the LDDC or the LRT for employment? Perhaps the trouble is the cash limit of £77 million. Perhaps some arrangements can be made, because the stations are not particularly big.

The second surprise on the turn round of private as against public enterprise are the City objections. When I looked at the LRT plan which came to us about three or four days ago and saw the revised layout for the Bank station, I thought it ingenious. I thought, "Right, they've got it." The original plan would have made the tube subways around Bank station congested, and was not on. However, this one looked all right and I assumed that it had been cleared with the corporation of London. Now we hear from the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison), properly speaking on behalf of the hon. Member for Calder Valley (Mr. Thompson) that that is not to the liking of that body. We are surprised by that opinion, although it has come late in the day.

Several points have worried us. The first is ownership. In the last hour there has been a change. Private ownership was insisted upon by the Secretary of State for Transport, logically in a way. Now, in face of the facts of life, he has had to change his view. However, I detected that the Minister was not happy about what he had to say—he will correct me if I am wrong—because he said that he does not rule out future privatisation if that is considered desirable by the Government. The Minister is having it both ways. He says, "We will get it built by private enterprise because the consortium wants it." That is despite what the Minister wants. If it makes money—I do not suggest that it will, but it might make money—the Minister says that it can be privatised. And if it makes a loss for the Consolidated Fund, it, like British Leyland, can be sold. If it were put into private hands after a number of years—if, heaven forbid, the Government continue for that long—it might be sold not to General Motors but to a consortium. There would be no guarantee then about the level of fares. Although our gravest doubts about ownership have been set at rest to some extent, question marks still remain.

When we entered the Chamber today we thought that this enterprise was going to be funded by Mr. Travelstead and his colleagues. However, we now find, although the Minister did not make it explicit despite his careful reading of his script, that it is to be funded partly by the consortium, presumably at the level of £30 million to which it was committed in the written answer of 27 November. We must therefore assume, because I do not think that the Minister spelt it out, that the Government will provide the balance, which will be in the region of £40 million to £50 million, including perhaps £10 million for London Regional Transport to carry out the agency work.

Is the Minister able to tell us whether that money will come out of the Consolidated Fund? Presumably it will, with the balance to be made up by the Department. However, discussions may be continuing on that matter.

The House has a right to know the answer to this question. This is taxpayers' money. All Conservative Members are anxious that taxpayers' money should be spent properly or not spent at all. They do not believe in public transport. The Secretary of State for Transport has shown his lack of faith in public transport by his previous

[Mr. Nigel Spearing]

Bill, which is not an Act, that covers buses. We know where that has led him—straight to General Motors. We should like to know how much of the money for the construction of this line is to come from private sources and how much of it is to come from the Consolidated Fund. Is it to come out of the transport supplementary grant? Is it included in the public expenditure White Paper?

All of these questions have yet to be answered. It is unlikely that any Bill dealing with railways has come before the House in the past with so many unanswered questions and with so many big changes having been announced during the closing period of its Second Reading debate. It is possible that the promoters are not entirely in charge of the timetable and that events have caught up with them. For instance, what about the master building agreement? We have been told by the Secretary of State for Transport, who I am glad to see is on the Treasury Front Bench, that it depends upon the master building agreement for Canary wharf going ahead. The two go together. There is doubt now about how quickly the railways Bill will go through. If the master building agreement is not agreed by the end of March or by April, why go to all the expense of promoting a Bill which will involve a lengthy Committee hearing? The City corporation will back the petitioners to the hilt, will it not? We should be told whether or not the promoters intend to proceed to the next stage of the Bill if the master building agreement is unlikely to be dealt with.

I turn to the impact of the docklands light railway on the London Borough of Newham. We have heard that money is available for the western extension——

Local Government

10.10 pm

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): I beg to move,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Local Government Re-organisation (Compensation) Regulations 1986 (S.I., 1986, No. 151), dated 31st January 1986, a copy of which was laid before this House on 7th February, be annulled.

The regulations are concerned with compensation for the loss of employment and for diminution of emoluments for members of staff of the Greater London council and the six metropolitan counties. An early release scheme, supposedly designed to create vacancies in other authorities to make way for metropolitan county staff, completes the package of measures put forward by the Government for dealing with the staffing consequences of abolition. However, there are several problems about the package.

It is no consolation to say that it could have been worse. The initial proposals of the Government were very unsatisfactory. It was only following pressure from the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and the Trades Union Congress local government committee that improvements were made. The package of measures has done little to assist the management of change, it has produced inequity and disparity of treatment in different metropolitan county council areas, and it is too late. The early release scheme, which might have helped by reducing the number of compulsory redundancies, has only been made operative through a circular dated 26 February 1986, just five weeks before abolition.

About a week ago I talked at some length in the Chamber about the problems created by only five weeks' notice of the regulations being given. This evening I shall let Sir Philip Woodfield, chairman of the staff commission, speak on my behalf. In the Municipal Journal of 28 February 1986 he wrote:

"The uncertainty has been added to by Government delays. Only recently has it laid before Parliament the main transfer order and the compensation regulations and promulgated the early release scheme. It is not sufficient to say that the main outlines of the proposals were announced some time ago. The delay in putting out detailed arrangements for the early release scheme in particular has much reduced its value and anyway people ought not to be expected to make crucial decisions affecting the rest of their lives without seeing exactly how they would be affected."

I should like to consider the circumstances of those who leave the employment of a metropolitan county council to take a lower-paid job in another local authority. That move is itself a blow, but it could become a permanent feature for many. The Government's initial proposals were for a lump sum payment which would have led to greater unfairness for some people. The scheme in the present regulation, although better, has some drawbacks, which the Government could remedy even at this late stage.

An employee will get up to £5,000 a year. The cash for compensation is calculated according to a formula in the regulations, which is arrived at, roughly, by subtracting the contractual wages paid in the new job from the contractual wages, overtime payments and bonus payments paid in the original job.

Payments are to be made one year in arrears, so the first is not due until 1 April 1987 for many staff. However, it is possible for residuary bodies to make certain interim payments. I hope that other residuary bodies will follow the example of one in the west midlands that has determined to make monthly payments. That will help to reduce the hardship experienced by loyal officers of local authorities who will suffer from a much reduced income.

The compensation lasts for seven years, but half payment is made in the eighth year. The Government might like to extend the period of time during which compensation is payable. There are important conditions for eligibility spelt out in regulation 3(7)(2)(a) to (e). Regulation 3(7)(2)(b) states that "an employee must have had three years continuous local government service by 1 April 1986 to qualify for compensation. I have been approached by several representatives of the metropolitan counties who suggest that the requirement should be for no more than two years. I should be glad if the Minister would consider that carefully. Such a reduction would bring eligibility into line with eligibility for payment for compulsory redundancy. The choice of three years is quite arbitrary.

Redundancy payments are a less straightforward matter. There is a problem, because there are two schemes for calculating redundancy payments — a national scheme and locally agreed schemes. Three metropolitan county councils—South Yorkshire, Tyne and Wear and West Midlands—have been prevented from implementing local schemes by the undoubted sharp practice of the previous Secretary of State. I refer to the use of retrospective legislation in March 1984 to prevent them from establishing their own severance schemes. On 1 March 1984, the then Secretary of State said in a written reply:

"The second will ensure that any terms which are incorporated into existing or future contracts of employment after 1 March 1984 and which relate to compensation for redundancy or detriment will have no effect where they would entitle an employee to an amount greater than that provided for, in due course, in the main abolition legislation."—[Official Report, 1 March 1984; Vol. 55, c. 276-277.]

It will be noted that the date I mentioned in the former Secretary of State's reply is 1 March. He actually gave the written answer in the Official Report on 1 March 1984. I find that an unacceptable practice.

As the Minister is aware, my constituency is part of the metropolitan county of Tyne and Wear. I shall use Tyne and Wear as a illustration of the iniquitous situation that has arisen as a consequence of the decision of the former Secretary of State. Officers will claim that it is the first time in the history of industrial relations, both inside and outside the public sector, that two different sets of conditions have applied to people being made redundant in the same industry. It is not good enough. It is unfair and unjust. Many of the staff concerned—in fact I would say all of the staff—have given many years of loyal service to the Tyne and Wear metropolitan county and they feel that the Government are using them as political pawns. Even if the abolition of the metropolitan county was a political battle between Members of Parliament at Westminster and councillors on local authorities that is no excuse for the fact that the officers, who were not a part of that political process, will be the ones who will suffer. I find that totally unacceptable. Staff are dismayed at the treatment after serving for many years to the best of their ability.

It is not the wish of the local authority that this problem has arisen. Well before 1 March 1984 my local authority is on record giving a public commitment to a local scheme that provided a safety net, vital in the north east, an area of extremely high unemployment. It is part of the northern region, as you know well, Mr. Deputy Speaker, which has the highest unemployment level in Britain.

Those people who are aged over 50 will find it particularly difficult to find another job if they are made redundant when the abolition day is reached. It has been suggested in a most disgraceful front page of the Daily Express that the schemes are "gravy trains". I cannot understand the Daily Express. I knew that it was a backward newspaper but for it to print a front page lead now about a scheme that was announced on 1 March 1984 is taking things too far. The article, by Mr. Don Coolican talks about a "gravy train". I know that hon. Members on both sides of the House have worked in local Government, as I did for many years. We know that some of the directors—I was an assistant director of social services —could be considered to be well paid, but many of the clerical staff, typists and other people who work for local authorities are far from well paid. To describe what some people in a local authority will obtain as a redundancy payment as a "gravy train" is downright misrepresentation of the true facts and it is a disgrace. It is an insult to the workers, who will already suffer badly by being made unemployed, without having such scandalous and scurrilous material written about them.

The people who face this uncertain future would have been quite happy to have given more years of their lives to serve the people of Tyne and Wear diligently. Tyne and Wear has been used to illustrate the problem but it also affects the staff of two other metropolitan counties, South Yorkshire and the West Midlands. I received a letter from three members of staff of the South Yorkshire county council, with a detailed argument supporting the case for better redundancy pay. They wrote:

"It seems totally wrong that officers employed by South Yorkshire, and by Tyne and Wear and West Midlands and made redundant by abolition should be treated differently from colleagues in the GLC, Merseyside, Greater Manchester and West Yorkshire on the basis of virtual accidents"—

I think that that is a good phrase—

"of timing; accidents relating to the timing of approval of severance schemes in relation to government deadlines.

It may be argued that the GLC, Merseyside, Greater Manchester and West Yorkshire simply eluded the government's efforts and behaved irresponsibly in adopting over-generous severance schemes. This is just not true; it is the scheme proposed to be imposed on South Yorkshire, Tyne and Wear and the West Midlands which is the exception. The scheme is the worst ever applied in the public sector. It compares badly with schemes operated by other public bodies such as the NCB, British Gas and Water Authorities. It is understood that it also compares badly with private schemes such as those operated by ICI, GEC, Courtaulds and Marks and Spencer."

Certain rights were acquired by the GLC and the metropolitan counties — Greater Manchester, West Yorkshire and Merseyside — and in general their contractual schemes give employees a higher level of compensation entitlement than the scheme that is set out in the regulations. Under the present arrangements, and excluding superannuation benefits, a person aged 58 with 34 years' service earning £15,000 a year would receive the following amounts if he worked for the following authorities: Greater Manchester, £20,193; West Yorkshire, £17,163; south Yorkshire, only £8,221. By luck, or by choosing a certain geographical area in which to live and work, an individual may receive almost £21,000 while someone living in another area such as south Yorkshire would receive only £8,000. That cannot be right and it is not right.

After representations to the Government by the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and the Trades Union Congress, the scheme was improved for staff within the 40-50-year age group. However, there are other disparities that are worth mentioning. For example, a local authority worker is treated differently from a civil servant. The following example shows how payment will be calculated for a local authority worker as against a non-mobile civil servant. I do not criticise those who receive more than others. My contention is that metropolitan county staff should receive the same as civil servants.

On abolition, a member of staff of a metropolitan council aged 40 years with 20 years' service will receive 40 weeks' pay. A non-mobile civil servant would receive 65 weeks' pay. A member of staff of a metropolitan county aged 50 years with 30 year' service would be given 82 weeks' pay and the non-mobile civil servant would receive 104 weeks' pay. These are examples — I could give many more — that we would like the Minister to consider.

It is disgraceful that only five weeks remain in which to consider these matters. I hope that the Minister will bring the arrangements for the staff of the metropolitan counties into line with those for civil servants.

The Government's main objective was to abolish the GLC and the metropolitan counties. I cannot be sure, but I hope that it was not part of their policy to create two different tiers of redundancy payments and to pay some staff more or less than others. I hope that the Minister will consider carefully the following questions. First, will the hon. Gentleman allow a scheme to operate which was agreed in detail after 1 March 1984, which is now available and which was declared publicly before 1 March 1984? In other words, it can be demonstrated unequivocally that there is no sharp practice.

Secondly, if the Minister cannot agree to that, will he consider closing the gap between the payments that are made under the two schemes for those aged over 50 years who will experience the greatest difficulty in the job market? We would like to see a closing of the gap between the better paid local schemes and non-local schemes. I stress that by closing the gap I mean bringing upwards the scheme we are discussing and certainly not bringing it down from any of the schemes that have been agreed locally. I ask the Minister seriously to consider closing the gap.

Thirdly, will the Minister take a generous attitude to the problem? The numbers involved will be relatively small When we spent 200 hours on the Bill, the Government talked of possibly 8,000 or 9,000 people being made redundant. We know that, although too many will be made redundant, the numbers will not be of that magnitude. In view of this the Minister has a chance to take a genereous attitude to the problem.

Fourthly, will the Minister agree to look specifically at the compensation that will be obtained by those people, many under 60, who have contributed for over 40 years to a superannuation fund? I understand from a letter from the chief executive of the West Midlands county council, Mr. Hender, that "such officers should be compensated by having redundancy compensation payments on the same scale as that provided under Clause 4(1); that is, two weeks' pay for each year of service."

Fifthly, will the Minister confirm that, as regards reorganisation under the Local Government Act 1985, section 84(1) of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 applies to persons who are affected by local public holiday arrangements? I can see that there could be difficulty here where public holidays, associated extra-statutory holidays and concessionary holidays, interrupt continuity of service. Mr. Hender says, giving an example:

"we have situations where people have left say, Walsall corporation on a Maundy Thursday and have commenced work with the West Midlands County on Wednesday after Easter, the first day of their new contract of employment."

Before anyone thinks that that does not sound serious, let me say that normally I am dealing with a different industry, with a miner with 40 years' service, who receives only 10 years' redundancy pay after 40 years down a lousy, stinking, dirty mine, all because there was a few days' gap between the final part of his employment for the last 10 years and the main part of his employment.

The legislation ensures that staff on maternity leave at 31 March who are not transferred to a successor authority will be entitled to receive from the appropriate Residuary Body any outstanding statutory maternity pay even though their employers cease to exist. However, women employees of the GLC and metropolitan counties also have contractual rights to maternity pay in excess of the statutory provisions, which under present regulations they will lose. We believe that it is completely unfair that the staff concerned should lose such contractual entitlements, which could easily be met by the Residuary Bodies. Women on maternity leave will be unable to make themselves available for other employment or to compete effectively for other jobs, because of their pregnancy or their recent confinement. They will be in a disadvantaged position compared with their colleagues. A continuing entitlement to contractual maternity pay will at least help to provide some compensation. I hope the Minister will take this on board.

Another problem that could well arise is when some people have worked for local government up to 1 April 1974 and then were compulsorily transferred on that date to employment with a water authority or health authority. Then, on various dates since April 1974 they have voluntarily left their water authority or health authority employers and rejoined local government, without any break in service. In effect they could be considered as returning to their natural local government service. However, it would be considered that there had been a break in service for the purpose of redundancy payments under the present scheme. Will the Minister consider a move from local government to a health or water authority not as a break in service but as continuous service for redundancy pay purposes?

Finally, there are implications for the Inner London education authority. There has been no indication so far that the powers of section 31 of the London County Council (General Powers) Act 1921 will be applied to any of the new bodies set up under the Local Goverment Act 1985. If those powers are not applied to the new ILEA, the provisions referred to in paragraph 5(a) of a letter which I have received from the GLC—

"to provide better compensation terms generally than those available to redundant local government employees elsewhere in the country mainly in the area of lump sum redundancy payments and particularly for those under the age of 50 years"—

—will be applicable only to those employees who are transferred to the new ILEA under a statutory transfer order, and will not be applicable to many employees recruited by the new authority after 31 March 1986. The protection will be secured under the Act because the terms are contractual.

Moreover, the powers will not be available for use in the way described in paragraph 5(b) and (c) of the GLC's letter, that is:

"to provide better compensation terms for specified groups of employees in special circumstances (eg for certain professional staff under 50 years at the time of the 'Cutler cuts' exercise in 1978)",

and

"to enable improved early retirement terms to be offered in individual cases, (particularly senior officers) where there has been political pressure for the individual's services to be terminated."

Therefore, it is vital that the powers in respect of those employees are applied to the new ILEA.

The Government face a test tonight. Can they give the reward that loyal, hard-working, conscientious staff of the metropolitan county councils and the GLC deserve? Abolition day is coming far too quickly, but the Government still have time to reconsider the proposals, and to consider all the disparities that have been created by the announcement of the former Secretary of State on 1 March 1984. Will the Minister consider my questions and arguments carefully so that on the dreadful date all members of staff will be properly compensated for the many dedicated years of service that they have given to the metropolitan county councils?

Mr. John Whitfield (Dewsbury): I have listened carefully to the remarks of the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) about the regulations. I do not purport to understand them as closely as he obviously does. However, I know that they are extremely beneficial to the employees of the bodies to which they relate. We as caring Conservatives would not have it any other way, provided those many benefits accrue to those who are genuinely made redundant as a result of the abolition of the county councils and the GLC.

I understand the expression "to be made redundant" to be without work for a period. However, from my experience in west and south Yorkshire, where many of my constituents work and live, many of the employees of the authorities are having their cake and eating it. The gravy train, to which the hon. Gentleman referred and which appalled us all in 1984, has indeed come out of the sidings once again and is up and running in 1986. A considerable number of officers and others who work for these authorities have three choices before them. First, they can calculate what benefits and other payments would be due to them under the regulations, such as those we are considering tonight.

Many people have spoken to me at my surgery complaining that the regulations were not available early enough. In that point, at least, I would agree with the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington. The second choice that these people have is whether to join the district's successor authority or the joint boards to which the functions which they have been administering have been transferred. Their third choice is to consider what other jobs are available in the private or other sectors as an alternative to local government service.

[Mr. John Whitfield]

What a marvellous choice that is. It is a "no lose" situation. It is certainly a choice which the many unemployed people in my constituency who have not had the benefit of working in local government would give their right arms to have.

The hon. Member for Houghton and Washington referred at length to the situation—which he thinks is a poor one—involving the officers of the South Yorkshire county council. I draw to the attention of the House a particular case, that of the chief executive of the South Yorkshire county council, Mr. Harris.

I make it clear that none of the remarks that I wish to make tonight are in criticism of Mr. Harris. He was an excellent chief executive of that authority and a much sought-after individual for his skills in administration. However, in October 1985, because of his undoubted skills, he was head-hunted and offered a job running a very successful barrister's chambers in London. The job was so attractive—it must be like my job here—that he was prepared to take it and commute weekly from west Yorkshire, where he lives, to London.

One would have thought that his employers, the county council, and those involved would have commented on Mr. Harris's stroke of luck and wished him all the best in his new career. However, there was a certain possible redundancy payment and certain pension implications of Mr. Harris's situation, which meant that it was important that he remained in local government for some further months until, I believe, April 1986. Mr. Harris has a job one day a week with the residuary body which will deal with the winding up of the council and for that I am told he is paid at the rate of £10,000 per annum. He works for the residuary body on one day a week and for the rest of the week he is in London conducting the affairs of a successful set of chambers.

The Minister should be aware that it is this type of thing —I would not like to use the word exploitation, rather it is the opportunity available to the poor, long-suffering hard-working, underpaid officers of the local authorities which are being abolished under the Local Government Act 1985 — which is bringing this legislation into disrepute. The Government were unfortunately very much party to the implementation of the reorganisation of local government in 1974 and we received a lot of just criticism from what flowed from that.

We are now engaged in a similar, though very much better, operation which will bring the administration of local government that much nearer to the people and I am in favour and support this measure. However, we are attaching to this radical legislation benefit packages which are far too beneficial for certain individuals and which are bringing the whole legislation into disrepute.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): This is an important point, but some clarification is needed. I know nothing about the individual in question. The hon. Gentleman appeares to be saying that that individual is being retained by the residuary body at a salary of £10,000 a year for an unknown period. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the residuary body has nothing to do with local government because it is the body appointed to wind up. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not drawing from the facts which he has put to the House the conclusion that local government schemes—past, present and future—are to blame. The residuary body is simply a body brought in by the Government which has total discretion as to who to employ and which appears to be the subject of the hon. Gentleman's criticism. That criticism appears therefore to be wrongly directed at local government and its excesses.

Mr. Whitfield: The regulations apply to people who have been employed by the metropolitan county councils, by the new authority or by the residuary bodies.

Will my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State assure the House that he and the officials in his Department will give detailed scrutiny to this type of case? Will my hon. Friend do everything in his power to ensure that the people who benefit under the regulations — there are many—will receive only their absolute entitlement? If measures are used in this way, the implementation of the Local Government Act 1985 is brought into disrepute.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise a matter that comes within the context of the regulations. I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will be able to give me some assurance. It undermines some of the intentions of the regulations which may be generous but which need to be tidied up. Many people will be scurrying around furiously in the next few weeks trying to work out where their future lies when the authorities for which they work are abolished.

The problem relates specifically to a discrepancy and inconsistency and, therefore, to inequality between the two sorts of people who will be working in similar jobs and similar relationships after 1 April to the ones in which they are now working yet whose terms and conditions of service will not remain the same as they are now. They are affected in the context of ILEA.

The old education authority is coming to an end and the new one is starting. The new authority is taking on people in two ways. It is taking on people who are designated for transfer who, to all intents and purposes, will continue in the service of one authority with, therefore, unbroken terms and conditions of service. It is also recruiting people who will start a new period of employment. Inevitably, many of these people are, as of today, ILEA employees.

ILEA has been technically a committee of the Greater London council, which will be abolished at the end of March. Many of the functions carried out by ILEA staff are, in other departments, carried out by staff paid for and managed by the GLC but effectively seconded on an agency basis to work for ILEA, as has been done for weeks, months or years.

There were endless debates in Committee on the Local Government Bill in which various examples of departments were given. Among the common service departments, the engineers' department has many people within it who are employed by the GLC but are working permanently for ILEA on specific projects with people from other departments who perhaps are ILEA employees.

The Minister will be aware of the problem that I raise because there has been correspondence about it between county hall and the various departments. Taking engineers as an example, those who at the end of this month cannot be designated—because they are not working for ILEA now—will have to apply to and be appointed by the new ILEA. Although they may then have the same salaries and terms and conditions of employment as they have now, should they be made redundant in two or three years' time, they will not have the same benefits as those who have already been designated and transferred across to the new ILEA or who have worked for the authority all the time.

It is interesting to consider those working in the architects' department. I understand that the staff in that section were en bloc attributed to ILEA, so they will have continuing terms and conditions of employment. Accordingly, should they face a service variation, in particular redundancy, they will not be prejudiced. In other words, from 1 April there will be a difference of benefit between two people who are today in the same team doing the same job. Through no fault of theirs, they may be treated differently at a future date. That could make for bad relationships. If the Minister replies, "I appreciate that, but it has nothing to do with us," that will be totally unsatisfactory because it is only because of the abolition of the authority and the creation of the new ILEA that the situation arises.

If the Minister replies, "They could have opted out, applied for the new jobs and thereby gained," we shall remind him that there is a cut-off point after which people cannot be designated across. In other words, there is no individual or collective option for people such as engineers to benefit from parallel conditions and terms of employment.

Will the Minister undertake to do something about this problem between now and the cut-off point in a few weeks' time? For example, will the Department, with the Department of Education and Science, consult those affected to ensure that the relatively minor adjustment that is needed to solve the problem is made? I appreciate that that cannot be done tonight; this instrument must be accepted or rejected and cannot be amended. The necessary amending regulations could be laid under section 53 of the Local Government Act 1985. This is not a technical matter. It affects the professional lives, working relationships and potential career prospects of people, many of whom are extremely senior, widely experienced and highly competent staff, whom nobody has criticised for their back-up service, given over many years, to ILEA or the GLC, or both.

I look to the Minister for a strong assurance that we can make some progress to remedy the severe anomalies that affect the education authority for our capital city.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): The Minister will know the point that I am about to raise, as I speak in support of my hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes). There is no need to go over the points that he made, because he adduced a powerful argument against the problems that have been caused by the abolition of the metropolitan counties. The Minister knows that I feel that they should never have been abolished. If they had to be, many of the problems that have, and will occur, could have been prevented. The services should have been run side by side, and gradually the responsibilities should have been transferred from the metropolitan authorities, just as happened in 1974.

The hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Whitfield) talked about the gravy train in 1974, but that was not for those made redundant but for those in work. Many officers, because they were going into areas with larger populations, received great salary increases because all salaries were based on those of the chief executive, who was in charge of a greater area. That was quite in accordance with procedures, so there was nothing wrong with it, except that, finally, the cost was far in excess of what anybody expected.

I am concerned about those who are being made redundant, particularly those in South Yorkshire, who, through no fault of theirs, have found themselves being treated differently from others in the same grade. I worked for a long time with the NCB, and, sadly, one of my duties was to make people redundant. However, we never treated people in the same grades differently. They were treated alike throughout the length and breadth of the country. There were times when legislation changed, and cut-off points had to be adhered to, but they were not on any particular body but spread throughout the country. In its rundown of the industry, the board has always treated everybody in the same grade alike. That is why the board's redundancy scheme was successful. When enhanced payments were introduced, everybody enjoyed them.

Those involved in the redundancy in the metropolitan counties are not on a gravy train. They are facing the most traumatic experience in their working lives. Sometimes for the first time, they are realising that they are vulnerable to the problems of the system. People who thought that they would be working until they were 60 or 65 are suddenly finding themselves unwanted.

I listened carefully to the hon. Member for Dewsbury, who talked about the choice of working for the metropolitan counties, but these people have no choice. They have no job. That is what abolition was about—savings in public expenditure. Those savings were talked about in Committee, and it was shown that the only saving that could be made were through the loss of jobs and staff.

My area has a 20 per cent. unemployment, and a male unemployment rate of 25 to 26 per cent., so what choice is there? In my area, where unemployment is 21 per cent. and male unemployment is 25 or 26 per cent. what other jobs are available? The people know full well that in some cases they will never work again. It is no gravy train. This will be compensation for losing a job and having to bring up a family in the atmosphere of having lost that job.

We are not talking about statistics. This House talks too often of statistics, without realising that people are behind those statistics. Sometimes they are single people, or they may have a family. This is not a gravy train. Most people would continue with their jobs rather than be made redundant if they had the choice. Let us forget that gravy train and concentrate on what will happen on abolition. I did not want abolition. I have said that. But it has come about and we have to face the problems when they confront us. When we consider the problem of abolition, we can treat people alike.

I always fear, especially with this Government, that all this talk of levelling tends to level down rather than up. I hope that will not happen in this case. In many industries, those who receive redundancy payments under statutory provisons have always received enhanced payments. That has occurred in mining and steel, as well as in private industries. When we talk of the running-down of private steel works in our area, we know that redundant workers always receive enhanced payments. When directors are made redundant, they do not receive statutory industrial payments but what used to be called a golden handshake.

[Mr. Allen McKay]

Whatever it is called now, it is compensation for losing a job. That covers all of us. We are not talking of anything that is different for anybody else.

Our system tries to treat people differently. I accept that there will be a cut-off date now. The date does not affect everybody equally; it affects everybody unequally. We ask the Government to consider that situation tonight and to recognise the anomalies that will be caused by putting the date into the Act.

I argued at the time that it should never have been there. The problem is that on 31 March those working for Metropolitan counties will be affected by the same legislation throughout the length and breath of the country. They will be made redundant by that legislation.

We say that they must be treated alike. The Government must ensure that the enhanced payments available to some authorities will be available to the three authorities caught in the trap. It will not cost much or lose any credibility for the Government. It will prove that there is some feeling left in this Government for the effects of their legislation. People will be affected. The Government should consider now those who will be affected by the measure. Let us consider it and bring it in, and make sure that of all the Government's follies this will not be another one.

11.3 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Richard Tracey): I much appreciate — indeed, I share — the Opposition's view of the importance of the debate, and of the compensation regulations.

The hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) has spoken warmly of the staff of the Greater London council and of the metropolitan councils. The Government share that warmth towards the staff, if the Government do not share the Opposition's view of the authorities for which those staff work.

It is slightly ironic that Oppostion Members should pray against the compensation regulations. It would be most unfair on the staff if at the eleventh hour Parliament were to reject the regulations. That would be the logical result of granting the prayer.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Minister knows that the only way to debate this matter is by using the technical device of praying against the regulations. I hope that he will accept that nobody wishes the beneficial effects of the regulations to be prevented. However, we want to make sure that what has not been covered is dealt with by having it debated and answered in the House.

Mr. Tracey: I shall try to answer the points that have been raised, among others, by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes).

The need for the regulations is urgent. There are 25 days to abolition day. Already the staff of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils are rearranging their lives either to fit into the new structure or to find new pastures. Although the contents of the regulations are, as I shall show, widely known and although their effect is retrospective to Royal Assent to the Local Government Act 1985, it is right that the staff of the GLC and the metropolitan county councils should know exactly what Parliament is to make available to them by way of compensation for redundancy or for financial detriment.

For that reason, we on this side of the House would have been keen to see the regulations approved by Parliament many months ago. Part of this debate has focussed upon an apparent delay by the Government. However, it has proved to be impossible to ask Parliament to approve them earlier than this, principally because we were determined to give the Trades Union Congress and the unions what might be described as a last gasp opportunity to put their views to us before we took our final decisions. We had persistently tried to talk to them, but they had rejected all of our many invitations to them to talk to us about the way that abolition would affect their members' interests.

I understand that the refusal of the TUC and the unions to talk to us was determined by a Labour party national executive council resolution which banned anyone from talking to the Government about abolition. It is up to them to deny that fact, but that is what we have always understood and that was fairly apparent during the debates in this House on the legislation. This matter fell under the same umbrella.

Our first invitation to the unions and to the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, representing the employers, followed upon our White Paper in October 1983, two and a half years ago. We said then that we would talk to them about all staffing issues, including our proposal to base the compensation terms for redundant staff on those generally available to local government and also our proposal that we would provide compensation for staff who suffered detriment because they had to move to jobs at lower rates of pay.

The TUC and the AMA refused to discuss these matters with us. Only the Federation of Managerial and Professional Officers' Unions—now FUMPO—had the courage and the common sense to take up our invitation, while making their opposition to the principle of abolition clear.

We repeated our invitation on subsequent occasions. One such occasion of great significance for the issues before us tonight was in March 1984. On 1 March 1984, the Government announced to Parliament that we would take steps to disallow compensation terms other than those to be set in the abolition legislation. We did this because we believed it to be right to set nationally applicable terms for a reorganisation of this kind and of this scope and scale.

The steps that we took were to place two provisions in what became section 53 of the Act. The first one requires compensation to be paid only in accordance with regulations to be made for the purpose — these regulations. The second — implementing our promise that we would not take away, retrospectively, anyone's legal rights established before our announcement — protected contractual rights to better compensation which any officer had obtained on or before the day of our announcement. Indeed, there has been some discussion of those very terms tonight.

In doing this, we followed well-established precedents for Governments to protect forthcoming legislation against pre-emptive action by interested parties. It was, as subsequent events have underlined, a very important step, both for the staff and for the abolition authorities. We again invited the representation of both to discuss such matters with us. But still the TUC and AMA stayed away from the negotiating table.

We repeated our invitation late in 1984. We had introduced the Bill with many clauses relating to staff. We had published our proposed terms for redundancy compensation, including the possiblity of some enhancements for the 41 to 49 age group. We had secured majorities on the floor of the House not only for the principle of abolition but for the date of 1 April 1986. We invited the TUC and AMA to talk. Once again, they sat on their hands.

The TUC stayed put until 14 July 1985—that is, eight months ago. Then, only two days before the Royal Assent to the 1985 Act and nearly two years after our first invitation, it sat down to discuss with us staffing aspects of abolition.

I suggest that we would have been well within our rights to say, there and then, that it had come too late to discuss compensation issues. We could reasonably have decided to get on with the complex task of making the regulations. That would have minimised the uncertainties facing staff.

But we chose not to. We gave the TUC the opportunity to negotiate in earnest. We also included the AMA, which came hurrying along to see us on the coat tails of the TUC, a mere three months after, in October 1985; and still asking for more time! During those negotiations, we published consultation papers on detriment compensation and on an early release scheme, and we provided the TUC and AMA with all the help and guidance we could about the staffing provisions of the new Act.

Finally, after four months of tough negotiations—I will say that for those across the table from us—we made our final decisions, which were announced by my noble Friend the Minister of State on 13 November. Knowing how important the terms were to the staff, we gave our decisions full publicity so that, during the time it would take to transform the terms into a statutory instrument, everyone concerned — old and new employers, individual officers and union officials — would know precisely what the terms were.

Even before our final decisions were made we had, of course, made considerable strides in drafting the necessary regulations. We were offered help by the TUC, the AMA, FUMPO, NALGO and the staff commission with the technicalities of drafting. This we accepted, and I can readily say that we are very grateful for that help. The regulations are the better for it, in our view. But the process of consultation, responses, and redrafting took us into this year, when we laid the regulations at the earliest practicable opportunity.

Given the late hour, and given that the House has known the substance of the terms—since well-publicised terms—since 13 November last, I do not intend to go through the terms in detail. We have indeed, placed a memorandum in the Library which does this.

I should like, if I may, in the time remaining to me to deal with the points which have been raised by hon. Members on both sides of the House, most particularly by the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington, who spoke from the Opposition Front Bench. The hon. Gentleman talked about the terms and why, indeed, the terms applying to the staff of the GLC and the metropolitan counties were not the same as those applying to the Civil Service.

We made it clear as long ago as 1980 that the Crombie terms were no longer appropriate. In deciding on the terms set out in the regulations we started with the existing local government provisions but we took account of the unique circumstances which have come about as a result of abolition. We took account of the priorities that the unions in particular identified for improving those terms.

We have set terms which are fair for people who through no fault of their own have had their working lives disrupted by the legislation which they could not have anticipated up to three years ago; legislation which, I must tell the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay), we agree with and feel strongly about. But we fully accept that the staff could not have anticipated it entirely up to three years ago. We still say that the terms which have been set are fair on the ratepayers who will foot the bill.

We have been asked why we set three years as the qualifying period. Initially we proposed a qualifying period of five years' continuous local government service, including, in the case of the GLC and the metropolitan counties employees only, two years' service with that employer. But in the light of consultations we decided to relax both requirements. We decided that the appropriate qualifying period for compensation lasting as long as eight years could not be set at less than three years. I remind hon. Members that the Crombie code, the sort of code that has been discussed for Civil Service workers, and indeed the Crombie code used in the 1974 reorganisation of local government, prescribed the qualifying period of five years.

The hon. Member for Houghton and Washington also talked about the timing of detriment payments. He is correct to say that entitlement to compensation for detriment will arise at the end of each 12-month period. He is also right to say that each compensating authority can make payments on account before the end of each period. That is a fair and flexible approach. It reflects the reality that detriment can only be based on comparing year with year, but at the same time it allows the compensating authority to make timely payments during each year.

The hon. Gentleman compared local government staff with those who had been transferred compulsorily out of local government to the water authorities in 1974 and who subsequently rejoined local government. Such staff are not able to reckon either their water authority service or the local government service which preceded it in calculating their entitlement to a statutory redundancy payment. That is not the direct result of the regulations in relation to abolition. The point here applies generally.

Mr. Boyes: Tell the people who are affected who have worked in the water industry or the Health Service why. Explain in detail why they will not get the compensation for that period when they worked in local government before 1974 and were compulsorily transferred into those other industries.

Mr. Tracey: The difference was made clear at the time when the original transfer was made. It was not a question of being transferred from one area of local government to another. This was a quite different matter. Indeed, that point is well known now. That is a perfectly fair answer to the hon. Gentleman. I think that it is well known to people who were transferred into the water authorities.

The hon. Gentleman asked why an employee who already had 40 years' service would not have his pension enhanced by added years. The abolition compensation terms are based on the general local government superannuation and compensation arrangements which provide that such a person cannot accrue more than 40 years' service by the age of 60. Therefore, a person who already has 40 years' service when he reaches 60 does not receive added years.

Many of us will have sympathy with what the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington said about maternity rights. Any woman who has by the time of abolition established her right to maternity pay under employment legislation will be able to get from the appropriate residuary body any part of her entitlement which is outstanding when the GLC and the metropolitan counties are abolished. However, the position of any contractual entitlements is less clear. If such entitlements survive termination of a contract of employment they will be met by the appropriate residuary body, but it is far from clear why that group should be specifically compensated if such entitlements are lost and compensation for redundancy is available. Other groups, such as the long-term sick and people on compassionate leave, are equally deserving. It would be invidious to make distinctions. The point about maternity rights has been raised with my right hon. Friend by my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mr. Thornton) and it will be explored in the Department.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) pinpointed anomalies affecting staff who work for the Inner London education authority. Staff transferred by order will retain their existing contractual rights. Staff transferred to ILEA will retain London Local Act terms, but recruited staff will be offered normal local government terms. We do not consider that the difference is a sufficient reason for extending the London Local Act terms generally to new London bodies.

The hon. Gentleman made some fair points about what he described as extraordinary anomalies. I undertake to consider them. I do not want to raise his hopes too high, but as we are a compassionate Government we shall examine the anomalies again before we reach our decision at the end of the 25 days.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I am grateful to the Minister. I shall forward the correspondence and the documents to him almost immediately. He and I appreciate the great urgency, because time is short. Perhaps the matter can be pursued with the Government outside the House in a matter of days so that we can try to overcome what may seem to be a small problem but which is a big one for the people concerned.

Mr. Tracey: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, we shall read the correspondence with interest.

The hon. Member for Houghton and Washington referred critically to the article in the Daily Express about gravy trains. My hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Whitfield) spoke passionately about examples that concern his constituents and others in the north of England. I cannot comment on schemes as raised by the Daily Express and my hon. Friend as I am not aware of the terms, and to comment would be unfair to individuals. My hon. Friend reflected deep-seated anger at excessively generous terms being worked out. We have felt that some of the terms are extremely excessive if that is possible.

Mr. Boyes: Surely the Minister will not now base a case on one example given by the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Whitfield). The Minister is about to generalise from one individual. I tried to explain, as the Daily Express concedes about the GLC:

"most of his 4,000 staff will get between £1,000 and £3,000."

The hon. Member for Dewsbury is a director of Cullingworth Textiles Ltd. and of Caldaire Independent Hospital plc and has the trade of solicitor and notary public, and he is objecting to some people from the GLC and the metropolitan counties getting compensation of between £1,000 and £3,000. That really is hypocritical.

Mr. Tracey: The hon. Gentleman is wrong to say that I am generalising. I do not want to make general points but, as he has mentioned the commercial world in regard to my hon. Friend, perhaps I ought to read some of the Daily Express leader of 3 March which said:

"private companies use money freely raised in the market place. Local authorities use money extorted from their hapless ratepayers. There is a world of difference."

I do not subscribe to the precise language, but the sentiments are not entirely unreasonable and are shared by a good many people. We have not tried to change the terms which were established before 1 March 1984. I am afraid, however, that we cannot level up in local authorities that did not negotiate deals before that date as those terms would impose a completely unacceptable burden on ratepayers. No Government could accept that decisions taken by each authority should determine the terms to be set nationally in a statutory reorganisation.

The Government have worked the regulations out fairly and patiently, given the amount of vacillation, time wasting and, indeed obstructive behaviour, of the Trades Union Congress and some of the local government unions. I commend the regulations to the House.

Question put and negatived.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 80 (Standing Committees on European Community documents)

USE OF SEWAGE SLUDGE IN AGRICULTURE

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 9576/82 and 7719/84, draft Directive and Amendment on the use of sewage sludge in agriculture; and affirms the need to ensure that a directive, whilst incorporating measures to protect human health and the environment, does not inhibit the safe use of sewage sludge on agricultural land.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

Question agreed to.

Drugs Misuse and AIDS

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

11.29 pm

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): I am grateful to Mr. Speaker for making it possible for me to raise a grave and urgent matter—the connection between misusers of drugs and the spread of the dreaded disease AIDS. I do so in my capacity as chairman of the all-party committee on the misuse of drugs, which spans both Houses of Parliament.

Drugs misuse is serious enough. Since 1979 there has been a rapid and disturbing increase in the number of addicts. It is now estimated that more than 60,000 people regularly misuse drugs, with heroin misuse being most common, but many other drugs are involved, including amphetamines and sedatives. The vast majority of those who are affected are under 30, and many are in their teens.

Moreover, there is a continuing increase in the number of new addicts. My all-party committee on drug misuse has been advised that in 1985 there was probably a 25 per cent. increase in the number of new addicts as compared with 1984. Although the Customs and Excise has continued to seize very large quantities of illicit drugs and is to be warmly congratulated on its efforts, this has not stemmed the rise in addiction. The purity of illicit drugs now available to addicts does not seem to have declined and there has been no significant rise in the price addicts pay for drugs on the street. Since there is no real shortage, addiction is likely to go on increasing.

The damage caused both to the young people involved and to the nation is incalculable. The Select Committee on Home Affairs described it as the most serious peacetime threat to our society and few would disagree with that assessment. But now an even greater threat has been added to what is already a serious social problem—the risks associated with infection by the HTLV 3 virus and the development of AIDS.

In the United Kingdom the first case of AIDS was reported as recently as the end of 1981. Since then the number of cases detected has increased rapidly. By the end of last year 275 cases had been reported, 216 of them in London and most of the remainder in a few large urban centres in England. Since then I think that I can say with some authority that 144 of those people have died. The long incubation period of the disease dictates that the number of cases will increase steeply for several years. Predictions suggest that we can expect a further 300 to 400 new cases this year and by 1988 there may be about 2,000 more.

In public health terms, even more significant is the fact that about 20,000 people, mostly men, are at present infected with the HTLV 3 virus. That figure can be expected, at the very least, to double annually unless steps are taken to inform people how to reduce the risk of developing AIDS by changing their sexual habits.

It has to be said that the incidence of the disease in Britain has so far been substantially lower than elsewhere. In September 1985, Britain ranked ninth out of the 21 reporting European countries. The incidence in the United States is about 13 times higher than it is here, and by October 1985 more than 13,000 cases of AIDS had been reported in that country. I am sure that my right hon. Friend will agree that there is not much comfort to be gained from the fact that this dreadful disease, for which there is no known cure, is currently less prevalent here than elsewhere.

Let us consider how the disease can be spread. We know that the virus which underlies AIDS can, in addition to spreading between practising homosexuals and among drug addicts who share needles when injecting drugs, be transmitted by men to women during normal intercourse, by an infected mother to an unborn child in the womb, and probably by women to men during normal intercourse.

We have already been warned. Reports from Edinburgh show a high rate of infection with the HTLV 3 virus among drug users who have injected themselves. It seems that 57 per cent. of drug misusers tested in a general practice in one area of the city are infected. In Dundee, all those who have been found to be infected by the virus have been drug misusers who inject drugs. For the rest of the country there is admittedly a lower rate of infection, but it is rising. A relatively short time ago the rate was 5 per cent. I am told that it is now as high as 10 per cent.

This infection in drug misusers is a very serious problem. Although sharing injection equipment is the route of transmission, the addict remains infected for the rest of his life. Even stopping drug misuse is no protection from AIDS, although this may reduce the chances of the full syndrome developing in someone who is infected. Importantly, men and women are equally at risk. Non-drug using partners can become infected, as can babies born to infected mothers. Given that many drug misusers overcome their addiction and return to more normal lives, they may nevertheless infect others who are at present not considered to be at risk and have not the faintest idea that they are at risk.

It is clear that urgent and sustained action is necessary to check the spread of this dreadful disease. If it is not checked, it will become endemic among injecting drug users and it is likely that it will infect others who have never injected drugs and have never had any reason to suppose themselves to be at risk.

I raise this matter because I am anxious to know how the Government view this appalling prospect. Can my right hon. Friend tell us what plans he has to educate the public about this serious health matter? Can he tell us what should be done to limit the spread of infection? Does he not agree that the medical profession needs educating as well as the public? Has his attention been drawn to an appallingly irresponsible booklet entitled "Sex for Beginners" which has been published by the British Medical Association, which unbelievably speaks of some men enjoying anal intercourse? There is no qualification, no warning, only a crude indication that anal intercourse is a practice which some people accept as normal. Is this not an encouragement to activity which is anti-social and dangerous in the extreme? Surely the BMA should be told to withdraw the booklet, which in this context is irresponsible in the extreme and must be offensive to many doctors. Will my right hon. Friend take immediate action on this? I ask him now to take immediate action.

There are other questions which I must put to my right hon. Friend. As drug misusers are at serious risk, what steps are being taken to make them aware of the dangers of injecting drugs and sharing equipment with other drug addicts? I know that the Government are alert to these problems and I am not criticising my right hon. Friend and his Department. I know that extra money has been made available recently, but what funds have been allocated specifically to ensure that adequate steps are taken both to inform drug misusers of the dangers I have mentioned and to train those who work in this area—brave spirits—helping drug addicts? I know, too, of the work which has been undertaken to prepare posters and leaflets for drug misusers and I welcome the efforts made by my right hon. Friend's Department to support preventive efforts of this sort.

May I take the opportunity, on behalf of the all-party committee, to thank the chief medical officer for England and Wales and his colleague, the chief medical officer for Scotland, for the way in which they have taken us into their confidence in this matter? In return, I can say that my committee has complete confidence in them and their approach to the problem.

However, the efforts of my right hon. Friend's Department are merely preliminary steps to what must be a sustained campaign. What additional steps does my right hon. Friend propose to take to ensure that the resources needed for effective preventive work are mobilised before HTLV 3 infection and AIDS reaches the levels throughout Britain already reached in Edinburgh? Incidentally, the level in Edinburgh seems to be comparable to that in New York. That is a dreadful statement to have to make.

In some circles it is proposed that needles and syringes should be made more readily available to reduce the likelihood that injection equipment will be shared between drug misusers. Is that not strange logic? If dirty, reused needles and syringes are the principal means of spreading infection among drug users, would not a freer supply result in the means of infection being more widely available than is now the case? Is this not the equivalent of trying to control an epidemic of smallpox by issuing vials of smallpox to the population at large? If, as seems to be the case, drug misusers who turn to injection almost inevitably use the injection equipment of someone else, would not the proposal infect many more people than might otherwise be the case? While there may well be good clinical grounds for providing clean injection equipment to drug misusers within the context of a controlled treatment programme under professional medical direction surely no ethical or clinical grounds can be offered for increased availability outside an authorised treatment programme?

Moreover, I believe that there may be doubts about the legality of such a course when equipment is provided in the belief that the person supplied will use it for the purpose of taking illegal drugs.

The Home Office has stated its intention of tackling the problem of cocaine sniffing kits. Would not the sales of needles and syringes to addicts, intent on injecting illegal drugs, come into the same category? Is it possible that supplying such equipment is tantamount to inciting, assisting, aiding or abetting the commitment of offence? I should be grateful if my right hon. Friend would comment on those points. I hope, too, that he will agree that tackling HTLV 3 infection must be a priority. Failure to respond now will inevitably result in untold social harm and immense cost as those who are victims of this appalling disease will eventually have to be cared for by the health service. I repeat that we are dealing here with a disease for which there is no known cure. The chief medical officer for England and Wales told my committee that a vaccine to treat the disease is not expected in less than five years. Here we have an instance where prevention is better than cure, especially as we do not have a cure and cannot hope to have one for several years.

This is the most serious problem that we have had to face for years and clearly there is no room for complacency. If drug misusers are to be assisted, the means must be provided to allow them an alternative to continued drug misuse. The Government's prevention campaign is to be welcomed. We have a long way to go, but a start has been made. Now an equally forceful campaign must be mounted to ensure that those already involved in drug misuse are aware of the dangers that they run from AIDS. Education is only part of the answer. Without effective treatment services which attract those most at risk, education will be of little use to those already addicted.

In the United States, where experience of this problem is well in advance of our own, education has been accompanied by a very substantial increase in treatment services for drug misusers. These have included methadone treatment programmes to move drug misusers away from injection and to help them to become drug free. What plans do the Government have to ensure that there will be an increase in treatment services in this country?

With the possibility that HTLV 3 infection will spread rapidly unless adequate measures are taken, decisions on central Government direction and financing should be taken now. To leave hard-pressed health authorities to determine priorities in their own good time will inevitably mean that in a few years they will have little or no choice. Treatment of those who have AIDS will then become a priority in health spending whether we like it or not. Increased treatment services now is a cheaper and more humane option both for drug misusers and the population generally. "The Guidelines of Good Clinical Practice in the Treatment of Drug Misuse" suggest a short and rapid drug detoxification, and a referral of more difficult cases to hospital services. If such services are not available, those most likely to be infected are the ones least likely to be offered help and most likely to spread infection through the population.

I know that my right hon. Friend and his colleagues take this matter seriously, as does the chief medical officer and his colleagues. My concern tonight is to elicit from my right hon. Friend what plans he has to ensure a coherent and co-ordinated response to this most serious threat to public health. But I also feel that it is my duty to warn that, while it may still seem to many that this is a minority problem, without adequate attention and resources being devoted now to its containment it will soon cease to be a minority problem and will then demand far greater resources and bolder responses than have so far been envisaged. Time, I admit, is running out fast.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) for raising this important and worrying subject of drug misuse, and the spread of the AIDS virus, HTLV 3. He does so with authority, as chairman of the all-party committee on drug misuse. I wish to make it abundantly clear that the Government attach high priority to a co-ordinated programme of action to control and limit the spread of the AIDS virus as a means of safeguarding public health. Before I mention the measures that the Government are taking, it may be helpful if I say something about the AIDS virus and its spread in the United Kingdom.

The AIDS virus is not highly infectious. It is not spread by normal social contact, such as shaking hands, coughing, sneezing and sharing washing, eating, drinking and toilet facilities. Normal routes of transmission are through intimate sexual contacts, or exposure to infected blood products. Despite the limited ways in which the infection spreads, many people in the United Kingdom have been exposed to the virus. To update the figures of my right hon. Friend, at the end of February 305 full clinical cases of AIDS had been reported, of which 157 had died. The majority of cases—88 per cent.—were in homosexual men. Only three cases have been reported where injecting drug misuse was the main risk factor.

The number of cases is only the tip of the iceberg of the problems posed by the virus. Many more people have unknowingly been affected. At present they have no symptoms of illness, but they must be regarded as infectious. A proportion, perhaps one in four, may develop AIDS.

It is difficult to estimate how many people are at present infected with the HTLV 3 virus. My right hon. Friend gave an estimate of 20,000, and that would be regarded by the experts as a realistic assessment of the present position. However, no reliable estimates of the proportion of drug misusers who have become infected by sharing and using infected needles and syringes have been made.

However, two recent, small scale studies in Scotland have revealed a disturbingly high level of infection. My right hon. Friend referred to one of those studies. This supports the view based on the experience of the United States, that drug misusers who are injecting drugs must be considered as a high risk group for exposure to the virus.

While it is possible to identify groups within the community which at the moment have a higher risk of exposure to infection, the infection can spread outside these groups. For that reason, the Government have adopted a broad strategy of co-ordinated action aimed at minimising the risk for both the high risk groups and the general public.

Let me outline the main parts of this strategy. Information is collected by the Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre and expert medical advice is provided by a high powered and authoritative, expert advisory group. I warmly welcome my right hon. Friend's comments about the way that his Committee has been assisted by the chief medical officer of my Department, a most distinguished epidemiologist, and also by his opposite number in Scotland. There is a committee to monitor the spread of the infection and advice on measures to reduce it and that has branches in Scotland and Wales. There is also an inter-Departmental Ministerial steering group chaired by myself and backed by an official group to co-ordinate strategy on wider issues.

Specific measures to improve the safety of blood and blood products have been taken, including the screening and testing of blood donations and the heat treatment of blood products. Testing facilities are now generally available together with a counselling service for those found to be infected.

Additional resources have been provided for the three Thames regions—North East, North West and South East—which are treating some 75 per cent. of the AIDS cases.

General advice and guidance has been issued, some directly by the Government, for example to the health professionals and to the local education authorities—and some by voluntary, charity and private agencies funded by the Government—the Health Education Council, the standing committee on drug abuse, the Terence Higgins Trust, the Scottish AIDS Monitor are all organisations which have produced posters and leaflets highlighting the particular dangers for injecting drug misusers.

That material explains the way that the virus is transmitted and particularly emphasises the risks of infection associated with the sharing of injection equipment, needles and syringes. Information on this route of transmission of infection will also be provided in the forthcoming national public information campaign on AIDS which is in an advanced state of preparation with £2·5 million—a very substantial sum—having been allocated by the Government for that campaign. I hope that my right hon. Friend will understand that I cannot preempt the detailed content of that campaign this evening, but I hope that further details will be available soon. These are all important steps aimed at controlling the spread of the virus which causes AIDS.

I should like to respond to the point made by my right hon. Friend about another measure which some people are advocating for controlling the infection in drug misusers—the suggestion that needles and syringes should be made more freely available.

The transmission of the AIDS virus through contaminated shared needles and syringes is extremely worrying, but, like my right hon. Friend, I am not persuaded by the evidence that I have seen that clean syringes and needles, freely available, would necessarily deter established injecting users, whether or not receiving prescribed drugs, from sharing their equipment with other drug users. I am inclined to believe that there is a real risk that greater availability of needles and syringes, by encouraging drug users to experiment with injection, could make matters worse. Much evidence shows that first injections and further early injections are made by using borrowed equipment before injection becomes a regular practice for the individual concerned. I do not believe, according to the evidence as presented to me, that the greater availability of "clean" equipment, if one could so describe it, would have the effect that many argue in reducing the use of contaminated needles.

As drug misusers realise the gravity of the threat to their health from the HTLV infection, I hope that they will cease sharing their equipment. I hope that this debate will act in that direction. Better still, let them seek help so that they stop injecting or taking drugs altogether. Priority is being given to treatment centres with this aim in view.

My right hon. Friend referred to doubts that had been raised about the legality of supplying equipment in the knowledge that the person supplied is going to use it to take illegal drugs and asked whether similar measures to those being taken in relation to the sale of cocaine sniffing kits could be adopted. The new offence which will be created by an amendment to the Drug Trafficking Offences Bill in the case of cocaine kits and other paraphernalia which may be supplied for the purpose of administering illicit drugs will exempt syringes and needles, so as to avoid any measure which could even encourage illicit drug users to re-use such items, with the attendant risks of AIDS and hepatitis. I hope that my right hon. Friend will agree that that is wise.

[Mr. Barney Hayhoe]

My right hon. Friend referred to the BMA booklet "Safe Sex for Beginners". I have studed a copy of it. My right hon. Friend was right to express grave concern about the way in which the document refers to anal intercourse without even mentioning that such intercourse carries a high risk of transmitting this virus. The booklet was published some time ago. I understand that the BMA is well aware of this concern, and I gather that this serious omission will be remedied in a reprint of the booklet which should be published shortly. I am sure that my right hon. Friend welcomes that as I do.

AIDS is a serious public health hazard. Growing dangers must not be minimised. Nevertheless, it should be seen in perspective. My right hon. Friend was almost certainly right in predicting that some 2,000 AIDS victims will be identified in 1988. We should not forget that some 100,000 people will almost certainly die this year from smoking-related illnesses. We need to see these matters in perspective.

My right hon. Friend is absolutely right to draw our attention to the particular and dreadful dangers linking drug misuse with this horrifying disease which, as things stand, is incurable. Great efforts are being made by the medical fraternity in the United Kingdom and overseas to find a cure, but the right way to stop infection is for people to change their habits, to cease casual and promiscuous relationships. Those unfortunate people who misuse drugs must be careful to avoid the dangers to which we have referred.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Twelve o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 7 March 1986

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITION

Shops Bill

9.35 am

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me leave to present a petition from constituents of mine who are gravely distressed by detailed reports of the Government's proposals to withdraw the regulations relating to trading on Sundays.

This petition is not the result of the standard reflex reaction of the traditional Sabbatarian school of philosophy — not a bit of it. Rather is it based on a broad and genuine concern for the welfare of the community, the maintenance of accepted and agreed conditions of work and the protection of the family unit.

The petition was entrusted to me for presenatation by the Rev. Tony Bell of St. James's parish in Hardwick, the Rev. Richard Martin of St. John's parish in Grindon and St. James's parish in Thorpe Thewles and the Rev. Peter Hirst of St. Aidan's parish in Billingham. They express their opposiion to the provision for unlimited Sunday trading in the Shops Bill that is currently before Parliament, recognising that Sunday has special characteristics as a day of rest, recreation and worship for the benefit of our family and community life. They ask that "your honourable House do maintain legal limitations on Sunday trading to ensure that the special character of Sunday be protected."

To lie upon the Table.

Employment Rights

9.36 am

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): I beg to move,

That this House condemns Her Majesty's Government, whose economic, social and anti-trade union policies have, since 1979, tripled unemployment and placed the greatest burdens on those least able to bear them, particularly women, young persons and the low paid, through the reduction of internationally agreed minimum legislative standards ensuring basic social, human and employment rights for Britain's workforce; deplores the increasing bitterness and frustration that characterises Britain's industrial relations, exacerbated by the Government's anti-trade union legislation, which has thrown considerable doubt on basic trade union rights whilst encouraging the worst possible management practices, as evident in the News International dispute at Wapping; and calls upon the Government to reverse these disastrous policies of confrontation and attacks upon Britain's workers and their trade unions, which have created so much poverty and strife throughout Great Britain, and replace them with a policy of economic expansion and conciliation and co-operation between employers, trade unions and the Government, based upon a positive framework of rights for Britain's workforce.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Eventually, at 7 o'clock last night, I was able to obtain from the Table Office a copy of the motion that the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) invites us to debate this morning. At 7 o'clock last night the Table Office did not have it printed; it was available only as a typescript copy.

It seems to me to be neither courteous nor for the convenience of the House that the terms of a motion that we are to debate should be tabled at such a very late stage. The motion is lengthy and specific and deals with concrete points. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether it is in order that it should be tabled at such a very late stage for debate this morning.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that I need any help. The motion is in order. Due notice was given, although it is generally for the convenience of the House to have a little longer notice of motions like this so that we can all see exactly what the debate is to be about.

Mr. Skinner: I wish to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House——

Mr. Howarth: Is it a point of order?

Mr. Skinner: Yes, it is a point of order, in view of what Mr. Speaker has had to say. Mr. Speaker made specific reference to the fact that it would be for the convenience of the House if these motions were tabled earlier. There are countless occasions when this Government table motions within a few minutes—not at 7 o'clock but a few minutes before the rising of the House. There have also been a few occasions when the Government have demanded on the same day a switch from Committee stage to Report stage and we have had to table manuscript amendments within an hour — [Interruption]—so the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) wants to talk to his Front Bench.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We do not want to take time out of this debate. Does the hon. Gentleman want to be helpful?

Mr. Cook: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether it would have been helpful to those who are expressing their distress, like the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt), who is doing it so vociferously at this moment, if my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens North (Mr. Evans) had held a press conference before putting his motion on the Order Paper.

Mr. Speaker: This sounds like a really good Friday morning. I shall answer the point of order raised by the hon. Member for Rolsover (Mr. Skinner). What I have said about the need for adequate notice applies equally to the Front Benches as to the Back Benches. I call Mr. John Evans.

Mr. Evans: I am grateful Mr. Speaker. With respect, may I point out to the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) who raised the point of order, that I did seek the guidance of the Table Office on what the procedures were. They advised me, and I followed the rules of the House to the letter. May I also point out to the hon. Member that I tabled the title of the motion calling attention to employment rights some nine days ago. Surely the hon. Member had the wit to read what the subject of the debate would be and thus appreciate precisely what the topic would be. I accept your point, Mr. Speaker, that we have spent too long on this rather ridiculous point of order.

Although I am delighted to have the opportunity to sponsor a debate about these most important issues that are facing us, I am bound to draw attention to the fact that once again the Minister for Employment in not in attendance for a major debate on employment and employment rights. One is left with the feeling that Cabinet Ministers simply never stop running away and are only too happy to leave such debates to Parliamentary Under-Secretaries. However, I acknowledge the presence of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment.

Unemployment is the greatest issue facing our nation and it is right that the House should examine the question of mass unemployment. It is right that the House should examine the Government's treatment of the problems of unemployment and their economic and social policies which have created unemployment. It is also important that the House should review the Government's attack on the disadvantaged, an attack which has taken place over the past six years on women, young children and all those who are, unfortunately, reduced to claiming social security benefits. At this point it is most important that the House should examine the Government's attack on trade unionists and their organisations. It is important that we ensure that full examination is given to those aspects of Government legislation that have created the situation in Wapping, which is a disgrace to an industrial society.

I start by dealing with the issues in reverse order to that in which I outlined them and begin with the Government's attack on trade unionists and their organisations. It is an attack which has been mounted over the past six years. At the outset may I declare an interest in this subject as a sponsored member fo the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers. I am a lifelong member of that organisation and I am inordinately proud to belong to it.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): Does the hon. Member care to say whether he thinks the three-month strike by the AUEW in 1979 helped the employment prospects of its members?

Mr. Evans: To be perfectly frank, I do not recall a three-month strike in 1979. Perhaps if the hon. Gentleman catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, he will have the opportunity to remind the House of that strike. Suffice it to say that any industrial dispute involving members of the AUEW is always in the interests of those workers. The AUEW's record will stand comparison with any organisation to which the hon. Member may wish to refer.

Since 1979, it has been central to the Tory Government's policy to break, or to cripple, the power and the influence of the trade union movement. That power has been built up over many years, often at the behest and support of successive Governments. Until the present Government came to power, every other Government had recognised that the trade union movement should, by rights, have a powerful part to play in the nation's affairs. When one examines the history of the past six years, one recognises that the anti-trade union legislation and the mass unemployment created by the Government are inextricably linked. A major part of the Tory attack on the British working people has been to attack their institutions and to attack working people's ability to defend themselves, their jobs and their standard of living.

Over the past six years there have been four major pieces of legislation that have had a detrimental effect on the trade union movement. The first attack was the disgraceful Social Security Act 1980, which deducted £15 a week, subsequently uprated to £16 a week, from the social security benefit of the family of any individual on strike. That was the first stage of the Tory attack. That legislation applied to unions, such as the mineworkers union in their year-long struggle with the Government. That union had never paid any strike benefit but, nevertheless, the families of the striking miners and other individuals were denied £16 from their pittance of benefit.

Following the Social Security Act 1980 there came the Employment Act 1980. I had the privilege as acting as Opposition Whip during its stages in Committee and through the House. This Act mounted the attack on the closed shop and restricted the right to picket. It restricted secondary action in furtherance of a trade dispute. That Act has created the nightmarish situation that now exists at Wapping. A ruthless employer, Mr. Murdoch, of News International, has been able to use the law in a way which, I submit, the House never intended.

The Secretary of State at that time was the right hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior) and the law that he put on the statute book has been subsequently amended, altered and shaped by the judges and the legal profession so as to allow what was never intended by section 17 of the Act. It has allowed Mr. Murdoch and other employers to construct a chain of limited companies to create a legal fiction of separation. If, at company A the work or the business is being interrupted by a perfectly legitimate industrial dispute, the law on secondary action can be brought into play at company X although it is owned and operated by the same employer, because a chain of small private limited companies have been erected between them, even though the same work is being done on behalf of the same employer. The workers in that context have been denied their job opportunities and denied their work. Subsequently they have been denied their rights to such things as redundancy payment and the right to claim unfair dismissal and to take such claims to a tribunal. I am sure no decent citizen would attempt morally to justify the scenario that exists at Wapping.

What was intended by the Employment Act 1980? I remind the House that the Committee considering the Bill met on 32 occasions for almost 100 hours. I remind the House that there was no guillotine on the Bill. Indeed, there was no suggestion that the guillotine should be applied to the Bill. We went through the Bill clause by clause, line by line, and examined every aspect of the Government's intentions in that Act.

The Committee spent no fewer than five sittings on clause 14 — subsequently clause 15 — on secondary picketing. The Solicitor-General was in attendance for long stretches of our debates on clause 14 and our attempts to define and bring out into the open the position in relation to secondary picketing. The Committee never discussed secondary action.

On 19 February — the ninth sitting of the Committee — the Government published a consultation document on secondary action. The Committee had therefore sat for quite some time before the document was produced. The Committee spent some time deliberating whether it should discuss clause 14 on secondary picketing without seeing whether the Government intended to do anything about secondary action. On 18 March, at the 24th sitting, my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) sought guidance from the Chair and asked:

"Would it be in order for me to seek to move a change in the order in which we are considering the clauses in order to defer our consideration of clause 14 and deal with some other clauses in the meanwhile?

May I, with your kind indulgence, Mr. Goodhew, explain the thought behind that request? Clause 14 covers very much the same ground as the Government's working paper. Indeed, the clause and the working paper are not merely interlinked but are intertwined. It will be impossible to discuss clause 14 without also discussing the working paper." — [Official Report, Standing Committee A, 18 March 1980; c. 1287.]

The Chairman accepted a motion, which my hon. Friend moved, to postpone consideration of clause 14 until after consideration of new clauses. The Government resisted that motion and, after a short debate, and in view of what the Chairman said, my hon. Friend withdrew his motion. In retrospect, we should probably not have withdrawn it but pursued the important point that any proposals on secondary action should have been examined in Committee.

On Report, the Government produced the blockbuster new clause 1 which covered no fewer than eight paragraphs and 54 lines. It comprised the most monstrous and complex legal jargon which nobody understood at the time, not even the Secretary of State. During the debate in the new clause on 17 April 1980, I said:

"In this case the Secretary of State frankly admitted that there was little knowledge in Parliament of what the complex clause actually meant. We must all sit back and wait and go through goodness knows how many industrial disputes before the judges finally determined what the clause means."—[Official Report, 17 April 1980; Vol. 982, c. 1546.]

In an intervention to the Secretary of State at column 1500 I asked him to define what the new clause meant, and he admitted that we would have to wait until the issue had been tested in the courts. We now know how the judges have interpreted it. The debate on secondary action at that time related to a judgment by the House of Lords in the Express Newspapers v. MacShane case, in which the House of Lords judgment stated clearly that secondary action under the 1974 Act was subjective and that, as long as the individual felt that he was acting in furtherance of a trade dispute that his members were involved in, there was no question of any action being taken against him. The All England Law Reports states:

"On the ordinary and natural meaning of s. 13(1) of the 1974 Act, an act was done 'in . . . furtherance of a trade dispute', and that the person doing that act was accordingly protected by s. 13 against an action for tort, if he honestly believed that the act might further the cause of those taking part in the dispute . . . the test of whether the act was done in furtherance of a trade dispute was a subjective one, and it was not necessary for the person doing the act to prove that it was reasonably capable of achieving his object. Since the evidence clearly established that the defendants honestly and reasonably believed that the action taken was fairly 'in . . . furtherance of a trade dispute', it followed (Lord Wilberforce, applying an objective test, concurring) that the appeal would be allowed and the injunctions discharged".

Because of that judgment, the Government thought that secondary action had to be defined. The Secretary of State said:

"The MacShane judgment appears to affirm that statute law gives to trade unions virtually unlimited authority to damage whomsoever they choose, as much as they choose, without fear of penalty, if, in their judgment — which no court may question — such action seems to be in their interests. In effect, the last as it now stands is a licence to spread industrial action far and wide beyond the original dispute, putting at risk the jobs and businesses of people who are in no way connected with it. No responsible Government could allow the law to remain in that state, and I would suggest that that view must also apply to the Opposition."

It is important to recognise the background to that debate. The Secretary of State was saying that, because of the House of Lords judgment two months before, the Act had been defined in a way that the Secretary of State in 1974 had never intended.

On Report, The Secretary of State confirmed our belief that the law was being interpreted quite differently from what was intended when he said:

"There is a deep-rooted trade union tradition of industrial action to prevent goods from being supplied to or from an employer in dispute. The Donovan commission acknowledged that, as did the Court of Appeal in developing the test of remoteness. The new clause recognises this tradition where secondary action is employed because the primary action is only partially effective. However, it withdraws immunity from secondary action if it is used only as a vehicle for spreading the disruptive effects of industrial action beyond those who are actively supplying goods to or receiving goods from the employer in dispute during the dispute.

The principle underlying the clause is that secondary action is justifiable only to the extent that it is used to put direct pressure on the employer in dispute." — [Official Report, 17 April 1980; Vol. 982, c. 1488-89.]

I submit that that is precisely what the trade unions at Wapping are intending to do and what the then Secretary of State implied was allowable under the new clause but which the courts have developed so that it is not allowed. Employees now find that their jobs are literally removed from under their noses and, because of the courts' interpretation of the 1980 Act, they have no claim or remedy against their employers.

If the Government had any honesty, they would restore to section 17 of the 1980 Act the meaning that it was thought to have when the Secretary of State put it through the House. The climate changed when the former Secretary of State for Employment was moved from office and passed to the vastness of Northern Ireland. We were then privileged to have the presence of the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) as the new Secretary of State.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Hear, hear.

Mr. Evans: The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire, (Mr. Forth) says "Hear, hear," and reveals the feeling on the Tory Benches for the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Member for Chingford and the Prime Minister have constantly urged employers, time after time, to use the Tory Acts to bring the employees to heel. No one can seriously question that statement, as on innumerable occasions and speeches both the Prime Minister and the right hon. Gentleman used those expressions.

The right hon. Member for Chingford introduced the Employment Act 1982. That was a really vicious Act clearly intended to further shackle the trade union movement and to promote the concept of non-unionism. The then Secretary of State for Employment boasted that the Act that he was putting on the statute book was meant to promote non-trade unionism. He introduced what became known as the "scabs' charter" in which anyone who could prove that a job had been lost because of pressure from a trade union could sue the employer and join the trade union in the action, which could result in payments in excess of £30,000 to the individual for loss of employment.

Tory Members should study what happened since the Employment Act 1982 went on the statute book. Notwithstanding the hysterical outpourings from the former Secretary of State, Tory Members would find that the number of cases that have gone to tribunal under the 1982 Act can be counted on the fingers of two hands. None of them have been awarded anything like the level of compensation that the former Secretary of State provided.

That Act also substantially narrowed the definitions of the trade dispute to closely defined industrial issues. It created a situation in which trade unions could be fined for the so-called unlawful acts of their officers to the extent that unions with membership in excess of 100,000 could be fined £250,000 for any acts that were defined as unlawful. The trade union movement is smarter than that and few cases have appeared before the courts.

However, the 1982 Act tried to create an uncertain climate. The former Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Chingford, was also the architect of the Trade Union Act 1984. The purpose of that Act was largely to restrict the political rights of trade unions and to attempt to bankrupt the Labour party.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): Does my hon. Friend recall, in relation to the 1982 Act, that sections 1 and 2 introduced retrospective payments from 1974 to 1981 for the free-riders working in closed shops who happened to lose their jobs? Professor Jennard from Strathclyde university went round the country trying to find 400 free-riders to pay out £2 million in retrospectve payments that had been set to one side for free-riders during that period.

Mr. Skinner: All trade unionists could do with some of that.

Mr. Evans: I am grateful for my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) for making that important point. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) rightly said, many in the trade union movement would expect similar acts of retrospection to ensure that those who were loyal to the trade union movement in days of struggle would be treated in the same way as the Tory party treated the free-loaders and blacklegs.

An interesting point about the Trade Union Act 1984 is that it has largely blown up in the face of the Tory party. The present situation is that of the unions with political funds, all 33 that have balloted their membership have returned yes votes with massive majorities in favour of keeping those funds. Only four unions await a result and it is confidently expected that during the next two weeks they will also declare a yes vote with huge majorities for the maintenance of their political funds. It is also interesting that the Act, which was intended as a blow to the trade union and Labour movement, has caused one union that previously did not have a political fund to ballot its members and subsequently to create one. It is confidently expected that many other unions that do not have political funds but are currently balloting their members will establish such funds. As some hon. Members pointed out at the time, that legislation will perform wonders in politicising the membership of the trade unions and I am pleased that that result is being achieved.

Dr. M. S. Miller (East Kilbride): I ask my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) not to leave this point too quickly. My hon. Friend should extend our thanks to the Government for making the situation clear, but he should also stress that the situation is not quite what the Government expected.

Mr. Evans: At the outset I said that the Trade Union Act 1984 was intended to break the political powers of the trade union movement and to bankrupt the Labour party. That Act has blown up in the Government's face because of the splendid work that has been done by the trade union movement and in particular by the trade union co-ordinating committee. That exercise has politicised trade unionists the length and breadth of the country and that can only be beneficial to us, particularly when we come to the next general election, as Tory Members are fond of quoting at length that almost one-third of trade unionists voted for them at the last election.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Hear hear. We would not be here now if they had not voted for us.

Mr. Evans: The trade unionists will not be voting for Tory Members at the next election. That is certain.

One of the reasons why trade unionists will not vote for the Tories at the next election is that the Prime Minister continues to threaten to introduce further anti-trade union legislation. The Government are seeking to deny workers the right to combine to protect themselves and promote their interests. The Government are doing that because they allege that that will improve the operation of the labour market and alter the balance of power in favour of the employers. Those are favourite quotes from Cabinet Ministers and in particular from the Prime Minister. In other words, the Government's policies are in favour of market forces that would dominate and rule our lives.

The Government have carried out many measures to promote market forces. They have privatised public enterprise and services. They have made massive cuts in public expenditure, capital expenditure, infrastructure projects, and in current expenditure, and such things as pensions and supplementary benefits. The Government have also made uncivilised attacks on the disadvantaged. One attack is going through the House at present in the form of the Social Security Bill.

Mr. Forth rose——

Mr. Evans: I shall give way shortly, but I want to finish my point.

Cuts in housing benefit will reduce the income of millions of people and no fewer than 500,000 people in this country will lose more than £5 a week. The severe weather payments are a national scandal and the Government's attacks on pensioners ad claimants have been a disgrace. We have also seen the diminishing of women's rights in employment. They have been denied the primary right of maternity benefit for which women fought for generations. This Government, led by the Prime Minister, have reduced those rights. The Wages Bill, which is currently in Committee, is attacking the young people in our society. Millions of youngsters will suffer as a result of that Act reaching the statute book and they will see their pittance of a weekly income substantially reduced.

If the Government had increased the youth training scheme allowance in line with inflation, it would now probably be £8 or £10 more than it is. There is not much point in having a one-year, two-year or even three-year scheme, if at the end of that period the youngsters are simply dumped back into the unemployment queues.

Mr. Forth: At the outset of the hon. Gentleman's catalogue of inaccuracies he claimed that public expenditure had been slashed, grossly reduced, or some such thing. Will he remind the House of the proportion of gross national product that was taken up by public expenditure in 1979 and contrast it with the proportion that is devoted to public expenditure this year? In other words, will he substantiate the claim that there has been a cut in public expenditure?

Mr. Evans: I shall deal with the hon. Gentleman's question immediately. The major reason for the Government's un-Christian attack on the under-privileged is the size of the unemployment bill, which is the product of massive unemployment. That bill is just short of £20 billion this year. Unemployment is the reason for the massive increase in public expenditure since 1979. Unemployment has trebled since 1979. If the hon. Gentleman cannot understand that, it is time that he took up some other profession.

Apart from those considerations, unemployment is a colossal and incredible waste of money and human resources. Virtually all the wealth that has been obtained from the North sea has been poured down the drain of mass unemployment. That is one of the greatest crimes that this Tory Government have committed against our society. Despite the Government's rhetoric about the wonders of the free market, unemployment continues to escalate. It appears to be never-ending, despite all the Government's claims and all the bleatings and pleadings that we hear from Conservative Members.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): And there are all the fiddles as well.

Mr. Evans: Indeed. There are now no fewer than 3·4 million benefit claimants, which is the euphemism that is used. However, that does not tell us how many are out of work. That is the fiddle that has continued for the past six years or so. As unemployment increases, so does the benefits bill, and that is why the Government have had to cut the value of the benefits that are paid to the unemployed. It is worth recalling the theft of the six month wage-related unemployment benefit, for which workers have paid. It cannot be regarded as a benefit that the Government provided and then withdrew. Workers paid for benefit through their national insurance contributions.

As all my hon. Friends are only too well aware, the Government fiddle continually with the unemployment figures. It was announced two weeks ago that about 60,000 unemployed would be taken off the register by a further judicious fiddling of the figures. I am pleased that the Minister for Employment has just entered the Chamber. I am pleased to welcome the chief fiddler to our debate.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): The second fiddle.

Mr. Evans: The Government decided to include those in the armed forces and the self-employed as being employed. That enabled the percentage of unemployed to be reduced at a stroke from 13·1 per cent. to 12·4 per cent. That is virtually unbelievable. I should like to know how many unemployed self-employed persons will be counted as being unemployed. If the employed self-employed are to be included in the employment total, presumably the Government will be prepared to include the self-employed unemployed in the unemployment total. It seems that the Minister for Employment does not understand the question.

Everyone in the House is only too well aware that the Government's policies over the past six years have created massive and almost uncontrollable unemployment in our society.

The Paymaster-General and Minister for Employment (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will give me a definition of the unemployed self-employed. When someone is unemployed and looking for work, how does he know whether he is an unemployed self-employed person or an unemployed employee? When we assess the percentage of unemployment, we need to compare the number of people who are working with the number who are not, who are receiving benefit and who are available for work. One side of the equation must be those who are at work, which plainly means those who are working for employers as well as those who are working for themselves and those who are engaged in the armed forces.

Mr. Evans: I am grateful to the Minister. I am sure that the right hon. and learned Gentleman and I will read with great interest the intervention that he has just made to try to ascertain what it means. I am sure that many of us will go to many parts of Britain in our effort to find out what is meant by the definition of unemployed self-employed. It seems that the Government have no difficulty in counting the employed self-employed in employment totals. That is a measure of the fiddle that the Government are operating and perpetrating on the British people.

There are so many ways in which the Government have contributed to increasing the level of unemployment, and it would be perverse of me to go through them all. I shall mention a decision of the Government in 1980 which allowed the pound to rise to £2·40 to the dollar, which had a devastating effect on wide stretches of British industry. They tried to cope while the pound stood at that level against the dollar and they found it impossible. The effect was devastating on so many British companies. Many of them went out of business because of that act of folly. Later on the value of sterling fell to £1·05 or £1·03 against the dollar and the Government did not intervene. That served to compound their incompetence and folly.

That is the main thrust of the argument of the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), who, in evidence which was quoted in The Guardian yesterday, called for an attack upon Treasury power. The article states:

"The creation of a powerful Cabinet committee to overcome the influence of the Treasury on industrial strategy was demanded last night by Mr. Michael Heseltine, the former Defence Secretary."

The right hon. Gentleman should know better than anyone about the powers of the Treasury. He is a former Secretary of State of two of the greatest spending Departments, the Ministry of Defence and the Department of the Environment. He is denouncing the Treasury in the most vigorous terms for being responsible for much of the decline of British industry. In describing the control that the Treasury has, he said:

"It is like in commercial terms allowing finance directors to run a company. The books will add up but there won't be many sales."

I could not think of a better description of the British economy that has been created by the Government's act of folly.

We have seen slashing attacks on public expenditure

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): The hon. Gentleman has said that when sterling was standing at £2·40 against the dollar many British companies went out of business. Might I inquire of him which companies suffered that fate? Can he name one? While he is reflecting on that, does he recall that General Motors' first investment in Britain came when the pound-dollar parity was £1 to slightly in excess of $4.

Mr. Evans: I have no doubt that during the next few days I shall be receiving quite a few letters that will answer the hon. Gentleman's question. I am sure that they will contain the names and addresses of many such firms, especially small firms, throughout the country. They will set out the many businesses that had to cease trading during the time when sterling stood at £2·40 against the dollar.

Mr. Holt: The hon. Gentleman cannot answer the question.

Mr. Evans: The reduction in public expenditure——

Mr. Holt: The hon. Gentleman cannot answer the question.

Mr. Evans: We have seen cuts in bus grants and the subsequent collapse of bus sales. Local authority housing allocations have been cut, with the result that the backlog of housing repairs stands at about £20 billion. There have been cuts in local authority road maintenance programes and the roads of Britain are falling to pieces. There have been cuts in the nationalised industries' programmes and enormous problems are building up for our society. The decision to cut public expenditure programmes has given a further twist to the unemployment spiral. Every decision not to intervene because of the doctrine of market forces has produced an additional twist to the spiral of unemployment. Unemployment continues to rise, and it will do so remorselessly. Employment Ministers wring their hands and make statement after statement about unemployment flattening out, hopeful signs, expected employment rises, levelling off and signs that next year will be better. There are statements of good intentions time after time, but nothing concrete is done to bring to an end the remorseless spiral of unemployment.

Once prosperous regions, cities and towns now suffer from mass unemployment. They have been reduced to such an extent that they now qualify for grants from the EEC's regional and social funds—that is, they would qualify for grants if there were money available for those grants.

More than 7,000 people are out of work in St. Helens, North, which was once one of our great and prosperous northern towns, and almost 50 per cent. of them have been out of work for more than 12 months. Skilled craftsmen over 45 who have given a lifetime of service to Britain ask me at my surgeries, "Will we ever get a job again?" I can only reply, "Not as long as the Conservative party is in office carrying out these policies."

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. David Trippier): The hon. Gentleman seems to suggest that, if the Labour party were elected to office, it would be relatively easy either to hold the increase in unemployment or to decrease it. Why did the Labour party manifestly fail to do that the last time it was in power, when unemployment went substantially beyond the 1 million point to which the hon. Gentleman wants us to return? When unemployment more than doubled he manifestly failed to do anything about it.

Mr. Evans: I hope that, on reflection, the hon. Gentleman will withdraw that statement. I did not say that the next Labour Government would find it easy. In fact, the next Labour Government will find it dreadfully difficult, given the nightmare that the Conservative Govnerment will leave behind them, to get people back to work.

Mr. Dickens: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Evans: I shall not give way.

Mr. Dickens: The hon. Gentleman is wise.

Mr. Evans: I give way.

Mr. Dickens: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me this opportunity. As we are talking about high levels of unemployment, will the hon. Gentleman tell the House what methods the Labour party would employ to reduce unemployment which have not been tried and tried again, and failed on every occasion? In every unemployment debate, we get the same old answers and solutions that have failed time and time again. We get no new ideas.

Mr. Evans: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not expect me to say that we shall launch a series of tea dancing classes — [Interruption.] Yes, it is cheap, because the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) makes cheap remarks. Under the last Labour Government, 500,000 more people were employed in 1979 than in 1974. There are now 2 million fewer people working than in 1979. If the Labour Government had used the same system of statistics as the Conservative Government are using, unemployment would have been less than 900,000 in 1979. That is the truth. The last Labour Government proved conclusively that a Government who were concerned and determined would create employment. Every hon. Member, including members of Centre Forward, the previous Tory Prime Minister and Lord Stockton, have made it clear on innumerable occasions that unemployment can be conquered——

Mr. Dickens: How?

Mr. Evans: By Government action. The Government are out of step with everyone. The chambers of commerce are calling for programmes to tackle unemployment. The CBI and trade associations, including those in the construction industry, are calling for a programme of public works to tackle unemployment. The Tory wets, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), the TUC and the Labour party—everyone, bar the Government — are attacking the Government and calling for a programme of public works.

In the interview the Prime Minister gave a fortnight ago for the CBI magazine, she wrung her hands and said that Governments can create only artificial jobs. I remind the Prime Minister and Tory Members that there is nothing artificial about the unemployment they have created. It is massive and dreadful.

The greatest employment right of all is the right to work. That right has been denied to more than 3 million of our citizens. The Government are responsible. They have taken away that right to work. The Prime Minister's political epitaph will be "The Prime Minister for Unemployment". The Government stand condemned. If Conservative Members are so anxious to know what a Labour Government would do, they should resign. Hold an election and we will show them what we will do.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): I begin by paying a small tribute to the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) for introducing this important subject, because it gives the House a useful opportunity to debate what is probably the cluster of the most central issues of concern to politicians. As it is Friday we can debate these matters at some leisure, in contrast to the more hectic mid-week.

Mr. Frank Cook: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, in complimenting my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helen's, North (Mr. Evans) on giving the House "a useful opportunity", he is effectively rebutting the specious and bogus point of order raised by the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth)?

Mr. Forman: I see no necessary contradiction between my suitably gallant remarks, which are in danger of becoming less gallant if the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) continues in that vein, and the wise observations of my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth).

That is the extent of the congratulations that I extend to the hon. Member for St. Helens, North. His long and almost hysterical motion seems to be almost entirely wrong. Conservative Members have asked him what a future Labour Government might be able to do. Has he considered this simple point? He supports a party which appears to be committed to massive increases in public spending — according to recent calculations it will be £24 billion extra in total. Will that expenditure be any more in the interests of genuine employment than it was the last time the Labour party went down this route between 1974 and 1976? As all hon. Members will recall, it ended sadly and ignominiously in recourse to the International Monetary Fund.

I do not believe that the Labour party's solutions are credible. I am sure that is one of the main reasons why the party is languishing as it is.

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): Obviously, Opposition spokesmen will say during today's debate that more should be spent on capital investment programmes. Does my hon. Friend agree that if that point is made it should be put in the context of capital investment in Britain last year, when it was at the record high level in real terms of £55 billion?

Mr. Forman: I accept the point that my hon. Friend has made so well. He underlines the fact that capital investment should be correctly and profitably made. The great bulk of that investment is in the private sector. Conservative Members make no apology for that. There is a role for both the public and the private sector to play in these matters. It is important for the House to realise that just because investment in the private sector has increased, it should not be derided. It is every bit as important as public sector investment, and it produces jobs.

I stress that in the past six or seven years the Government have not been, and are not now, anti-trade union. They are against the mindless and self-defeating militancy of a minority of trade unionists and their leaders who do not know what is in their own best interests, let alone the best interests of the country.

Mr. Dickens: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Forman: I should prefer to continue, if I may.

The Government legislation of 1980, 1982 and 1984 enhanced the power for ordinary trade union members. Those three stages, so far, of our trade union legislation have improved the balance between employers and employees and between trade union leaders and their members. I remind the Opposition, who may disagree with me, that opinion polls have consistently shown that the general public, including ordinary trade union members, have taken the view time and time again that trade unions in the past, especially in the 1970s, had too much power, not only for their own good, but for that of Britain. It was necessary and timely that the balance should be rectified.

The motion refers essentially to the central problem of unemployment, and it is to that that I want to address the brunt of my remarks. It needs to be pointed out, when the House is understandably concerned about unemployment, that on the other side of the equation—employment—we have seen some satisfactory progress since the depth of the recession. It is notable that, however one calculates these matters, the increase in employment, including some assessment for part-time equivalents, since March 1983, has been about 700,000 new jobs. I am sure that all Conservative Members share the deep concern about the unemployment which still exists in spite of the increase in employment. If there is one area——

Mr. Martin J. O'Neill (Clackmannan): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It was reported in the Daily Mail yesterday that a statement is to be announced this morning on the decision of the privatisation of Vickers. Is there any indication as to when——

Mr. Dickens: It is on the A[illegible]nciator.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Yes, there is to be a statement.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not ludicrous that a statement of this importance will be made to a nearly empty House on a Friday morning when many of those Members with a deep concern in the matter are not able to be here because they were not aware that the issue was to be raised today? Is it possible for you to use your good offices? We made representations to the Government through the usual channels. We asked them to defer this until next week so that all hon. Members with an interest could hear the statement and take part in the questioning, instead of which the Government have insisted on dragooning it through.

Mr. Dixon: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is a disgrace that a statement is to be made this morning about Vickers when there is an early-day motion on the Order Paper on this subject signed by 101 Tory Members, tabled by the hon. Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Franks), who will unfortunately not be in his seat after the next general election. However, he should be told of this sort of thing. Is it not the biggest rip-off of the lot when the Government have invested £200 million in——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not pursue that argument. He must raise a point of order with the Chair.

Mr. Dixon: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am trying to emphasise the importance of this statement. We gave £200 million being given to Trafalgar House, which is important to the 101 hon. Members——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must pursue the argument of whether it is in order for a statement to be made.

Mr. Skinner: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There is an additional point. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) has said, the statement is being made on a Friday, when many hon. Members are absent. He implied that some people could not get here—I believe that they ought to be here—but I also believe that the practice of statements being made on a Friday should be investigated by the appropriate authority. The Government wanted to get the Tory Members who have been involved in signing the motion, away from the House, in particular the hon. Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Franks), who has actively promoted the Trafalgar House scheme with the resultant loss of several thousand jobs in his own constituency. I have no doubt that he will have to pay for that at the next election. However, I believe that that is the reason why the Government have wangled it in this fashion today.

Mr. Gregor MacKenzie (Glasgow, Rutherglen): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am less than happy that any statement of consequence should be made on a Friday. I knew nothing of this statement until the point of order was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill). It was not on the board when I came in and it was not on the television Annunciator. It has obviously been the subject of some conflict between the Labour Front Bench and the Government Front Bench. When we came into the House this morning there was no notice on the customary place. The customary place, for the benefit of those who have not been Members for long, is on the entrance to the Members' Lobby. I think that it is appropriate that there should be a short comment made by the Leader of the House on a statement of this kind.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If it is on the same point of order, perhaps I can help the House. If the Government decide to make a statement on a Friday, that is a matter for them. They inform Mr. Speaker's Office. I understand that the Government want to make a statement at 11 o'clock.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This refers to the point of order that my hon. Friend the Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) raised initially rather than the one that has developed. I want to draw to your attention the fact that apparently yesterday's Daily Mail had details of a statement to be made in this House before hon. Members had heard it. I think that that is an abuse. It is an abuse that it appears in a newspaper before we have the statement and it is a serious abuse that it happens on a Friday when the hon. Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Franks) is not in his place to hear the statement.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am not surprised at this tactic being engaged in yet again. It seems to me a standard procedure for the Government to manipulate the procedures of the House in a manner designed to keep Labour Members particularly ignorant of their activities. I am concerned that the commercial undertaking which is identified with this Vickers proposal is Trafalgar House. I am concerned that there are familiar connections between that company and members of the Government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a matter for the Chair and the hon. Gentleman knows that.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am asking you to use your authority regarding this statement, because you are aware that the Opposition have continually complained about the Government making statements of great importance such as this on a Friday. I appreciate what you said earlier, that the Government have a right to be able to do this, but surely the Chair should be able to rule that the Government should at least give notice to the House when they intend to make a statement of this nature so that hon. Members interested in the statement can participate. How can hon. Members who have returned to their constituency to deal with interests there be here to question the Minister making the statement today? Surely, it should be the right of the Chair to determine whether the Government have given hon. Members the opportunity to be here to participate today? I am asking you to rule on that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows that statements are often made on Fridays. I am not able to instruct the Government whether they should make a statement.

Mr. Dickens: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not right that when a statement is ready to be given to the House that statement should be made at the earliest opportunity because, obviously, it will contain news. It is not necessarily just for those hon. Members who happen to be present at the time. It is also fully printed in Hansard and helps to avoid that which the Opposition have criticised in points of order, that is leaks. I feel that it is sensible to let us all know at the earliest opportunity. If a few hon. Members are missing, that is neither here nor there—it is just unfortunate.

Mr. O'Neill: Further to the original point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The point has to be made that when we have a debate on a Friday morning we come to the House to discuss one issue. Something has come to our attention in a newspaper, which many of us may not read regularly —the Daily Mail. Perhaps we ought to read it more often. There are procedures, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Rutherglen (Mr. MacKenzie) said, for letting us know about statements. A statement of this magnitude should have been announced in advance and should not have been announced on the annuciator at the time that it was. The House had been sitting for an hour before the announcement was made. It would have been for the convenience of hon. Members for the announcement to be on the board at 9 o'clock. It is a discourtesy to the House and I believe that it is the responsibility of the Chair to ensure that our interests are protected in these matters.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think that Mr. Speaker has indicated that it is a great advantage to the House to have as much notice as possible when a statement is to be made. The point that has been raised is a matter for the Government. It is not a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. McWilliam: On a different point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will agree that the decision whether to accept a statement is entirely a matter for the Chair, not for anybody else, and that that is where the decision rests. Therefore, the issue is whether or not you accept the statement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am advised, and I was fairly sure of my ground when I said this, that if the Government advise Mr. Speaker of the intention to make such a statement, Mr. Speaker cannot reject it.

Mr. Forman: It is just possible that this is act two of a three-act speech. The central aspect of the unemployment problem, to which the House should pay the greatest attention, is long-term unemployment. Many Conservative Members wish that the Government would do even more in the Budget and on all other available occasions to tackle the problem. It can be approached in a number of ways.

Clearly the community programme has already been a great success. It needs to be extended at the most rapid sensible rate. Clearly the enterprise allowance scheme has also been a great success, and it would be a good idea to relax some of the terms and conditions of this excellent scheme to make it possible to expand it further. Clearly the job start experiment, which has so far been introduced only on a pilot basis, should be extended further, because once again it establishes the principle and cost-effectiveness of a measure of subsidy for employment. The Employment Select Committee, in its interesting recent report, gave added weight to the arguments to extend those measures further.

The motion also refers to the problems of management. I hold no brief for the recent actions of Mr. Rupert Murdoch. However, it has been well said that those who have gone on strike in that part of the printing industry have effectively dismissed themselves. That is sad. In many cases when employees go on strike they confidently believe that their employer will wish to re-employ them because it is not thought to be in the employer's interests that they remain on strike. In this case, because of Mr. Murdoch's plans and dispositions, their action effectively amounted to their own dismissal. That is a tragedy, and it does not appeal to me any more than it does to Opposition Members.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): Labour Members will have some sympathy for the hon. Gentleman's remarks, but is he aware that many of those workers were not involved in the dispute but were dismissed by Murdoch as a total action? What is the hon. Gentleman's position towards those workers?

Mr. Forman: The story is complicated, and I fully confess that I have not followed the details as closely as has the hon. Gentleman. Nevertheless, this seems to have more of the stuff of an industrial tragedy than anything else. Even at this late stage I wish that a move towards a more sensible resolution could be made. Clearly there is a problem, in that there is not a great deal of alternative employment for workers in the traditional skilled trades in our inner-city areas. That links up with what I shall say later about adult training and re-training.

It is unfortunate that for a long period the behaviour of certain elements in the printing industry has been almost a byword for restrictive practices. Those restrictive practices could not have continued for as long as they did without the connivance of weak and, and in many cases, incompetent management. Newspaper proprietors and managers of earlier times have a great deal to answer for in that respect. They allowed trade unions to control the hiring and firing procedures almost entirely, they allowed manning levels on existing machines to be determined by the unions rather than by themselves, and they effectively gave the unions a veto over the introduction of new technology which, as the House will know, stood idle for many years before it could be brought into production. That has more the element of tragedy than anything else. As so often in our long and distinguished history, we bring many problems on ourselves.

Mr. Frank Cook: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Forman: I should prefer to continue, as many hon. Members wish to speak.

I agree with the motion that we need a climate of economic expansion in the interests of employment and, equally, an atmosphere of industrial co-operation if we are to succeed, proper and provide new jobs, which both sides of the House wish to see. The Government, through their macro-economic policies, have produced precisely that climate of expansion and done better than many of their predecessors. I remind the House, if it needs reminding, that we are now in the fifth year of a satisfactory rate of economic growth. Manufacturing productivity is improving at a faster rate than in France or Germany, albeit from a low base, and new jobs are being created, especially for women and part-time workers, and, I am glad to say that in the more successful parts of the private sector, also for full-time male workers.

Obviously, we wish to encourage as much industrial co-operation as possible in all parts of industry and commerce. The best of British management already manages to bring that about, but we must look for ways to bring the standards of the average management up to those of the best. That implies the need for further measures, possibly in the Budget, to encourage employee participation through wider share ownership for the general public, and especially for employees. The way ahead has beeen signposted to some extent by firms such as Baxi Partnership, the National Freight Consortium and the John Lewis Partnership, all of which involved their workers much more fully, partly through this mechanism. We should seek to find every sensible way to make progress towards what Professor Martin Weitzmann has called the "share economy". Sensible progress towards more revenue sharing would be preferable to the rather self-defeating pay scrambles of the past, and to the insistence on some of the traditional restrictive practices, which have damaged our competitive position.

The most serious emerging employment problem is not the legislative problem, to which the hon. Member for St Helens, North drew our attention, so much as the inherent conflict between insiders and outsiders within the employment market. That is a serious problem, and there are all the signs that the interests of the so-called outsiders —the part-timers, the self-employed and people working on a consultancy basis — are growing and improving. We welcome that, because it is partly responsible for the growth in employment. However, the interests of traditional insiders, particularly those who lose their jobs — those who were originally in male full-time paid employment—are not so attractive, especially with the decline of manufacturing industry.

In British industry and commerce, those who are secure insiders and who take steps to hold on to their jobs and to increase their pay, as can be seen from the figures for average earnings, do so at the expense of those who are insecurely outsiders and who would like to get in. I am not sure whether we can solve the problem easily or quickly, but the thrust of Government policy to deal with the problems of unemployment must now be dkirected principally at the sector of the unemployed who have not recently received sufficient attention—the middle-aged male family man who would like a full-time job and probably had one in, for example, manufacturing industry before he became redundant, and who wishes and needs to return to paid full-time employment to support his family.

The classic model of the nuclear family of the husband in full-time work, a wife not working, except to look after the children—I do not wish to take on the feminist lobby, because I know of the work involved in being a housewife — and two children, is now more of a myth than a reality. It accounts for only about 18 per cent. of all families. We must direct our attention to the people in that category who seek to return to full-time employment, and who are finding it difficult to do so. In the interim, their income needs support and they need our understanding.

There are several ways in which that group could be helped. An obvious way — I pay tribute to the Government for their recent action on this — is to continue to maintain the real value of child benefit. Until family credit is introduced in the spring of 1988, child benefit will be an important part of Government assistance for less well-off working families. Secondly, we must give priority in the Manpower Services Commission's strategy and in all the training programmes to the needs of adult training and retraining. We are helping too few people in this respect — only 250,000 — and I hope that the Government will give every possible support, financially and in other ways, to such training schemes. Thirdly, I stress that we have examples of successful programmes which are up and running. They include the community programme, the enterprise allowance and the job start scheme. I hope that Ministers will put their full weight behind those schemes so that, in the Budget, those measures can be carried forward.

The underlying factor in the interests of employment is that we must sustain a high level of economic growth, as the Government have done, and reduce inflation even further, as the Government are committed to do. If those two conditions are fulfilled, the private sector — to which my hon. Friend the Minister referred in the context of capital spending — will do the lion's share of the work. That is the way in which a healthy economy works and the way in which jobs have been created successfully in our partner and competitor countries.

If my hon. Friend the Minister wished to refresh his memory of ways in which we could complete our agenda of measures to deal with unemployment, I suggest humbly that he could do worse than re-read the checklist on the front page of the pamphlet "Work to be Done", published by my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) and myself, in which he will find several measures to which the Government have not directed their attention, but which could usefully be pressed on his colleagues in the Treasury.

I commend what the Government have done so far, but I urge them to do more, especially to deal with the No. 1 problem of long-term unemployment. They must focus their efforts principally on the needs of the adult unemployed, having satisfactorily dealt with youth unemployment through the youth training scheme. We must find ways of helping the middle-aged unemployed to return to gainful employment.

10.52 am

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): I shall comment on several of the matters mentioned by the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman), especially on his remarks and others made during the debate about what is happening at Wapping. We must try to find a solution to that serious industrial dispute. I understand how eagerly the hon. Gentleman had to search to find matters on which to congratulate the Government. He congratulated them on maintaining child benefit, but I know that he, other Conservative Members and all Opposition Members have urged the full maintenance of child benefit. No one knows better than the hon. Gentleman that, were the Government to do that, they would have had to increase child benefit by considerably more than they announced a few days ago. I am glad to support his demand that we should rectify the matter, perhaps in this Budget, and sustain child benefit at its proper level.

I shall comment later on the speech made by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment in reply to Monday's Adjournment debate on Wapping. It was a deplorable speech.

The motion lists many different forms of action that must be taken by the Department of Employment, in which I have a special interest. I must clarify some of the misconceptions that have been spread, not necessarily by the Under-Secretary of State—he is young to the game—but by some of his Conservative predecessors at the Department, who have tried to spread strange tales about what it achieved during the Labour Government.

The main work of the Department falls into four categories, all of which must operate successfully to obtain a decent employment policy. First, the Manpower Services Commission was set up a little before we came into office in 1974, but all the substantial expansion and financing of the MSC, and the special role that it was asked to play in the training programme, which remains of such great importance, was the work of the 1974 Labour Government. Some Ministers have said, absurdly, that we were not interested in training programmes, but we spent greatly increased sums on training. We allowed the Manpower Services Commission to go full speed ahead with the work, and we wanted to graft the new training programmes on to the programmes that preceded them.

Unfortunately, the Conservative Government inflicted serious injury on many training and apprenticeship schemes. Their conversion to a better training policy arrived belatedly. If the Minister looks back at what we did on training, he will know how puerile is the tale that our approach was not ambitious and intelligent.

The Labour Government established the Health and Safety Commission and, therefore, extended safety provision to about 5 million people who had not had it previously. That aspect of the Department's work is increasingly important, especially since the development of the chemical and nuclear industries. I vividly remember the enthusiasm of the chief inspector of factories for the establishment of the commission. I am glad that even this Government have not dared to destroy it, although its effectiveness has been considerably impaired by the shortage of inspectors and the Government's failure to recognise what could be achieved by an imaginative programme for extending health and safety provisions into many other areas.

My hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) mentioned what the Government have done, through a series of measures, to curb employment rights or remove them altogether. It is especially offensive that people who have never had to worry about their salaries should wish to cut the salaries of many youngsters and others. It is also offensive that, after so much effort was made to extend employment rights to women and to set up a programme by which that could be carried forward, during their six years in office the Government have been searching for ways to curb the extension of rights. We must ensure that we carry forward the work that was initiated during the years for which the Labour Government is sometimes attacked.

The Labour Government also established the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service. That has a direct bearing on the Wapping dispute and on how we might find a way out of it. Neither side of industry could accuse ACAS of being non-independent. It was established for that purpose, and great credit is due to its two main directors during its life, Jim Mortimer and his successor, both of whom carried out their tasks excellently. One advantage that the Government possess is that they could use ACAS in this dispute and in others much more effectively than they have. I urge them to do so.

Some Conservative Members—the worst offender is the chairman of the Conservative party, who had a brief and disastrous spell at the Department of Employment—try to say that the Labour Government did not contribute to industrial relations. However, we established the main independent body on which any sensible development of industrial relations must now depend. I hope, therefore, that the Government will pay particular attention to the constructive proposals that I shall be making later in my speech about the way in which we should seek an honourable and decent escape from the terrible dispute in Wapping. More than 5,000 people have had their jobs taken from them in the most shameful and shocking manner and it is the duty of the House of Commons to try to find a way out.

I see that the Minister for Trade is getting ready to speak. I thought for a moment that he had come to speak on behalf of his old Department, the Department of Employment, but I gather that he has risen on the stepping stones of his dead self to higher things at the Department of Trade and Industry—or perhaps he has descended to nether regions altogether. If I, like the Minister for Trade, had had a good job at the Department of Employment and was doing it fairly decently, I should not have gone off to join those racketeers.

It being Eleven o'clock, MR. SPEAKER interrupted the proceedings, pursuant to Standing Order No. 5 (Friday sittings).

International Tin Council

11 am

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make a statement on the breakdown of the negotiations with the International Tin Council and the attempt to resolve the debts of that council.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Alan Clark): The Government regret that the protracted negotiations between the International Tin Council and its bank and broker creditors have now broken down without reaching agreement to resolve the tin crisis.

We have constantly made it clear, following suspension by the ITC of its operations in the tin market on 24 October last with gross commitments exceeding £800 million, that the United Kingdom was prepared to accept its share of the liabilities of the ITC, and we called on all other members to do likewise.

It is especially unfortunate that the breakdown of negotiations has come at a time when substantial progress had been made towards resolving the tin crisis in an orderly fashion. Had the ITC member countries collectively shown a greater sense of urgency and responsibility from the outset, a solution might have been found. Discussions between members of the European Community were protracted, and formal negotiations by the ITC began only at the end of January. However, the final breakdown of negotiations was caused by the refusal of some producer countries to accept the proposals.

At this late stage, it seems unlikely that a settlement can now be reached in order to secure a return to orderly trading in tin. If a substantial number of other ITC countries were prepared to make a new effort to resolve the crisis, the Government would of course be willing to join such discussions. But it must be clear, as it has been throughout the earlier discussions and negotiations, that the United Kingdom Government are not prepared alone to take over the responsibility for the ITC's debts.

The Government deplore the failure of certain other Governments to agree to meet their share of the commitments of the ITC. That failure undermines good faith and integrity in international financial dealings.

Mr. Harris: First, I pay tribute to the Government for the lead that they have taken in trying to achieve a resolution of this complex international problem and for their willingness to put up £50 million as their part of a bid to achieve a solution. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is a real tragedy that the negotiations have broken down after having got so far, and that the ramifications of that failure of negotiations are truly enormous, making the Westland affair look like a minor financial incident?

Does my hon. Friend agree that there are enormous implications for the whole future of London as a commodity trading centre, major implications for the Third world and—this is my particular preoccupation—extremely worrying implications for the Cornish tin industry? May I press my hon. Friend the Minister and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to act with real urgency over the problems of the Cornish tin industry? May I impress upon my hon. Friend that, through no fault of its own, the Geevor tin mine in my constituency is really at risk now that the talks have broken down? Will the Government respond urgently to the request for special temporary assistance to enable the Cornish tin industry, and Geevor in particular, to survive?

Mr. Clark: I am obliged to my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) for the tribute that he paid to the Government's efforts to solve the crisis or to prevent it reaching its present dimension. The United Kingdom has played a leading part throughout in attempting to achieve a solution and in offering contributions greatly in excess of the 4 per cent. that we are bound under the agreement to contribute to costs.

I agree with my hon. Friend that at this early stage the implications, both in global terms and in the effect on the City, have yet to be seen in their entirety. I know that my hon. Friend has a particular constituency interest, and the whole House will applaud his efforts to draw our attention to the plight of his constituents. The Government are very much aware of that aspect, but we feel that it would not be appropriate to take action until the market has at any rate stabilised, so that we can see what the prospects for commercial trading in tin and the economics of mining it are likely to be. Once the market has stabilised and we see what the commercial prospects are, we would of course be willing to consider applications for grant towards the cost of capital investment. Those grants will be made in the light of the market conditions prevailing at the time.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I am grateful to the Minister for coming here and giving us a fairly interesting historical analysis of the situation leading up to today's statement, but he has said nothing about where we go from here. He has put forward no positive proposals. The negotiations have been running into trouble for more than four months, and collapse must have been a strong possibility throughout. What are the Government's contingency plans? Is the Minister seriously telling us that, having been aware for four months of the crisis that was liable to occur, the Government have not one positive proposal to make, apart from the suggestion that they might give some grant if someone is silly enough to invest in tin mines which will have no market for their product?

The Minister seems unaware that the price of tin is likely to collapse as 16 banks begin to offload 45,000 tonnes of tin on to the market. What does he think that that will do to the 13 brokers who are at risk for up to £550 million? Many of those brokers also deal in other commodities, so there may be repercussions way beyond the tin market, putting at risk the survival of the whole London metal exchange. The Minister seems completely unaware of all that or of the fact that there is about to be chaos in the world tin market.

What plans does the Minister have to help the Cornish tin workers, for whom his hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) has pleaded, if the price of tin collapses below the level at which it is viable to produce it, for example, at Geevor? Does the Minister appreciate that if he has no plans to help, this could mean the end of tin production in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Clark: In answer to my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives I stated the Government's position in relation to the Geevor tin mine and tin production in Cornwall. We view the situation with great concern, we are watching it very closely, and at the appropriate moment we shall judge the level at which grants should be made for investment.

The right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) fell somewhat short of his objective in accusing the Government of failing to intervene on a greater scale to prevent chaos in the City. I am not sure what the right hon. Gentleman was recommending. We have already taken the lead in the efforts to solve the crisis. Our offer of a contribution to finance the agreement was extremely generous, both in absolute terms and in relation to our treaty obligations. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will enlighten the House on whether he is really suggesting that yet more taxpayers' money should be thrown into an extremely uncertain and difficult situation. He mentioned the difficulties that will face certain brokers. Is he suggesting that they should be individually bailed out by the Government?

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Does my hon. Friend accept that the United Kingdom was the only member of the International Tin Council prepared to stand behind its legal obligations? Is it not deplorable that other members, including members of the EEC, and in particular, West Germany, have refused to do so? What possible future can there be for international trade agreements if member states refuse to stand behind their legal obligations?

Mr. Clark: My hon. Friend's view is uncomfortable, but valid. At every stage the United Kingdom has done its best to bring about a solution to the crisis. It is regrettable that delays, indecisions, and a certain optimism—I am not the best person to judge that—prevented any of our Community partners or other countries from coming forward with positive suggestions. As to the future, it may be possible to reach agreement and for all the parties to mount a salvage operation, but at the moment the prospects look exceedingly bleak.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Is the Minister's statement not a deeply irresponsible and shocking abdication of Government responsibility which will be noted with appalled reactions throughout the City? Last night why did the Minister not respond positively to the proposal by Mr. Jacques Lyon that the Government should take a lead in the rescue plan and not simply rail against other countries for their failure to take a lead?

Does the hon. Gentleman have any understanding of the consequences, not only for the City but for the banking system, of the collapse of the London metal exchange, which is at risk because of the Government's supine response to the crisis? Has the Minister nothing more to say to the 1,500 workers in the tin industry, and will he examine proposals for investment in the industry?

Mr. Clark: I am amazed at the hon. Gentleman. He knows the lead that the United Kingdom has adopted throughout. He has heard from both sides of the House how we received almost no support from the other partners to the agreement. He has heard the size of the sum—£50 million—which the United Kingdom has put on the table.

Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that we should have increased the sum, and not put it into the founding of a new tin council, which would take over the obligations, but paid it directly to the City? What is the hon. Gentleman suggesting? It would be wrong and irresponsible to increase the sum and to use taxpayers' money for direct grants—if that is what the hon. Gentleman is suggesting —to those who are in difficulties in the City of London.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Is my hon. Friend aware that the International Tin Research Institute is in my constituency? Is he aware also that I hope he will continue to attempt to drag European and other Governments, kicking and screaming, towards an agreement on tin? Does he agree that without that agreement container commodities for food and drinks, including bottles, will not have the strength or unbreakability which is needed? Tin is essential.

Mr. Clark: My hon. Friend is right. The prospects are bleak. I do not know about dragging Governments kicking and screaming, but if there is a general perception of the gravity of the problem, the original possibilities remain. It has proved so difficult to achieve unanimity that the possibility of finding a solution is not promising.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Minister aware that if he started by being concerned, not about speculators in the City but about the more than 1,000 workers engaged in the tin mining industry, and if he was prepared to strip himself of the dogma, he might be able to find a solution? Tin is a non-perishable commodity. If the Government want to keep the tin industry and to keep the tin miners and others in jobs, the Minister would take the stance that he took in October 1984 with another valuable commodity —gold. At that time the Government were not much bothered about market forces or uneconomic units of production and decided to save Johnson Matthey Bankers by nationalisation. The same process could be developed in the tin industry.

A previous Government took a similar attitude when Rolls-Royce got into an almighty mess. People felt that something should be done, so it was taken over. If the Government seriously want to look after the jobs of the tin workers and ensure a continuing tin industry, they would dismiss questions about the London metal exchange and get on with the job of saving the tin mines in Cornwall.

In the absence of the Liberals, who do not seem to be interested, will the Minister take the questions on board and do what was done with JMB and so save the jobs and the industry?

Mr. Clark: I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman could hardly let his chagrin fail to show. We are not bailing out the London metal exchange, although I am sure that that would be the solution that the hon. Gentleman would have predicted.

Mr. Skinner: I did not say that.

Mr. Clark: I can understand the hon. Gentleman's chagrin at the fact that we are not running true to the stereotype that he describes. I have already explained the measures that we envisage taking to help the plight of the Cornish tin miners. The miners' problem is different in quality from that of others who are in difficulties because of the situation. The hon. Gentleman is so ready— understandably — to condemn certain aspects of the Common Market and the CAP and the accumulation of mountains, and I was interested to hear that his solution is the accumulation of a giant mountain of tin.

Sir Antony Buck (Colchester, North): Is my hon. Friend aware that I sympathise with him in having to deal with a difficult problem? Will he comment further on the attitude of our allies, because it seems that they, and West Germany in particular, have not fulfilled their obligations?

Mr. Clark: The House can reach its own conclusions and read the press, but I do not want to pick a fight with any of our Community partners or with any of the other countries involved. The facts speak for themselves. The failure to achieve harmony, a united attitude, or a level of contributions is at the root of the mishap.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Has the Minister tried to solicit American involvement as a means of rescuing the industry, or are Americans who invest in this country interested only in cleaning up profits and milking the economy?

Mr. Clark: I understand that America is not a member of the International Tin Council.

Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Ltd

11.18 am

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Paul Channon): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement.

I have today given my consent to the sale of Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Limited to the VSEL Employee Consortium plc. Its offer consists of a downpayment of £69 million, together with a profit-sharing arrangement for the period 1986 to1992, which could provide British Shipbuilders with further payments of up to £40 million in 1992 and 1993. The consortium has undertaken to complete and fund the remainder of the work on the submarine facilities project, which will modernise the production facilities at VSEL and enable the company to complete the Trident submarine programme in accordance with the Ministry of Defence's requirements.

As far as the Trident submarine programme is concerned, the consortium on Wednesday gave the Ministry of Defence an undertaking that it would negotiate a contract for the first Trident submarine on terms, price, programme and conditions which represent a significant improvement to the Ministry of Defence on the terms previously offered by VSEL while it remained under the control of British Shipbuilders.

The House will be aware that the consortium's bid was not the only one for VSEL. The commercial terms of the other bid were judged by British Shipbuilders and its financial advisers, in so far as they affected British Shipbuilders, to be superior to those of the consortium's bid. But there is a further term in the other bid, which I am bound not to disclose without the bidder's permission, which I found very difficult to accept. British Shipbuilders, moreover, acknowledged that other interests beyond the remit of British Shipbuilders to consider are involved in the sale. I agree with this. I have therefore decided that the consortium's bid is to be preferred. I wish the consortium well.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I strongly object to the right hon. Gentleman's grave discourtesy. He was aware that the Opposition had asked that the statement should be deferred until Monday, and not only did the Government persist in going ahead with it today, but they ensured that I received a copy of the statement only at 10.53 — seven minutes before the House was due to break into the morning business. As the Government were able yesterday to indicate to The London Standard that they planned to make some form of statement today, how on earth can the Secretary of State justify the discourtesy to the Opposition?

I also object to this furtive device of slipping such an important announcement through on a Friday. It is not only that it has taken up rare private Members' time—though that is an important consideration for hon. Members. It has also denied many hon. Members with a deep interest in this major policy decision a chance to ask questions on this important statement. Why was the matter so urgent that the statement had to be made this morning?

Does not the whole saga reveal the tensions and disagreements that exist between the Ministry of Defence and the Department of Trade and Industry? Have we not clearly heard over the last two weeks the squelch of firm government? First, we had the extended deadline; then, within hours, the extension was cancelled; then the Government were to take the bids without first settling the contract for Trident; then, after Tuesday's deadline, according to The Guardian, the Government demanded theoretical terms for the Trident contract. I note from the statement that there are still no firm terms. When can we expect them to be finally negotiated?

How realistic was it to expect either of the parties to end months of haggling within a couple of days and give the Secretary of State a firm price? If, as The Guardian says and as the right hon. Gentleman's statement reveals, the terms in relation to Trident are purely theoretical and are only an indication of good will, how was the Secretary of State able to decide between the merits of the two bids? How was he able to decide whether the valuation was soundly based? What was the basis on which he eventually decided? I note that the right hon. Gentleman said that there is an element of confidentiality, but the House is entitled to more information about what led him to choose the bid which he says was the less commercial. Is it true, as has been suggested, that Trafalgar House was allowed to submit its bid after the deadline?

Hon. Members will want to know what assurances are given in the bid that has been accepted about the future of Cammell Laird and about the security of employment of those who will be affected by the decision. Is it not the ultimate absurdity that the Government are selling into private hands our only yard which is capable of producing nuclear submarines? Is it not an abuse of public funds to do that after £200 million of public money has been invested in the yard?

Mr. Channon: I am a little surprised at the terms of the right hon. Gentleman's question. The last thing that I expected to be told this morning was that our decision was an abuse of public funds. However, I apologise to the right hon. Gentleman and to the House for the fact that the statement has to be made this morning. I know that that is inconvenient——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The right hon. Gentleman is hardly ever here.

Mr. Channon: I am occasionally here. The House surely understands that once I had come to a decision it would have been quite wrong for me not to disclose it to the House at the earliest opportunity. To do otherwise would be a very serious mistake. I am sorry if the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues have been inconvenienced, but I fear that there was no alternative.

I cannot accept what the right hon. Gentleman says about disagreements between my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and myself. We have worked in complete harmony. I made clear in my statement the reasons why we have come to this decision, which I am sure will be welcomed by some Members.

Mr. Cecil Franks (Barrow and Furness): On behalf of the management, employees, local communities and the whole of the north-west, may I express deep gratitude and pleasure at my right hon. Friend's announcement? I am sure he will agree with me that the decision ably and amply demonstrates the Government's confidence in the north-west and their firm commitment to the principle of wider share ownership, with the opportunity for employees to share in the fruits of their labour. I assure my right hon. Friend that the premier submarine builder of the nation can look forward with great confidence to the 21st century and continue to serve the nation as it has for the past century.

Mr. Channon: I am very grateful to my hon. Friend for his support.

Mr. Gregor MacKenzie (Glasgow, Rutherglen): During the discussions that the Secretary of State and his colleagues had leading up to the statement, was there any discussion about the apportionment of the submarine programme? The right hon. Gentleman will be conscious of the fact that we on Clydeside felt that we got a shabby deal on that matter, and, on behalf of my colleagues in the west of Scotland, I should like to know whether there is to be a reapportionment of the substantial submarine programme and whether we on Clydeside are to get a share of it.

Mr. Channon: With respect to the right hon. Gentleman, that question raises different issues from those with which I am dealing. However, I am told by my hon. Friend the Minister of State that the answer to his question is no.

Sir Antony Buck (Colchester, North): Is my right hon. friend aware that his statement will be widely welcomed on the Government Benches, particularly as he was courteous enough to apologise to the House for making a statement on a Friday, which, as a general rule, is inconvenient? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that his solution provides the best chances of the Royal Navy getting its ships and submarines on time and on cost?

Mr. Channon: I am sure that this provides a very good assurance for that to happen.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I thank the Secretary of State for his statement and express the relief that will be felt in Cammell Laird this morning about the decision that he has made. Before the right hon. Gentleman finally ties up the deal, will he see Wirral Members, so that we can ensure that Cammell Laird is effectively represented on the board that will run the new company?

Mr. Channon: I am extremely grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support. I note the views in the latter part of his question. I am not sure that that is a matter for me, but I shall certainly study what he has said. I am, of course, always available to see hon. Members who wish to see me.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North East): I join my hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Franks) in congratulating the Government on deciding to privatise the yard. I am sure that all hon. Members from the north-west will join me in congratulating the Government on taking such an important decision for the largest engineering complex in the country and on their commitment to wider share ownership. I am sure that the committed work force led by Sir David Nicolson and Rodney Leach, will be successful in world markets as well as in satisfying all the requirements for defence in this country.

Mr. Channon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): Will the Secretary of State accept that his statement is not acceptable because it is incomplete without the clause which he seems to suggest is commercially in confidence? Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us what was worrying him about that aspect, because I am sure that we would all like to know? Will the right hon. Gentleman also tell the House how many jobs he expects to remain in British shipbuilding after the management buy-out?

Mr. Channon: No, Sir. I made it clear in my statement to the House that I am bound not to disclose the terms of the other bid without the permission of the bidders. Therefore, I have nothing to add to what I said earlier. As to the second part of the right hon. Gentleman's question, that is a matter for the consortium.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Southampton, Itchen): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the wise counsels that have prevailed in this instance. May I ask him to confirm that 38 per cent. of the work force confirmed, when asked the question, that their principal reason for being in favour of the management buy-out and privatisation was that it would give them an incentive to work harder? Is my right hon. Friend also able to say whether the terms on which this agreement has been negotiated will not be such as to mean that Vosper Thornycroft will be unfairly hindered in its efforts to compete freely and openly in bids for merchant and Royal Navy ships?

Mr. Channon: I am sure that it can compete, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support. I note what he said in the earlier part of his supplementary question.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): As a Member of Parliament whose constituency has for many years enjoyed a close relationship with Vickers through it subcontracting work, may I say that, of the options before the Minister, it appears that he has chosen the better one? However, it would be helpful if he could say more than he has done in answer to the questions that were put to him by the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams). Is he able to say whether the arrangement includes the initial proposal that shares in the consortium should be offered for purchase by members of the local communities surrounding the shipyard?

Mr. Channon: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support. I understand that the answer to the latter part of his supplementary question is yes.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his decision is likely to be widely welcomed in the defence establishment as sound and sensible? Will he comment on his discussions with the two bidders about the theoretical cancellation of the Trident programme in the event of a Labour Government being returned to power at the next general election, and say what guarantees, if any, were given to the two bidders about that possibility?

Mr. Channon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what he said in the first part of his supplementary question. However, any discussions with the bidders must remain confidential.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Will my right hon. Friend accept that this is an excellent example of a policy which is of the greatest benefit to taxpayers, employees and all those involved with the industry? Does he agree that there is nothing to be feared from the provision of vital defence supplies by the private sector, as this has been done very successfully in the United States for many decades?

Mr. Channon: I note what my hon. Friend said, and I am grateful to him.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): Obviously we welcome the fact that the Secretary of State has accepted this bid rather than the Trafalgar House bid. However, does he realise that what he has said today sounds the death knell for British Shipbuilders? By selling off its profitable warship yards the Secretary of State has virtually killed off British Shipbuilders. When Mr. Day goes to British Leyland, we must hope that he will not have the same effect upon our car industry as he has had upon our British shipbuilding industry.

Mr. Channon: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, I think that uncharacteristically he is being a little unfair.

Employment Rights

Question again proposed.

11.34 am

Mr. Foot: I should like to return to the topic with which I was dealing when I was so rudely interrupted by at least one Government botch, if not two Government botches, although I suppose that on the second count we must give the Government the benefit of the doubt, even though there are some difficulties there.

I said that I wanted to refer to the Wapping dispute. I say that all the more in the light of the reply, or the non-reply, that the Under-Secretary gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North East (Mr. Leighton) on Monday night. To all of the questions that were put to him by my hon. Friend about the Government's view on any of these matters and what they would do about them, the Minister gave no reply. He turned aside to other aspects of the matter.

This is a most serious dispute. It is serious for those individuals who have been sacked. From 5,000 to 6,000 people have lost their jobs without compensation, redundancy, or even any dole at the moment. It is a serious crisis for them. If this kind of industrial operation were to be repeated or tolerated by the Government of the day, the consequences for British industrial relations would be very serious indeed.

I have been interested in the printing trade for many years. Indeed, if I have any interest to declare in the matter, it is that I have been a member of the National Union of Journalists for 50 years or so. The NUJ has a deep interest in this dispute because its members have been profoundly divided by what has occurred. I shall try to keep my language as temperate as possible, because I am seeking, on behalf of those who have been so gravely injured—the members of SOGAT '82, the NUJ and others—a solution to the problem and I want the Government's assistance in achieving that aim.

To illustrate what happened, I shall quote from an article that was printed in The Times a week or so after the move to Wapping. This article was written by Mr. Longley, the religious affairs correspondent of The Times. I do not know whether the fact that he was writing as the newly appointed father of the NUJ chapel of The Times, the previous father of the chapel having refused to go to Wapping, had anything to do with it. I think that we can understand his views and those of other journalists, either at The Times, The Sunday Times, or elsewhere. Let me quote a few of the things that were said in the article about what happened to the journalists. They can be multiplied much more when applied to the others who were involved in the dispute, including the printers.

Mr. Longley said:

"At The Times we keep our agreements. Collectively, we form ourselves into a chapel, and collectively, through the chapel, we negotiate new ones. At least, that was what we thought we did. It is the disturbance of that belief, and the emotional shock it caused, that has taken us through the ordeal of the past 12 days . . . The chapel has new officers. We are keeping to the agreement we made under duress."

He said that some of The Times journalists refused to accept the new agreement that was forced upon them. A few paragraphs later he describes the discussions that took place among The Times journalists on this matter and says:

"But the management demanded we move, and it had the law on its side. An eminent QC was briefed and consulted by this chapel, and in measured terms, with chapter and verse, he counselled us that our contracts required us to accept a new place of work, and new working methods. Our management may have had a moral obligation to seek a deal with us first, and even a legal obligation under the grievance procedure in each individual contract of employment, but it took leading counsel no time at all to find in our house agreement the familiar phrase: 'This agreement is binding in honour only'."

Some of us believe that in trade union affairs agreements made in honour are the very ones that should be honoured most. A few paragraphs later Mr. Longley said:

"While our eyes were on the word 'honour' in our house agreement, the management's eyes were no less on the word 'only', in that fragile phrase 'binding in honour only' . . . We felt it bound ; we felt it bound management. We still feel that."

In other words, the journalists who are now producing The Times at Wapping feel that they were subjected to duress, that their agreement was flagrantly broken by the management, and that the management should still be carrying out that agreement. If that is the view that is held by eminent journalists on The Times there ought to be concern among decent-minded people throughout the country.

Moreover, one has to consider the terms under which Mr. Murdoch's ownership of The Times was established. It is also mentioned by Mr. Longley in his article. He says:

"Finally, there must be questions about the constitution of The Times itself. Guarantees were given at the time of the acquisition of the paper by the present proprietor about the protection of its authority, quality, and editorial freedom. These principles are in fact intact at Wapping. But it is not easy to reconcile them with the threat to dismiss us all if we would not move."

I agree it is not easy to reconcile those points. It is even more difficult to reconcile that approach in terms of those printers, journalists and other trade union members who did not have the chance to move even if they were prepared to do so. They were told that they would be sacked. They had taken a ballot and had followed religiously the Government's prescriptions on how to approach a dispute, but they then found themselves in their present situation.

I think it is a matter of honour for anyone who reads the words of The Times correspondent to accept that Mr. Murdoch has acted dishonourably—those are the only words, in fact the kindest words, which can be applied to Mr. Murdoch.

When anyone examines the background to this dispute —I know it has a lengthy background—it is clear that from the beginning, especially from late 1984, the main unions concerned, SOGAT '82, the NGA, the NUJ and other unions have been prepared to negotiate. They asked for that right from the beginning. The negotiations took place on false pretences because at the very moment when Mr. Murdoch and his managers said they were negotiating about one aspect of the matter they were in fact negotiating on an entirely different conspiratorial affair. I cannot believe that any decent Government, or any Minister at the Department of Employment would think that that is a tolerable state of affairs. The Minister for Employment commented on Mr. Murdoch's behaviour and that gave some hope that the Government would assist in this dispute. However, the Government have proceeded to retreat from that position.

The reply of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment to my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East the other night was hopeless. I do not mean the reply was hopeless but it was hopeless for the future of British industrial relations. If Mr. Murdoch gets away with this, other employers—there may be others in this country as outrageous and barbaric as Mr. Murdoch — may seek to follow his practice. If that happens, industrial relations in Britain will be an absolute shambles—and a most unfair shambles.

The worst unfairness will not fall upon the people with highest salaries. It will fall, and is falling, on several thousands of people who lost their jobs some three or four weeks ago. They have no prospects of anything being done for them. The unions are trying to solve the problem and they are doing their best. However, their funds have been sequestrated and they are threatened with further sequestrations in highly dangerous circumstances.

I urge the Government, in the interests of decent people in the country, in the interests of decent treatment for individuals and their families and in the interests of decent industrial relations, to take responsibility for the matter. The Government must not wash their hands. They must seek ways to proceed. I believe that any Government who studied the events that led to this dispute would come to the conclusion that the unions were prepared to negotiate. They are still prepared to do so. The Government do not listen. Are they prepared to let the dispute grind on to lead to further injustices, further outrages on individual families and further injury to an industry and profession in which I take some pride? I certainly do not take any pride in the way in which divisions have been forced on so many journalists in this matter. I can understand those who refuse to go to The Times, but I can understand those who went. Some reconciliation must be sought, and any decent Government would recognise that.

I hope that, when the Minister comes to reply, he will say that he will go back and talk to his Ministerrs about this and see whether they can get proper negotiations in progress, negotiations which would seek to restore the jobs of many of those who have been sacked. The negotiations should also seek a solution on the proper use of new technology. It is false to say that this dispute arises from the refusal of the unions to engage in the use of new technology. Those who have listened to the leaders of Sogat '82 and the NGA know that that charge is a false one. They are seeking, and have always sought, intelligent negotiations. They thought they were near to that and anyone who reads the documents can see that. ACAS could read those documents and I urge the Minister to employ the services of ACAS.

In some disputes it is essential for the Department of Employment to undertake its old responsibilities. Some of those responsibilities, quite properly, have been transferred to ACAS. ACAS has the expert skill to deal with some of these disputes. However, other disputes can only be dealt with by the Minister himself. I urge the Minister, with all the power I can, to take a humane and sensible view of our industrial relations.

I would like to say one word about another aspect of the question. The Minister intervened in the debate and taunted my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North with the charge that we have not got plans that would work for sustaining people in employment. In the Government's first three or four years we attacked them for the huge unemployment they were causing and tolerating. They turned that aside and stated that one must look at the employment figures. The Government said that is more sensible. I do not deride that all together.

The Department of Employment, which I commend, went ahead with the White Paper "Employment: The Challenge for the Nation". I think one part of a page of the White Paper was placed there inadvertently. When I read it I thought it had come straight from Central Office. However, I know that there are still some expert statisticians left at the Department of Employment—a place I have the highest respect for—who ensured that the chart was put on page 7. I commend it to everyone who has studied the document—it is no doubt burned on the Under-Secretary's heart.

The chart on page 7 showed the number of people in employment in Britain over a considerable number of years. It showed the period of highest employment in Britain. Which was it? 1979-80—the very period when "Labour wasn't working." That was the period when more people were employed than ever before, certainly more than have been employed since. Therefore, when Saatchi and Saatchi plastered the hoardings—at a high cost to the Conservatives—they should have made the point that in that period of Labour Government the employment of our people was at a higher peak than ever before.

We had to deal with all the problems that the Government now face—the democratic factors involved, the problems of oil prices, international crises—all these problems. We dealt with all those problems and far from that Labour Government being incapable of dealing with the problems, this Tory Government's own chart shows how well we coped.

The contrast between the two Governments is very simple. In the last year or two of that Labour Government —much misused and abused by Conservative Members and not least the Chairman of the Conservative party—we had the highest number of people employed——

Mr. Holt: And the lowest productivity.

Mr. Foot: In the period under this Government we have the highest number of people unemployed. That is a sharp contrast.

11.49 am

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): I should have liked to congratulate the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) on his motion, but I am disappointed with its terms. Indeed, I cannot agree with a word of it. I am also disappointed at the attitude of Opposition Members. Why do they only look back? They have nothing to look forward to, but the British people, under the present Government, have a great deal to look forward to.

Why have we heard only about Wapping? Why have we heard nothing about Eddie Shah and the Today newspaper? Why has not one Opposition Member congratulated Eddie Shah on producing the newspaper with such high productivity? The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) spoke about so many people who were, as he thought, employed under the last Labour Government. What were they doing, bearing in mind that 6,000 people were producing a newspaper that can be produced by 600? Is that what the right hon. Gentleman calls employment? Such overmanning is the cause of the country's difficulties. Our unemployment is the legacy of years of such nonsense.

Mr. Evans: The hon. Gentleman will not have a job after the next election.

Mr. Thurnham: Trying to solve the problems of the long-term unemployed is an important matter, but we shall do it only by having an economy that pays and works efficiently. Every line of the motion harks back to the dreadful old days when the country could not afford anything. That is why we got into such a poor predicament.

I can see why the motion was not tabled until so late last night—the hon. Gentleman must be ashamed of it. Every line of it is rubbish. It calls attention to a supposed diminution in employment rights. There has been no diminution. People have been freed from the domination of the trade unions. The Opposition say that they will repeal legislation which has been widely welcomed and which returns trade unions to their members. Why? People have been allowed to get on and work.

Why do we have to assume that everybody must be provided with a job? Why do we have so much less self-employment than other countries? For example, there are twice as many self-employed people in West Germany as there are here. The number of the self-employed has increased substantially under the present Government. Why is self-employment not even mentioned in the motion? The Opposition assume that everybody must be given a job by some all-powerful being.

Mr. Holt: By the state.

Mr. Thurnham: Yes, by the nanny state.

Mr. Prescott: The hon. Gentleman is a state employee.

Mr. Thurnham: Under this Government, opportunities have increased for the unemployed. The wider opportunities training programme is showing excellent returns for the cost by providing extra employment opportunities. Why do Opposition Members not accept the challenge of the pick-up programme? Why do trade unionists not ask for extra training rather than extra pay? If we were to listen to the arguments advanced by Opposition Members, we would think that everything was coming to an end, but average weekly earnings now tell a different story. We have been given a catalogue of how dreadful employment legislation is, so how is it that weekly pay in manufacturing industry has risen to £155 —an increase of 8·25 per cent. on last year? If everything is so dreadful, how can such increases, which are substantially above the rate of inflation, come through?

Why can we not look ahead? Why do we not look forward to the fruits that can flow from increased productivity, rather than moan about doing away with industries that carried far more people than they ever needed? I refer to productivity in the steel industry and the coal industry. What of the figures that we heard last night? All of a sudden, the Kent coalfield has turned around and produced twice as much per man shift. Is that not the type of employment and productivity for which we should aim?

Every line of the motion is rubbish. The House should not condemn the Government's policies. It should condemn the Labour Government's policies. I am not surprised that Lord Wilson of Rievaulx resigned in mid-term. I imagine that he could see all that was coming under his policies. The whole House has condemned the results of those dreadful policies. The country was suffering long before 1979.

The motion refers to burdens on women. Why are so many more married women now in work?

Mr. Prescott: Because their husbands have been put out of work by the Government. Look at some of the figures.

Mr. Thurnham: The hon. Member for St. Helens, North talked about wages councils. They are a classic case of an obsolete requirement which could only be called for by a retrospective party. Most of the workers in the industries concerned are on part-time work. Is not the family credit scheme the way in which to provide an adequate income, and much better than burdening employers to the extent that they can no longer offer a job?

The motion speaks of a reduction of internationally agreed standards, but productivity has risen far faster in Britain than it has in any of our competitor countries. There has been talk about fiddling the figures. The people who are fiddling the figures are those who are drawing benefit but are not available for work. Many have been shown to be fiddling the figures. When, in the latest pilot schemes, people have been asked to come in for an interview, a considerable proportion stop drawing benefit, to the extent that the welcome counselling schemes have been paid for by the reduction in benefits drawn. That is where the fiddling is.

Mr. Holt: When the inspector was known to be going to the unemployment exchange in Stockton, the number of claimants that week dropped by 10 per cent.

Mr. Thurnham: Exactly. Why can the Opposition not talk about that fiddling? The motion draws attention to international standards, but unemployment figures must now be calculated internationally. Why should we leave the self-employed and the armed forces out of the calculation so that the Opposition can go about saying that one in seven people are unemployed, although that is not the correct figure?

Every line of the motion can be shown to be utter rubbish.

Mr. Evans: This is tedious repetition.

Mr. Thurnham: The sole motivation for tabling the motion is the realisation that truth has at last caught up with large sections of the union world, especially at Wapping. It has been tabled as a last cry of a stranded whale which thinks that the sea will wash up far enough to take him back out to sea.

We have had a somewhat truncated debate and very good news of privatisation. The motion talks of poverty and strife being created. The standard of living of people in work is far higher than it was under Labour, and it is only by increasing productivity as a whole that we can do anything about the unemployed. My hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) talked about the need for measures to help the long-term unemployed and referred to the Employment Select Committee's report. I am pleased to see that Committee's Chairman, the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) present. I was a member of that Committee and advocated taking measures to help the long-term unemployed, especially the increasing number of people who have been unemployed for three or more years. All who want such measures implemented must accept, however, that they have to be paid for. They can be paid for only by a thriving and growing economy.

I am disappointed in the motion and hope that Opposition Members will pay strict and close attention to my hon. Friend the Minister when he replies.

11.58 am

Mr. Martin J. O'Neill (Clackmannan): I want to talk about the dispute at Wapping as a Member sponsored by the National Graphical Association and as one who takes an interest in the printing industry, as does my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans).

The last occasion on which we had a debate on the printing industry in Fleet street was at about this time last year but in the early hours of the morning. That debate attracted rather fewer hon. Members than today's. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North on enabling us to debate this important issue.

Mr. Holt: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. O'Neill: If the hon. Gentlman were to stop interrupting other Members' speeches, he might have time to make one of his own.

We are concerned about the 6,000 people who have lost their jobs at Wapping. Many of us are interested in the printing industry. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton), raised that issue in an Adjournment debate from the standpoint of a SOGAT '82 member. I approach the matter from the standpoint of the National Graphical Association. The dispute was created by management. Management sought to impose conditions that no self-respecting trade unionist could possibly accept.

It might be useful if I recount the background to the dispute. In 1980 construction started at Wapping. In 1983 the first faltering steps towards discussions on the possibility of the transfer of production of The Sun and the News of the World to Wapping were taken. The management said that it wanted substantial cuts in the number of people to be employed there. At that time the unions felt that those demands were unreasonable. They saw that move primarily as a means of buying time so that other matters could take place.

It is fair to say that the individual who was placed in charge of the negotiations, Mr. Bill O'Neill—I hasten to add that he is no relation to me, though perhaps he is on his mother's side—had responsibilities in Australia, the United States and the United Kingdom. That elusive individual was not present for discussions until December

[Mr. O'Neill]

1984, when it was implied that negotiations would be suspended pending the employment of Mr. Christopher Pole-Carew as an adviser.

That is rather like inviting the Russian social democratic party—as it was before the revolution—to cease its activities pending the promotion of Rasputin to a more responsible position in the Tsarist hierarchy. Mr. Pole-Carew does not enjoy the confidence of the print unions, and he has had a somewhat chequered career in that area. His appointment is an example of the lack of good will on the part of News International.

, In March 1985, Mr. Murdoch announced that there would be a new evening paper in London and that that would be launched in 12 months. In the intervening period there were virtually no discussions. It was only at the insistence of Brenda Dean, the general secretary of SOGAT '82, that discussions were arranged in December 1985. At that time the unions wanted a timetable for negotiations relating to the publication of the London Post. If progress could be achieved on the publication of the London Post, the unions wanted the talks to be extended to the production of the News of the World and The Sun at Wapping.

I am being deliberate in stating these facts, because one of the myths that has been created by Tory Members and others is that somehow there has been an inordinate delay in the negotiations and that that has been the fault of the unions. As I have said, in the period between 1980 and September 1985, most of the delays were the responsibility of the management in its appointment of controversial individuals with responsibilities elsewhere which were considered to be more important than meeting British trade unions.

One would have assumed that the negotiations over the London Post would have covered wages, conditions and staffing levels. Those are normally the fundamentals of any trade union discussion about production and new plant. Instead, the management laid down four non-negotiable conditions: that all agreements be legally binding on both the union and the individual; that no industrial action should take place in any circumstances; that there should be no closed-shop; and, finally, that there should be a complete, total and unfettered right of management to manage.

None of those conditions would be acceptable individually. As a group, they mean the end of trade unionism as we know it in Great Britain and as we know it throughout the Western world. I am sure that if Mrs. Aquino, in the Philippines, wanted to establish free trade unions in that country, the regulations and legislation that she would have to dismantle would be similar to the proposals that Mr. Murdoch put to the print unions in September 1985.

The National Union of Journalists, the NGA, SOGAT '82 and the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers rejected those proposals out of hand. They were not, however, rejected on the basis that nothing should be put in their place. Significant advances from the point of view of Fleet street management were offered. They offered the indexation of wages and they sought the right of members to transfer should work be moved to Wapping. They also sought the right of union recognition in traditional areas in the printing process.

That, in turn, was rejected out of hand by News International, and a trade union ballot followed. That resulted in overwhelming majorities to back the unions' position although that position had slightly altered by that time. The unions now agreed to concede certain points. They conceded that there would be no unofficial industrial action and that official action would be taken only after a secret ballot. For those who study industrial relations in the British press, probably the most critical of the offers that were made was that there would be binding arbitration capable of being unilaterally triggered by either side.

An offer of that nature is unparalleled. Equally, the degree of support that was achieved for that in secret ballots was also unparalleled. SOGAT and the AUEW voted in favour, by majorities of 5:1 and the NGA by a majority of 7:1. Armed with the mandate of the membership, the trade union officials were in a position to deliver the goods in a way that management could not previously have expected. They went further than claiming that they would do that at Wapping. At that time, as I have already said, the unions were discussing only the possibility of producing a new evening paper at Wapping and the possibility thereafter of News International producing The Sun at Wapping. The conditions were now to be extended to Bouverie street and Grays Inn road where The Times and the Sunday Times were being produced.

Those offers were spurned. Mr. Murdoch's reaction was simple and straightforward. He reiterated his previous demands and added that not only did he want his previous demands met, but he wanted cuts in the Bouverie street and Grays Inn road plants to reduce a work-force of 6,000 to between 700 and 800, and those 700 or 800 workers would be engaged on conditions which would be of his dictating. There would be wage cuts as well as redundancies. Those people who would be subject to redundancies would get the national minimum rate of one week's pay for every year served, whereas the normal practice in the printing industry is for redundancies to be on the basis of one month's pay for every year served.

On 24 January 1986, following a secret ballot and the failure to reach agreement between management and unions, a strike was finally called, the work-force was promptly sacked, and 6,000 people have been out of work since.

At the same time, current legislation has enabled the Murdoch management to establish what have come to be known as buffer companies. In effect, they are shell companies, but they have acted as buffers between the management and the work force and allowed the management to seek to outlaw secondary action. That process started in March 1985.

According to a detailed article that appeared in the Financial Times of 20 February, two companies were incorporated on 7 March 1985. These were Worthystock and Sparkcrown. The headquarters of the companies was given as 66 Lincoln's Inn fields, the address of News International's solicitors, Farrer and Company. By 7 May, Mr. G. W. Richards of Farrer and Company resigned as the director of both companies to be replaced by Bruce Matthews and Peter Stehenberger, who are directors of News International. Mr. Bruce Matthews is an Australian citizen and Mr. Stehenberger is a Swiss citizen.

On 11 June, Worthystock and Sparkcrown changed their names to News International Distribution and News International Supply Company, respectively, the latter's objects being described as "the supplier of goods and services of whatsoever nature to proprietors, printers and publishers of newspapers, books, magazines and journals."

That process was continued when a firm called Tyrolese was established with two directors, Mr. G. W. Richards and Mr. J. Gordon. That was the same Mr. Richards. As before, by 2 September they had resigned and made way for Stehenberger and Matthews. Later, in September, the company changed its name to News International Advertising, with the object of providing advertising services to proprietors, printers and publishers, and so on.

That was the arrangement that was carried on throughout 1985. Shell companies were established in anticipation of industrial action and to frustrate any secondary action which might be taken under the law.

On 20 December a letter went from Mr. Richards, of Farrer and Company, to Mr. Matthews which had the explicit aim of securing the removal of the maximum numbers of the work forces of The Sun, the News of the World, The Sunday Times and The Times from their places of employment. The purpose was to remove those employees at the cheapest price and to secure the largest possible number of those individuals at the earliest opportunity thereafter as and when required. That was happening throughout the time when the unions were supposed to be engaged in meaningful negotiations with the management.

We know now what the management's motives were. News International was not seeking to introduce new technology. It is now well established and broadly agreed that the technology employed at Wapping is of an almost obsolete type in some areas. I was talking to some of the men at Wapping last night. They told me about the equipment which they believed to be in the plant. They believe that some of it is older than the equipment that they operated in Bouverie street and Gray's Inn road.

The fact is that Murdoch has sought drastically to decrease his costs. It is not his purpose to provide money for future investment in Britain. He is not seeking to provide further employment in Britain. That cannot be said of someone who is intent on reducing a labour force of 6,000 to between 2,000 and 3,000. No one knows how many are employed at Wapping. I stood outside the plant and watched buses going in that were carrying only two or three people. They were going in at speed, and I accept that they might have been carrying some who were lying on the floor—an exercise which is entirely unnecessary. The picketing at Wapping is peaceful. It is well organised and disciplined. It is carried out by men of the highest integrity. They are the essence of all that is best in British trade unionism.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I wonder what the trade unionists of the highest integrity to whom the hon. Gentleman has referred would think about a letter that Coventry city council sent to Lanchester polytechnic in Coventry, instructing it that no newspapers produced by News International were to be taken on the premises of the polytechnic? Can self-respecting trade unionists accept that in furtherance of an industrial dispute it is proper and acceptable that an academic institution should be denied the opportunity to take what newspapers it will, should be denied freedom of information and should be denied the free exchange of ideas?

Mr. O'Neill: Individuals have the freedom to choose. If a local authority wants to express solidarity with workers who are involved in a struggle, that is its privilege. The hon. Gentleman may buy South African grapes or Chilean wine; that is for him to decide. It seems that when trade unionists exercise similar decisions, it is a different matter.

Mr. Murdoch's actions have been concerned not with the introduction of new technology: They have been directed to an attempt to cut costs and to transfer massive profits out of the United Kingdom to finance his activities in the United States. There is something wrong with our corporate arrangements and company law when foreigners can come to Britain, acquire newspapers and export the profits, created by British working people, at the expense of workers' jobs. It would appear that they can export profits while undermining the working conditions of employees throughout an industry, leaving the British taxpayer with the bill for social security payments.

Mr. Chapman rose——

Mr. O'Neill: No, I shall not give way. I have nearly finished. I know that the hon. Gentleman wants to participate in the second debate on the Order Paper and I would not want to prevent him from making that speech.

Employment rights of British workers are being undermined with every hour that the Wapping dispute continues. The idea that people should be working in the conditions that prevail at Wapping is intolerable. Anyone who visits Wapping will understand that the term "fortress" is not exaggerated. Last night I heard stories of what is supposed to be going on in the place. Wretched people are working in intolerable conditions. They are intimidated by a ruthless management. Ordinary honest people are being exploited. They are frightened because they know that there are no other jobs to which they can go.

My hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North talked about the unemployment figures. The combination of inadequate company legislation and penal and spiteful anti-trade union legislation has led to massive unemployment and deterioration of the rights of working people. For those reasons, I commend the motion to the House.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): I wish to take the attention of the House from the detail that we have heard about Wapping from Opposition Members to issues of a more international flavour in considering a problem that faces so many countries. Unemployment is not a phenomenon confined to the United Kingdom. Regrettably, it is one that is common to Europe. I say "Europe" advisedly, because I wish to draw some comparisons between the experience of Europe as against that in the United States and that in the far east.

It is instructive to consider the unemployment rates of a number of countries in the industrialised world. There are some valid, interesting and instructive conclusions to be drawn from the figures. In Spain, for example, the unemployment rate has recently increased to 22 per cent.

Mr. Prescott: That is the only country where unemployment has increased, apart from the United Kingdom.

Mr. Forth: That is in Socialist Spain. In Ireland, a country with a coalition Government with a Labour party content, the unemployment rate is 18 per cent. In

[Mr. Forth]

Belgium, a country with a coalition Government, it is 16 per cent. In the Netherlands, it is 15 per cent. In Italy, which has a coalition Government, it is 14 per cent. Regrettably, in the United Kingdom, the unemployment rate is 13 per cent. In France, with a Socialist Government, the unemployment rate is 10 per cent. and increasing. In the Federal Republic of Germany, which has a coalition Government, the unemployment rate is 10 per cent. and increasing.

Mr. Evans: What about Greece?

Mr. Forth: We all know that unemployment in Greece is about 5 per cent. That is the official figure. My faith in Greek statistics is probably much less than the hon. Gentleman's faith in them. We cannot necessarily look to the political nature, or, therefore, the economic policies of different countries and draw a straight-line conclusion.

Mr. Evans: As the hon. Gentleman obviously studies these matters, will he confirm that there is no common basis for measuring unemployment within the EEC, and the Greek figures prove it?

Mr. Forth: I agree that direct international comparisons are not necessarily valid. The Greek experience is interesting. Is the hon. Gentleman able to challenge the broad validity of the figures I have cited?

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Did the hon. Gentleman, in his tour of Europe also look at the social democratic countries of Scandinavia, Austria and Norway? Norway, because of its oil supplies, has an unemployment rate of less than 2 per cent. The figures in Sweden and in Austria are similar. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will mention those facts as well.

Mr. Forth: I shall draw attention also to the experience in the United States in the context of its political system, political control, economy and experience of trade unionism. I believe that it is genuinely instructive for the House to consider international comparisons to avoid being drawn into false conclusions about our unemployment and the solutions that are sometimes offered by the Opposition parties. Perhaps I should more accurately refer to the Opposition party because, although the Labour party is well represented, I have searched the Opposition Benches in vain to see any representation by the other political parties. We can all draw the obvious political conclusion about the concern, or lack of concern, of the alliance for this vitally important problem.

Let us consider the solutions that can be sought in terms of politics. We are often told—perhaps we would have been told today if any alliance Member had bothered to turn up—that coalitions are the answer to the problem. We are sometimes told that one of our great difficulties is the fact that we have had a two-party system for too long and that, if only we could introduce a more balanced system of Government, with a coalition and centrist policies, that would be the answer. The figures I have cited amply demonstrate that many countries with coalition Governments of various kinds have failed to solve their unemployment problems. The unemployment problems are shared with other countries of different political hues. It would appear that we must, therefore, look elsewhere for the answer.

We may be told that the answer lies in Socialist policies. It is instructive to consider the recent history of France. We well remember the euphoria in 1981 when the French elected a Socialist Government. We were told that that was the answer to their problems. We remember Mitterrand and his Government putting into effect precisely the same sort of policies that are advocated by the Opposition. We were offered nationalisation, price control and an expansion of the public sector — the entire panoply of policies that are new being trawled out yet again by the Labour party and which were put into effect in Socialist France as recently as 1981.

The inevitable happened. All the events about which we warn our people happened in France. Inflation increased and the balance of payments was adversely affected. Eventually, the Socialist Government saw the light and had to adopt policies that most Conservative Members would describe as Thatcherite. They were the sort of policies that we are pursuing and recommending.

Partly as a result of that, the recent French experience has been favourable. The inflation rate is decreasing and the balance of payments position is improving. There, in the most classic sense, is an example of a country close to us geographically and similar size and structure which demonstrates that the answer to the unemployment problem, which we all share, does not lie in Socialist policies.

Let us compare Europe as a whole with the United States. They are of similar size and population, but their experience in terms of employment is different. In the past 15 or 20 years, 20 million jobs have been created in the United States but no net new jobs have been created in the EEC. Why? Since the last war, most European countries have pursued policies that have broadly involved ever greater control, state intervention and burdens on employers, whether they are financial, regulatory or of any other kind. Yet, the approach in the United States has been totally different. It has involved a much freer attitude towards the business community, mobility of labour and, to pick up the point made by the hon. Member for St. Helen's, North (Mr. Evans), a much lower rate of trade union membership. Labour Members talk about trade union membership as though it were something to be valued, but the experience in the United States is somewhat different. In the United States, people realise that excessively high trade union membership and activity are counter-productive in terms of jobs and employment. It cannot be a coincidence that in the United States employers find that, where the incidence of trade union membership is relatively low, they have prosperity and success. That is the opposite of our experience in the EEC and in Europe generally.

In the United Kingdom, IBM is an excellent example of this. Time and time again, it has a balloted its labour force on whether it wants to have a trade union and time and time again the labour force has voted against it. Why? The answer is that the employer is a successful one. It treats its employees well. The employees realise that they are getting better treatment and conditions without trade union involvement than they would if they had it.

The conclusions to be drawn from all this are blindingly obvious. The approach taken in Europe as a whole, in the United Kingdom and in many other countries since the war has discouraged the growth of employment. I was privileged to serve in the European Parliament between 1979 and 1984. It was obvious to me that the repeated attempts by the Brussels bureaucracy to devise ever more ways of regulating industry and the private sector were counter-productive. I believe that the Government have now identified the answer — reduce the number of restrictions and regulations on employers.

Mr. Evans: As the Government have spent six years deregulating, will the hon. Gentleman tell the House why, under the Conservative Government, unemployment has continued to increase month after month to the highest recorded level in our history?

Mr. Forth: Unemployment has been a phenomenon of the post-war era. Every Government in Britain since 1945 inherited higher rates of inflation and unemployment than their predecessor. We were involved in an inexorable process through that period. I am suggesting that at long last we have realised that excessive regulation by Government was contributing to the ever higher rate of unemployment. I welcome the move by the Government, having identified that, to take a series of policy steps to redress the balance and reverse the process from which we have suffered since 1945.

Mr. Holt: I wonder whether, during his research, my hon. Friend has looked at the Canadian experience under the current Government. They have created 580,000 jobs in the past 12 months.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I believe that he has identified another reason, from the policies being pursued in north America, why the motion before the House is totally misguided. The hon. Member for St. Helens, North is suggesting the usual tired old formula we have been offered so many times before and which has failed so many times before. As I have tried to suggest, it can be demonstrated, by comparison with other countries in Europe and the United States, that that formula will not work.

That is why I hope that the House will resist the motion and why I welcome the approach that the Government are taking to employment. I believe that the policies we are now pursuing give genuine hope for the future. They do not give in to the temptation to use what has failed in the past, and I believe ever more firmly that people know and understand that. When the people are offered another chance to choose at the next election, their choice will be the same and will be as wise as the choice on the previous occasion.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire, (Mr. Forth) was being extremely selective in discussing what happens in Europe. He did not discuss the position in Sweden, and he also ignored a number of other countries. The reason for the unemployment that has developed in western Europe, north America and elsewhere, where there is free enterprise and a competitive capitalist system, is to be found in the very nature of that system. As long as it continues, there will always be unemployment booms and slumps at varying levels.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) for giving us the opportunity to say a few words on this subject. The industrial relations legislation that has been brought in by dribs and drabs over the years since the Government came to office is the most anti-trade union and reactionary in the whole of Europe. We are told that the position in some European countries is worse than it is here but unemployment has increased more rapidly in the United Kingdom than it has in any other part of Europe. That point was made by my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North.

There is a myth, and it has been mentioned again today by Conservative Members, that the trade unions got out of balance and that the power of the trade unions was too great. The argument is not new. It was first developed in a Conservative party lawyers' pamphlet entitled "A Giant's Strength". It was argued a lifetime ago. Incidentally, that pamphlet echoed the view of people in the United States of America, who, after the war, introduced the Taft Hartley Acts which restricted the powers and rights of the trade unions in the United States. Ever since the Taft Hartley Acts, Conservative politicians in the United States have followed that practice and used that argument. It is not true, it was not true then, and it has not been true since. The trade unions never had a great balance of power tipped in their favour. They were never more powerful than any bunch of employers.

The point about trade unionism is that workers arrived at the conclusion early on that in this type of society they had to join together to defend themselves, and to argue collectively to try to reach agreement with their employers. If they tried to do it alone, they ended up in a disaster. Conservative Members want each individual worker to go it alone.

Mr. Forth: Yes.

Mr. Heffer: The hon. Gentleman is an honest Tory and says yes. He is saying openly what all Conservative Members think. That is their basic attitude towards the working-class and trade unionists. They do not want us to have rights, powers, or collectivism, but want us to act individually. When we do that, we are sunk. We have rights and powers only when we work together. Even in 1906 British workers managed to convince a Liberal Government that something should be done to give them rights, which until then they did not have.

This Government have gone further than any other Government with anti-trade union legislation. The 1906 Act dealt with how unions' moneys could be used. It is an old argument to say that unions are above the law. The unions were never above the law. Immunities merely gave workers a certain measure of protection. Unions were never above the law. That protection has now been taken from workers and trade unions by this Government's legislation.

The Labour party has said that it will repeal the legislation, and we shall do so. We must therefore consider the sort of legislation that we shall put in its place. That is important, because we cannot merely get shot of Tory legislation and leave a big gap. We must give our people rights and protection.

When my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) was Secretary of State for Employment, he did a marvellous job. We are grateful to him for steering legislation through the House to get rid of the Industrial Relations Act 1971 when we were on a knife-edge. He also introduced legislation to restore rights to our people. We must do something similar.

When we introduce such legislation, I hope that it will not diminish the right of any worker to take industrial action. I am thinking, in particular, of workers who go on unofficial strike. The position cannot always be nice and tidy, with a group of factory workers suddenly finding their shop steward sacked and holding an official ballot. In my day in the shipyards, workers answered that by walking out of the gate until the shop steward was restored, because they had elected him. If workers did not like the shop steward, they could remove him whenever they wished.

Mr. Forth: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heffer: I shall not give way. I do not wish to make a long speech. I hope that when we introduce legislation we shall not even think in those terms.

I am, and always have been, in favour of ballots in the trade union movement. My union on Merseyside used to elect a Communist as district secretary every year—the great Leo McGree. If we did not like Leo, we did not have to vote for him. The district committee, of which I was proud to be a member, and which we used to call the management committee, was elected every year. I agree with that, but we can go a little too far in thinking that ballots must be held in all cases.

I thought that we had given the executives of unions, who should be elected, the power at any given moment to call out their memberships to deal with any matters. I hope that we shall restore that right. There has been much talk about ballots, but I do not remember a ballot when we went to war over the Falklands. I remember the group of people who were, regrettably, elected to Government taking a decision and sending our troops to fight in the Falklands. Constitutionally, they were right to do so. If we can do it in time of war, we must give union leaders the power to do the same thing, in certain circumstances.

As to the internal affairs of trade unions, the Government are acting rather like the Jaruzelski Government in Poland. They have the cheek to say that they support Solidarity, yet they interfere with our unions, in some ways more than the Polish Government have done with their unions. That is not acceptable. If my union wishes to ballot each of its members to elect its general secretary, that is a matter for it. We used to say that members had to attend branch meetings four times a year —we called them star nights—and members who did not attend were fined. Votes were always taken at those branch meetings which meant that any member could look through the lists to see how many people had voted for Bill Brown and how many for Fred Jones. It was the best check that we could have had, because all the votes were recorded, and we could see how many branch members voted for whom. I hope that those rights will be restored to trade unions.

We must get rid of this class legislation, which benefits employers to the detriment of the ordinary working class. Workers' rights must be restored and the class legislation swept away. I say to my hon. Friends that in doing so —I have heard arguments about a Bill of Rights, but I do not know exactly what that means—we must restore all the rights of the workers and give them extra rights that they have not had until now. The balance has never been tipped in favour of the workers, but always in favour of the employers. This must end.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): We owe the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) a debt of gratitude for giving us the opportunity to debate this subject, and I regret the somewhat acrimonious and politically partisan flavour of the debate so far. All of us who have taken the trouble to be here regard unemployment as a great evil. It is a great evil that people, through no fault of their own, should be trapped in unemployment, and it behoves us to foreswear, as far as possible, mutual recrimination. We must analyse and consider carefully and fairly the nature of the problem, and try to understand its causes and see what remedies there may be.

Some major causes of unemployment are beyond the scope of this or any Government to control. One is demographic—the shifting balance of our population. The interacting effects of high mortality in the second world war and the baby boom of the 1960s mean that, during the 1980s, many more people are joining the labour force than are retiring from it. It is an objective, statistical fact that it would be necessary to create an extra 1 million jobs during this decade if we were to stand still in terms of registered unemployment. That factor deserves to be more widely appreciated.

A second major cause of contemporary unemployment has been the recession of 1979-1981—the deepest, severest recession in world trade for 50 years. The causes of that recession—the oil price shock of 1979 and the worldwide withdrawal of Governments from budgetary and monetary excess—were again far beyond the scope and power of any United Kingdom Government to control. The painfully slow process of recovery from that recession has also been beyond the powers of the Government of our country to affect. Continuing high interest rates, currency instability, protectionism and the debt crisis are all reasons why the recovery from that deep recession has been agonisingly slow. A trading country such as ours, which exports some 30 per cent. of all that it produces, is inevitably highly exposed to world economic conditions and it is absurd to pretend that there is any way in which those enormous forces could have been sidetracked and this country sheltered from them.

A third major international cause of unemployment is the impact of new technology. By a cruel coincidence, while those other causes of unemployment have been operating we have been in a period of profoundly important technological change. The pyschological effect is clear for all to see. It induces deep pessimism and people frequently predict that there will never again be full employment, although there is really no reason to suppose that that will be so. In past periods of major technological change people have been similarly pessimistic. No doubt it was the fashionable orthodoxy of the day when the wheel was invented, and one can well imagine how people whose job it was to carry loads and haul weights would have feared very much for their future.

Fears of that kind are better documented during the Industrial Revolution, in the steam age when the impact of that new technology displaced people from old forms of work very rapidly and painfully. It was a natural human reaction on the part of the Luddites to destroy the new machinery on the assumption that there would otherwise no longer be any employment for them. Equally well documented, however, is the effect of that technological change and the enormous growth in wealth throughout the 19th century in creating new job opportunities of a nature and pattern impossible to anticipate. The same will undoubtedly be true of the current information technology revolution.

The tragedy is that, for a period, new technology tends to destroy old jobs faster than it creates new ones. Unhappily, we are living through such a period. The job of political leaders and Governments in such a period is to explain what is happening, to take what steps they can to help those displaced in the process of change, and to remove the obstacles to change so as to shorten the period of adaptation.

Having drawn attention to three international causes of contemporary unemployment, it is right to consider some uniquely British circumstances and the way in which, through misguided policy in the past, we have saddled ourselves with a worse problem than we need have faced.

A distinctive feature of the British economy has been that many of our industries as well as our public services have been overmanned. By the end of the 1970s, overmanning was ubiquitous—not least in Fleet street, where it was a byword. We accommodated ourselves to that by allowing unit costs to rise and hoping that inflation and devaluation would somehow take care of the process. But in the end it did not work. We allowed this to happen very much because of the Socialist, corporatist ethos of the 1960s and 1970s, when big business and big Government were the vogue. Big business and big Government are a natural habitat for trade unionism. Sadly, too many trade union leaders attached less importance to assisting profitability and the creation of wealth in the interests of their members and society as a whole than to ensuring that the number of members in their own unions increased. In that way, too many connived in overmanning. That was unsustainable when the recession came and much of the overmanning was shaken out. It was a painful process. It need not have been so severe if we had not allowed the original overmanning to set in. The British people appreciate the reality. No one enjoys the experience. It is brutal and painful to go through such a rapid change, but the need for it is not doubted.

The second domestically generated cause of unemployment is the inflation that we allowed to establish itself in our economy. Every successive economic cycle since the war has been marked by new peaks of inflation followed by new peaks of unemployment. It is no coincidence that inflation, which doubled during the period of the last Labour Government, preceded doubling of unemployment.

Inflation destroys jobs in a variety of ways. Inflation saps the profitability of companies and undermines the capacity and confidence of people to invest. Inflation provokes aggression in pay bargaining because, naturally, pay bargainers want to recoup for their members the real value of earnings lost through inflation. That competitive aggression in pay bargaining means that the devil takes the hindmost, the weakest lose out and unemployment is increased.

Inflation leads to higher interest rates. In all those ways inflation destroys jobs. The Government are right to put the defeat of inflation at the top of their list of economic policies because it makes a direct contribution to remedying a major underlying cause of unemployment. There is no worthwhile trade-off to be had. We might once have been able to say that a little more inflation would be justified in the interests of a little less unemployment. We can no longer say that. Indeed, the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) told the Labour party conference in 1976 that important truth. He was wise and brave to do so at that time.

A further British domestic cause of unemployment is the excessive amount of public expenditure and the associated high levels of taxation that have been allowed to develop over a long period. The Earl of Stockton is fond of criticising the Government for the severity of their policies, but when Harold Macmillan left office as Prime Minister public expenditure represented about 33 per cent. of GNP. By the time that the Conservative Government took office in 1979 public expenditure was into the 40 per cent. area. Unhappily, it has remained at that level. Public expenditure at that level entails high interest rates and a whole haemorrhage, through high taxation, of profits from the wealth-creating sector of the economy and that leads directly to higher unemployment.

The Government have been right to make their first priorities restraining of public expenditure and lower borrowing. But they still must bring down the excessively high levels of taxation from which the economy suffers.

Some good starts have been made. The Government have introduced reforms to corporation tax. Obviously, it was sensible in our present circumstances to remove the bias in the corporate taxation system in favour of using machines and discriminating against the use of people. Small businesses in particular have low rates of corporation tax as a result of this Government's reform. That is a useful and important start to the process.

The same is true of the abolition of the national insurance surcharge, which the Labour party was driven to introduce when it was in power because of its excessive public expenditure. That was a tax on jobs. Indeed, national insurance is a payroll tax which is inappropriate during endemic high unemployment. I am glad that the Government have made a start on introducing a more rational pattern into the national insurance system. Perhaps we can go further in that direction.

I am glad that the Government are proposing to reform business rates. If we move to centralised decisions on the level of business rates, that will remove some of the worst excesses imposed by the high-spending, extravagant and irresponsible Labour-controlled local authorities.

However, I fear that rates will still be the heaviest single impost on businesses and that they will ignore the profitability of individual companies and remain a textbook case of taxation without representation. I hope that we shall be able to go further in reforming local government finance. The indiscriminate havoc that high rates wreak on businesses and, therefore, on employment reinforces the strong case for tight control of public expenditure, particularly in local government.

The Government have embarked on a useful reform of capital taxation. The more that can be done to reduce capital transfer tax and capital gains tax, the more we shall be able to encourage wider share ownership, a more constructive, co-operative approach to industrial relations than our tradition adversarial pattern has allowed, more venture capital and more help to small businesses, which represent the best possibility for creating new jobs in our economy.

I know that the Government are also seeking reform of VAT. Decisions have to be taken on a European basis and

[Mr. Alan Howarth]

I am glad to have been assured that the Government are urgently seeking to lift the threshold at which companies have to pay VAT. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment, who is to reply to the debate, may be able to bring me up to date, but I know that in 1981 about 93 per cent. of VAT was paid by companies with a turnover above £100,000, yet 75 per cent. of companies have a lower turnover than that. Nevertheless, all those companies had to make VAT returns even though, after that whole laborious process, the net return to the Exchequer was minimal. I hope that we shall succeed in lifting the threshold at which VAT is payable from the current level of, I think, about £20,000 to perhaps £120,000. That would lift a tiresome and bureaucratic burden from small businesses which have to suffer considerable compliance costs.

Progress on income tax has not been as rapid as many of us wished, but the imperative was to reduce borrowing. Even so, the Government have reduced the basic rate from 33 per cent. to 30 per cent. and have increased the threshold at which individuals start to pay tax by about 20 per cent. in real terms. The more that we can keep tight control of public expenditure and allow the growth that is taking place in the economy to express itself in the private sector, the greater will be the possibility of bringing down income tax, with all the dynamic and stimulating effects that that will have on our economy and its propensity to create jobs.

The Government are moving in the right direction in all those ways, but I know that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary has also been involved in lifting the burden of bureaucratic harassment that the legacy of successive Governments has imposed on our businesses. The major asset, particularly of a small business, is the energy of the boss. If he has to spend his energy in form-filling and bureaucratic compliance, he will have less energy and less time and scope to run his business to create wealth so that he personally can take on more people and also contribute to the general prosperity of society and help to regain our overall capacity to employ people.

The Government have made important inroads into the apparatus of bureaucracy. Price controls, income controls, dividend controls, exchange controls and hire purchase controls have all gone, yet there are still far too many statutes, statutory orders, EC directives, local government directives, quangos and judicial tribunals making demands on businesses. Many statutory bodies are charged with responsibilities involving, for example, health and safety at work, that we must all accept in a mature and decent society, but a great deal of superfluous bureaucracy and regulatory activity remains.

I was delighted when the Government produced the White Paper "Lifting the Burden" in July last year. It is an extensive, detailed, nitty-gritty document which sets out a full agenda of useful reforms. I hope that the Government will press on with them so that we shall have a less claustrophobic atmosphere in which people can do business. All of that will be helpful.

There is yet another area where reform is needed and where reform is taking place but which needs to be pressed further. That is reform of the labour market. "The labour market" is a chill, economist's term but it describes very important human and economic realities. There has been much criticism by the Opposition during this debate of the reforms of the industrial relations legislation that have been introduced by the Government since 1979. However, the cumulative effect of that legislation is enormously beneficial, not least because it strengthens the rights of individual trade unionists.

Its benefits are manifest in terms of industrial peace. During the last 12 months there have been fewer industrial disputes in this country than in any other year during the last 50 years. That must be a result in large part of the legislative reforms that have been introduced. It may be that we need to go further. I see no reason why freely negotiated collective pay bargains should not be enforceable at civil law, and the Government may judge it to be appropriate at a future date to introduce a change of that kind.

The reform of trade union legislation, combined with the reform of wages councils that were having very important effects upon the terms and conditions of work of about 3 million employees, is directly beneficial to employment. It was a crazy and destructive policy for wages councils to set minimum levels of pay that made it absolutely certain that the opportunities for employment, particularly of young people, were greatly diminished. Therefore I welcome the reforms that have been introduced.

I welcome also the encouragement that the Government's policies have given to labour mobility, the improved deal for early leavers in terms of pension benefits and the Government's support for personal, portable pensions. They are of great importance in achieving a more flexible, adaptable and mobile economy. That should go hand in hand with the necessary reform of the Rent Acts. It is very stupid if legislation has the practical effect of it not being in the interests of private enterprise to offer privately rented accommodation to those who may need to move from one area to another to find a job, who are willing to do so but who are prevented from moving because they cannot find a roof over their heads when they get there.

The education and training reforms that are taking place are all relevant to our need to produce a more skilled and adaptable labour force. This will be of long-term benefit to the prospects of employment.

There are no easy, quick solutions. Unemployment is a very complex problem. Those who care about unemployment ought to be willing to make an honest analysis of it and to consider fresh solutions. They ought not to object to a Government who challenge vested interests and who are prepared to reconsider the old othodoxies.

This Government's approach is to dismantle the obstacles to employment. The Labour party is tied to the old interests—the trade unions and public bureaucracies. It is tied to the old notions of large-scale Government intervention and large-scale Government spending. The Labour party proposes to go further. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) has a policy that is called "directed reflation". My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury has provided a telling calculation of the cost of Labour pledges. He suggested—and it has not been repudiated—that if these pledges were to be implemented, value added tax would rise to about 41 per cent. That would plainly be absurd. The alliance simply wants to pull rabbits out of the hat and tinker with institutions. The Conservative approach is to liberate our economy, to work with market forces, to remove distortions and to release private enterprise from fiscal and bureaucratic burdens. In 1979 and 1983 the British people welcomed this approach by the Conservative Government and I am certain that they will continue to endorse it.

1.4 pm

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) made a speech which reflected most of the speeches from that side of the House. It had little to do with the facts of the case or the judgments and issues involved. The hon. Gentleman said that what we had to do was reduce taxation and insurance payments in order to assist employment. The Government have done all that and we find that industry has gained about £15 billion in profits. That money did not go into investment, training or jobs. It went abroad to be invested in property and other kinds of investment. After six years, the achievement for which the Government had hoped has not materialised.

The hon. Gentleman discussed the question of how many days were lost through disputes. However, he actually spoke about how many disputes there are, rather than about how many days are lost. It is true that the number of disputes has halved but we are still losing almost as many working days through strikes, because although there may be fewer strikes they are bigger and they last longer. They are also more expensive. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the miners' strike cost £6 billion. The hon. Gentleman should pay attention to those important facts when he is addressing the House on such matters.

I offer my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) on his motion on employment rights. Conservative Members have said very little about employment rights. However, that is the subject of the motion and I want to use some of my time to deal with the reduction of those rights. My hon. Friend's excellent speech reflected his working experience and the length of time that he has spent in this House specialising in employment legislation. The House is richer for his speech. I want to follow up some of his contributions and deal with employment rights.

Very little has been said about employment rights. I was quite surprised when the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) said that he was not aware that there had been any reduction of employment rights. That convinces me that many Conservative Members do not know what they are voting for when they go through the Lobby. Since 1979 there has been a constant catalogue of reductions of rights, and it is important to put some of these on the record. It might even be useful to remind the Minister of such employment rights, because that is what the motion is about.

The motion is concerned with individual rights. The Government's great claim is that they are extending most of their legislation in the name of individual rights and individual freedom. Such rights have been guaranteed by international conventions which successive Governments have been prepared to observe within our legislation. I shall spell out precisely what this Government have done in regard to individual rights and freedom.

I must express my grave disappointment that the Minister for Employment is not here to defend the reductions in rights. I spend an awful lot of time trying to get Ministers, and indeed the Secretary of State, to appear on television or to appear in the House to defend in open debate the measures that they follow. However, we have to learn from separate interviews—which they demand to do on their own—from articles or, indeed, as we have done, from the latest speech by the Minister for Employment, what Ministers consider to be important.

The speech of the Minister for Employment was made—a very convenient arena—at a Press gallery lunch. My right hon. Friend the Member for Blaneau Gwent (Mr. Foot) referred to the Paymaster General's speech when he said that he considered that the remarks made at that lunch gave some hope that the Government would do something about the print dispute. The Minister said:

"Rupert Murdoch's personal public relations could do with a little improvement".

Public relations? This man was geared up to sack 6,000 workers; indeed, not only to sack them, but to deny them their redundancy and pension rights. He carefully designed that. If this is simply a public relations exercise, it says a great deal about the liberal image of the Minister.

Later on the right hon. and learned Gentleman said:

"The Government will be watching the law on strikes with care. . . . We will watch to see whether unfair disciplinary action is taken against members who choose to work and keep their jobs".

If the Minister is concerned about justice, he should study the statisical analysis of the industrial tribunals, which shows that about 40 times more people are sacked because they are members of trade unions than are sacked because they are not members of a trade union. Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman will concern himself with the injustices suffered by people who seek the human right to belong to a trade union. The right hon. and learned Gentleman came to the job with a liberal image, but he has been revealed to be as hard as anybody else about justice in industrial relations.

The motion is wide ranging and allows us to raise all the essential facets of industrial relations. We do not apologise for discussing the print dispute, the miners' dispute, or any other dispute. We do not duck the issue. We have a point to put. We believe that most of them are motivated and directly caused by the Government's legislation. That is why we shall repeal such legislation, lock, stock and barrel. I shall consider whether employment rights have been restricted and reduced, and the implications of disputes in the public mind, especially the miners' dispute or that involving News International.

I do not believe that anybody would argue that the right to work has been pursued since 1979. We can see that the Government's argument that reducing taxation will help to increase profits and lead to increased investment, increased employment, and lower inflation is patent nonsense, as we have been left with an extremely poor investment record compared with the rest of the European Community.

I have heard figures about unemployment. I should like to make it clear that the Labour Government inherited an unemployment rate of 1·2 million and that, when we left office, nearly 400,000 more people were in work although we had to contend with a population growth twice that experienced since 1979. We know that between 4·5 million and 5 million people are now available for work. The Government's labour force survey reveals that.

When we compare our economy with those of other OECD countries, we must go back at least one decade. High inflation and high unemployment have been features of most developed economies during the past few decades, but the significant feature is that, under successive Governments, Britain's unemployment has always been at the average for the OECD. Since 1979, however, it has risen to about 2 per cent. above the average. The House of Commons Library has calculated that that increase is equivalent to about 1 million people out of work. The increase can be traced to the Government's policies. The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) picked out just a few countries which happen to be above Britain in the list.

In 1979, 10 of the 24 OECD countries had lower unemployment than the United Kingdom. In 1985, however—the last year for which figures are available—18 countries had lower unemployment than the United Kingdom. It is generally recognised that unemployment here has been higher, and that it cannot be put down solely to the world recession or to what has happened in other countries. There might be an argument about overmanning, which Conservative Members have deployed, but it cannot be argued that what has happened in Britain has been experienced in the rest of the Community.

Mr. Forth: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Prescott: I am afraid that I do not have time. It costs £20 billion to maintain such high unemployment. We believe that the Government have deliberately created unemployment in order to exercise a disciplinary sanction on the labour force. I have no doubt that mass unemployment is a deliberate part of Government policy. Their policies have created unemployment, and they knew that they would. I shall give some interesting evidence to support that view.

It is noticeable that the rest of the European countries are prepared to observe ILO convention 122. There is a new ILO convention which states that the Government will be prepared to pursue full employment as a matter of policy. Great Britain is the only European country which is not prepared to sign the convention and accept the commitment to provide full employment. That is a sign of the Government's priorities.

Mr. Forth: That is nonsense.

Mr. Prescott: The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire says that that is nonsense. I just note that all the other countries believe that that is a decent standard, and we should try to achieve international objectives such as full employment and decent working conditions. Other countries believe that such matters should be the normal part of any developed and civilised society. Great Britain constantly sets its face against decent standards.

Mr. Forth: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Prescott: No, I shall not give way. I want to spell out some of the rights.

Mr. Forth: What about my rights?

Mr. Prescott: I think that the hon. Gentleman has had his rights, and I want to show that he has denied rights to other people. I am not denying the hon. Gentleman much by denying him his right to intervene, but many workers have felt the lash of the hon. Gentleman's vote in the House in denying their rights. I shall spell out some of those rights to justify my point.
